The bill prayed that all guano in the United Kingdom and the British colonies, or consigned thereto, and in the possession of Messrs. J. Thomson, T. Bonar & Co., or their agents, or of the Compañia de Consignacion de Huano en la Gran Bretaña, or their agents, or to come into their possession, might be applied under the direction of the Court in accordance with the terms of the hypothecation thereof.

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Westlake, for the plaintiff.—The company was bound to hold the surplus proceeds of the guano after satisfying certain charges upon it as a trustee for the Peruvian government, and that government has hypothecated this surplus to the bondholders. The company therefore is now the trustee of the surplus for the bondholders. The company is in the position of a first mortgagee. We are entitled to a subsequent charge. It cannot injure us that the Peruvian government, the mortgagor, against whom we seek no relief, is out of the jurisdiction. We proceed against the company as first mortgagee. It cannot be denied that the proceeds of the guano sent to this country and in the hands of a trustee here are subject to the jurisdiction of this Court. The existence of property in this country gives jurisdiction to enforce a charge against it—The Carron Iron Company v. Maclaren (5 H.L. C. 416; 24 L. J. Ch. 620); Story's Conflict of Laws, ss. 549, 550; Cammell v. Sewell (3 Hurls. & N. 617; 5 Hurls. & N. 728; 27 L. J. Ex. 447; 29 L. J. Ex. 350). The same principle was affirmed by the Cour de Cassation in France on the 13th of December, 1865. This principle is applied even to personal property according to its actual locality, where the object of the proceeding is to affect the specific property itself; although we admit that where the universality of a man's property is concerned, as in bankruptcy, rights are governed by the law of the owner's domicil. We are not deprived of our remedy because the republic of Peru does not appear. When a foreign government has created a charge on property in this country in favour of persons in this country, it cannot bar the jurisdiction which it thus confers on our Courts by declining to appear. In The Duke of Brunswick v.

Digitized by Google

the King of Hanover (2 H.L. C. 1), the Lords carefully guarded themselves from giving sanction to a contrary proposition. This consequence follows from the general rule, that a party entitled to a charge may enforce it in this court whether the defendant appears or not. Therefore it makes no difference whether the defendant failing to appear is a foreign potentate or not. The jurisdiction is not personal—Gladstone v. Musurus Bey (1 Hem. & M. 495; 32 L. J. Ch. 155); The United States v. Prioleau (2 Hem. & M. 559; 35 L. J. Ch. 7). This loan, moreover, is an English contract, and our Courts will enforce it.—See Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 285. Although it was the contract of a foreign government, it was made by an agent residing in this country, and it was to be executed here.

Mr. Southgate and Mr. Charles Hall appeared for the first four defendants, who, being mere agents, were not affected by the question in dispute, and they took no part in the argument.

Sir Roundell Palmer and Mr. Kekewich, for the Compañia de Consignacion. —We appear for a foreign company, subject to the laws of a foreign country. The company is under no contract with the bondholders whom the plaintiff assumes to represent. It is under a contract with the government of Peru relating to guano sent to this country, and both parties to the contract are subject to the laws of Peru. The contract on which the plaintiff proceeds is not an English contract. It is a state loan, to be interpreted according to the laws of Peru. The word "hypothecate" is not a term of English law, and the provisions relating to the disposal of the guano are subordinate provisions. The governing terms of the contract are those which create the relation of debtor and creditor between the republic of Peru and the subscribers to the loan. The Peruvian law is the foundation of the authority to negotiate the loan, and it is immaterial that the government acts by its agents in London. It is incorrect to call the company a trustee. That is to import the terms of English law into the construction of a foreign contract. The scope of the bill is to interfere in the arrangements between the Peruvian government and parties contracting with it. In order to ascertain the surplus which the plaintiff seeks to charge, the Court must take the accounts between the parties; and the Court is asked to take an account on the footing of a foreign contract between a foreign government and a foreign company simply on the ground that one of the foreign parties has agents in this country. Such an account could not bind the Peruvian government, which is absent. Moreover, the question whether that government has injured the bondholders cannot be tried in its absence—Gladstone v. the Ottoman Bank (1 Hem. & M. 505; 32 L. J. Ch. 229).

Mr. Fry, for Mr. Ayers, took no part in the argument.

Mr. Jessel, in reply.—We cannot be prejudiced because the Peruvian government refuses to come in, but the government may be bound by the decision against its agent—The Duke of Brunswick v. the King of Hanover (6 Beav. 39; 13 L. J. Ch. 107). We do not desire to take accounts between the Peruvian government and the Consignment Company. We only seek to enforce our rights against the guano in this country. I contend that a direction given for value to an agent to apply the proceeds of certain property in his hands for my benefit constitutes him a trustee for me. But it makes no difference whether the persons holding this guano are regarded as trustees or agents. They are equally bound in both cases. The fact that the loan contract was to be performed in London makes it an English contract. But if it be not, I can still enforce it. If a merchant in Peru hypothecates a cargo to me, I can enforce the charge here. I admit that the Peruvian law would govern the construction of a Peruvian contract, but the construction is not in question.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS (May 27) after stating the facts said: On this state of facts the question is whether the plaintiff is entitled to any, and, if any, what, relief. I am of opinion that he is entitled to none. It is obvious that if any party is to blame in this transaction it is the Peruvian government, and that alone. The contract which governs this question is in my opinion clearly and unmistakably a foreign contract. It is a contract between the Peruvian government on the one hand and the Consignment Company on the other, entered into in Peru, between Peruvians and according to the law of Peru, by which the government on the one hand give leave to the company to consign to their agents in London guano, to be applied in the first instance to the payment of the loans contracted by the Peruvian government as that government shall direct, a certain proportion of the surplus being devoted to the payment of disbursements with which the plaintiff has no concern.

The company are bound to follow the directions of the government, and to account to the government. If they misapply the proceeds they are accountable to the republic of Peru, and to no one else. The Peruvian government is not here, and is not amenable to this jurisdiction; and the Court is asked, on the ground that the Peruvian government has entered into another and distinct contract with the plaintiff in common with the other bondholders (many of whom I assume are not British subjects or resident in Great Britain) to take an account arising upon a foreign contract between a foreign government and a foreign company which can bind no one and can have no possible result.

The most singular part of the argument is this: that though this matter must be dealt with according to the Peruvian law, in which, for aught that I am informed in this suit, the doctrine of trusts is wholly unknown, it is contended that the agents of the Consignment Company in London are trustees of the proceeds of the guano for the bondholders, and that the matter must be disposed of according to the English law of trustee and cestui que trust. If this be correct, then the bondholders who have taken a part of the loan in Belgium are entitled to deal with the guano in Belgium and in the hands of the Belgian house as consignees, according to the law of Belgium.

It is in my opinion a complete misapprehension to suppose that a government negotiating a loan in a foreign country thereby introduces into the transaction all the peculiarities of the law of the country in which the negotiation is made. The place where the loan is negotiated does not in my opinion in the least degree affect the question of law.

The contract is the same and the obligations are the same whoever may be the bondholders. Suppose a company in Paris or in Brussels instruct their agents in London to subscribe for some of these bonds, is the contract between the Peruvian government and the French company or between the Peruvian government and the Belgium company to be regulated by the English law, because the contract is made by their agents in London, or are the contracts to vary according to the domicil of the subscribers of the loan? If the French government should negotiate a loan on certain specified terms, whether it be negotiated in Brussels, in London or in Paris, the same law must regulate the whole, and that law is the law of France as much as if it had been expressly notified in the articles that the French law would be that by which the contract must be construed and governed. So, if the English government were to negotiate a loan in Paris or in New York, the English law must be applied to construe and regulate the contract.

But assuming that it was otherwise, how can this Court interfere? Suppose a palpable breach of the contract between the Peruvian government and the bondholders. If the Peruvian republic declared that it would not pay a penny to any of the bondholders, but would totally disclaim and repudiate the debt, could this Court interfere?

Some of the States of North America negotiated loans, partly here and partly at home, and afterwards repudiated them. No one ever attempted to seize any property belonging to those States in this country and thus enforce a contract between those governments and the holders of their bonds. If this Court attempted to further such a demand it would fall into this dilemma, either it would simply make itself ridiculous in attempting what is impossible, or, if it could assume that the foreign government was answerable and then found property belonging to that foreign government in this country, it might alter the relation between the two countries and enable a bondholder practically to declare war against a foreign state. If the Court of Chancery could seize all the guano belonging to the Peruvian government it might as well seize Peruvian vessels under the article which declares that all the other property and sources of revenue of the republic should be applicable to payment of the loan.

But the case of the plaintiff fails even according to the English law. I am of opinion that neither articles 8. and 11, nor any other article on which the plaintiff relies, according to the true construction in an English Court gives him a right to regulate the management of the loan on the guano contract, and that it is not in his power under this contract to restrain the action of the Peruvian government with relation to the price at which the bonds are taken.

The counsel for the plaintiff rely on three cases in particular,—The Duke of Brunswick v. the King of Hanover, Gladstone v. Musurus Bey and The United States v. Prioleau. The first case has little to do with the matter. All that I understand to have been decided by it is, that a foreign sovereign is not amenable to the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery for any act done by him as a sovereign, and that he does not by appearing to a suit waive his right to take that defence, but that if he also has an English character distinct from that of a foreign sovereign he may in respect of acts done in that character be made a defendant.

The second case is that which is principally relied upon. In that case a company in London entered into a contract with a foreign government for the establishment of a bank. The foreign government, in order to secure the execution of the contract by the English company, required 20,000*l*. in bonds of the foreign government, to be deposited in the Bank of England, to be forfeited if the contract was not executed. The foreign government thought fit to declare that the contract had been violated, and directed its ambassador to withdraw the deposit, which, but for the intervention of the Court, he would have been able to do. The Court refused to make any order on the ambassador, and allowed his objection to the jurisdiction; but on an interlocutory application restrained the bank from parting with the amount so deposited until the hearing of the cause, on the ground that it held this fund as a trustee for the foreign government or the English company according as the case should be proved at the hearing. It does not appear to me to have any bearing on the present case favourable to the plaintiff. The Court did not enforce the specific performance of any contract between the foreign government and the English company, nor did it assume any power to do so; but as an English company had deposited a sum in the hands of a third party to wait a certain result the Court interposed indirectly to prevent the foreign government from taking possession of the sum until it had established that according to the contract entered into with the company it was entitled to do so. The Court expressed no opinion as to the nature of the contract entered into with the English company, whether it was an English or a foreign contract; all that it did was to prevent the foreign government from dealing with the fund as its own before it was shewn that it was forfeited. This is clear from the whole case, and particularly from this passage, at page 503: "The case may well be supposed of a foreign ambassador here accepting the trusts of a marriage settlement, it may be as sole trustee. If the funds were invested in his name in the Bank of England it is quite true I could not deal with him on account of the impossibility of any process being had against an ambassador. But the funds being in the Bank of England it appears to me clear that I could in such a state of circumstances (this being a fund vested in the ambassador absolutely and accepted by him upon certain trusts) prevent the Bank of England from handing it over to the ambassador, upon a distinct intimation on his part that he intended to apply it to his own use." But does it therefore follow that at the instance of the English company the Court would have enforced the contract against the foreign government or touched the property of that government in this country (which is what is sought to be obtained here)? Indeed, the next case in the same volume, Gladstone v. the Ottoman Bank, establishes a proposition precisely in point. A bill filed against the Ottoman Bank, its directors and the Sultan, alleged that the Sultan's government had granted to the plaintiffs the exclusive right of issuing bank notes in Turkey, and had subsequently, in derogation of that grant, made a similar concession to the defendants (the Ottoman Bank), and prayed a declaration of the plaintiffs' exclusive right, and an injunction against the Ottoman Bank and its directors. It was held on the demurrer of the bank and its directors that, inasmuch as the Court had no jurisdiction on the contract against the Sultan, it had none against the bank and its directors, and the demurrer was allowed accordingly. That is exactly this case. There is no jurisdiction against the Peruvian government, and therefore there is none against the Consignment Company, and no decree can be made.

The third case has in my opinion no bearing on the question before me. It merely establishes that a foreign government which puts down an insurrection within its own territories acquires all the rights of contract which the temporary and insurgent government it replaces possessed or exercised.

But, assuming that the Court had jurisdiction, then I am of opinion that, on the merits, the Peruvian government was perfectly justified in what it did.—[His Lordship then discussed the mode in which the stipulated sum had been applied to the redemption of bonds, and proceeded]—I think the Peruvian government has acted within the strict spirit and according to the due construction of the articles on which the loan was taken. If it had not done so, I think that it is a matter in which this Court has no power to interfere, and that if it did interfere it would be necessary to take the accounts between two foreign parties to a foreign contract, both residing abroad; and to do this is contrary to the principles of this Court. In the present case, it is made more difficult by the fact that one of these parties is a foreign government not before the Court, and who cannot be made amenable to it. In all respects I think the plaintiff is in the wrong, and his bill must be dismissed with costs.

Will, Construction—Legatee, Description of—Present and after-taken Wife.

WILL.—Bequest of a fund to testator's son (then married) for life, and after his decease the fund to be divided equally between the wife of the said son, if she should survive him, and all and every the child or children of the said son:—Held, that no particular wife was designated, and that an after-taken wife who survived the son was entitled to share in the gift over.

Edward Lyne, by his will, made in 1854, bequeathed a sum of 800*l.* to trustees, upon trust to pay the income to his son George for life, and after his decease "to pay and transfer the said sum unto and equally between the wife of the said son, in case she should survive him, and all and every the child or children of his said son."

At the date of the will the testator's son, George Lyne, had a wife and one child living, but the wife died in the following year.

Digitized by Google

The testator died in 1858. George Lyne the son married a second wife in 1859, and died in 1868, having had no child by his second wife.

The trustees having paid the fund into Court, his widow, the second wife, now petitioned for a declaration that she was entitled to one moiety.

Mr. G. Hastings, in support of the petition, cited Peppin v. Bickford (3 Ves. 570), and contended that the widow, though an after-taken wife, of the testator's son, was entitled just as much as his children by her, if any, would have taken, there being no words to limit the gift to any particular wife.

Mr. Cotton and Mr. A. E. Miller, for the only child, claiming the whole fund, referred to 1 Jarman on Wills, 304, and cited Garratt v. Niblock (1 Russ. & M. 629); Bryan's Trust (2 Sim. N.S. 103; 21 L. J. Ch. 7); Boreham v. Bignall (8 Hare, 131; 19 L. J. Ch. 461). The gift was not to any after-taken wife, but to the particular woman who was at the date of the will the wife of the testator's son, and known to the testator as such. The analogy is the same as in the case of a gift to testator's servants; the gift is limited to persons answering the description at the date of the will—Parker v. Marchant (1 You. & C. C.C. 290; 11 L. J. Ch. 223: affirmed on appeal, 12 L. J. Ch. 385).

Mr. M. Cookson, for the trustees.

MALINS, V.C.—The question here is, whether the gift over is limited to the children of the testator's son and the particular lady who was known to the testator as his son's wife at the date of the will, or whether, in the events that have happened, it extends to an after-taken wife who has survived the testator's son? It is clear that all the children of George Lyne, whether by his then wife or by his widow, the present petitioner, would have been equally entitled. It is also clear that the class to take could not be ascertained till the death of George Lyne; then the gift is to his wife, if she survive, and his children as a class. The contingency which has actually arisen was, probably, not present to the mind of the testator, and his intention is therefore uncertain. But seeing that the petitioner answers the description of the wife, and might certainly have been the mother of children who would have taken under this gift, I cannot presume that the testator intended to exclude her from the class, and, in my opinion, the words which he has used are not such as render it necessary for me to do so. The authorities do not appear to me to proceed upon any very sound principle, but I think the present case may fairly be distinguished from Garratt v. Niblock and Bryan's Trust, in both of which there were expressions which are not found here, indicating that the testator meant a particular person. One moiety of this fund, therefore, will go to the petitioner as the widow of George Lyne, and the other moiety to his only child.

SUTCLIFFE v. HOWARD.

38 L. J. Ch. 472; 17 W. R. 819.

Will—Construction—"Respective"—Tenancy in Common—Distribution per Stirpes.

WILL.—Gift to three persons by name for their respective lives, and subject thereto for their respective children as tenants in common.

The life tenants are tenants in common, and the children take per stirpes.

John Howard devised certain hereditaments upon trust, to apply the rents and profits to and for the benefit of his two brothers James and Samuel and his married sister Lucy, "during their respective lives, in such manner as the trustees should think fit, and subject thereto in trust for the respective children of his said brothers and sister as tenants in common."

The testator died in July, 1848; his brother James died in the following October, leaving children; his sister Lucy died in 1867, leaving children; his brother Samuel was still living and had children.

The questions were, whether the gift to the testator's brothers and sister created a joint tenancy or a tenancy in common, and whether their children took per capita or per stirpes.

Mr. Dunning, for the trustees, the plaintiffs, submitted the case to the Court.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. J. T. Humphry, for Samuel Howard, the surviving brother claimed a life interest in the whole, and submitted that, upon his death the property would be divisible between all the children per capita, and not per stirpes. They cited upon the question of joint tenancy—Woodstock v. Shillito (6 Sim. 416); Armstrong v. Eldridge (3 Bro. C.C. 215); Cranswick v. Pearson (31 Beav. 624); Wood v. Draycott (2 New Rep. 55); Pearce v. Edmeades (3 You. & C. Ex. 246; 8 L. J. Ch. 61); Bryan v. Twigg (37 L. J. Ch. 249; L. R. 3 Ch. Ap. 183); and upon the question of distribution—Congreve v. Palmer (16 Beav. 435; 23 L. J. Ch. 54); Abrey v. Newman (16 Beav. 431; 22 L. J. Ch. 627); Alt v. Gregory (8 De Gex, M. & G. 221).

Mr. Nalder, for the children of James and Lucy, the deceased brother and sister, was not called upon.

MALINS, V.C.—The contention upon the first question here raised is, that the brothers and sister took as joint tenants, so that the surviving brother is now entitled for his life to the whole of the rents and profits as against the children of the deceased brother and sister; and if that is so, then there is the second point, whether, upon the death of the surviving tenant for life, the children take per capita or per stirpes? Now, I think there can be no doubt that the testator intended to give an equal share in this property to each of the three devisees and their children. Has he used words sufficient to effectuate that intention? I think it turns upon the word "respective," which has a most important significance here. The gift is to the three persons named "for their respective lives," which, as I understand it, means that each is to be tenant for life of one-third; and "subject thereto," that is, subject to the life interest already given to each parent in one-third of the property, the children of each are to take the deceased parent's share. The words are, I think, sufficient to shew that the share of each parent was to go over upon his or her death to his or her children; and it follows from this construction that the children take per stirpes.

Will—Construction—Remoteness—Class to be ascertained after Death of Unborn Tenant for Life.

PERPETUITY.—Testatrix gave property to three persons successively for life, one of whom was unborn at her decease, and after the decease of the survivor, to all the children of S. (who was at the date of the will unmarried) in equal shares, and the child or children of such of the said children as should be then dead, with an absolute gift over in case there should be no child or grandchild of the said S. then living:—Held, that the limitation over to the children and grandchildren of S, being a gift to a class to be ascertained after the expiration of a life not in being at the death of the testatrix, was void for remoteness.

Observations upon Ashley v. Ashley (6 Sim. 358; 3 L. J. Ch. 61), and Avern v. Lloyd (37 L. J. Ch. 489).

This was a petition to determine a question of remoteness arising in the administration of the estate of Elizabeth Edgley Hewer, who, by will, dated the 21st of March, 1782, devised and bequeathed all her real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to sell and convert, and to invest the proceeds on government securities, and to pay the interest, dividends and proceeds to her nephew Sir Simeon Stuart (who was then unmarried), for his life for his own use; and after his decease, upon trust to pay the said interest, dividends and proceeds to the eldest son of Sir Simeon Stuart for life for his own use and benefit, and after the decease of the eldest son of Sir Simeon Stuart, then upon trust to pay the said interest, dividends and proceeds to her niece Elizabeth Stuart for life for her own use and benefit; and after the decease of the survivor of them, the said Sir Simeon Stuart, his eldest son, and Elizabeth Stuart, then upon trust " to pay and transfer the said government securities unto all and every the children of my said nephew Sir Simeon Stuart, share and share alike, if more than one, and if but one, then to such one child, and the child or children of such of the children of the said Sir Simeon Stuart as shall be then dead, according to the Statute of Distribution of Intestates' Estates; but in case there shall be no child or grandchild of the said Sir Simeon then living, then upon trust to pay and transfer the said government securities unto all and every the children of my said niece Elizabeth, equally to be divided between them if more than one, and if but one, then to such one child; but in case there shall be no child of my said niece then living, then upon trust to pay and transfer the said government securities unto Charles Cockerell, to whom I give the same accordingly."

The testatrix died in 1785. Sir Simeon Stuart died intestate in January, 1816, having had four children, two of whom died in his lifetime. His eldest son, Simeon Henry Stuart, was born in 1790, and died in October, 1868, leaving issue. Elizabeth Stuart, the niece of the testatrix, died in 1846.

Upon the death of Simeon Henry Stuart, the successive life estates having all expired, his brother William Henry Frederick Hewer Stuart, the second and only surviving son of Sir Simeon, claimed to be entitled under the gift over to the whole corpus of the testatrix's estate, and presented this petition for payment thereof out of Court.

It was admitted, however, at the bar that the petitioner's claim under the will, if any, could only extend to a moiety of the fund, the children of Simeon Henry Stuart being equally entitled to the other moiety in right of their deceased father.

The claim was resisted on behalf of the next-of-kin of the testatrix, on the ground that all the gifts over after the three life estates were void for remoteness.

Mr. Cotton and Mr. Riddell, for the petitioner, contended that there was a distinct and valid gift to the children of Sir Simeon Stuart, which vested in interest, though not in possession, as they came into esse; and though the gift to the children of deceased children, which was nothing but a substitutionary gift, might be too remote, still that did not affect the validity of the original gift to the children of Sir Simeon Stuart. There was nothing in the original gift to contravene the law upon which the rule against perpetuities was based, namely, the rendering of an estate inalienable beyond the legal period of a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards. If a remainder over after the death of an unborn tenant for life necessarily vested, as this did, within the legal time, the gift was clearly good. Lewis on Perpetuities, 164; Cadell v. Palmer (1 Cl. & F. 372; 7 Bligh, N.S. 202).

[MALINS, V.C. referred to Barlow v. Salter (17 Ves. 479, 483).]

That case depended on a contingency. Here there was none. The gift to the children vested at their birth, subject to a postponement of the enjoyment only—In re Bennett's Trusts (3 Kay & J. 280).

Digitized by Google

[MALINS, V.C.—You seek to bring the case within Roe v. Jeffery (7 Term Rep. 589).]

Admitting that authority, we contend that here it is immaterial that the gift over is preceded by a good gift to an unborn person for life—Routledge v. Dorril (2 Ves. 357); Beard v. Westcott (5 B. & Ald. 801); Walker v. Shore (15 Ves. 122).

Mr. Shapter and Mr. Woodroffe, for mortgagees claiming under Sir Simeon Stuart's eldest son, adopted the same line of argument, insisting that the original gift to the children was quite distinct from the substitutionary bequest to the grandchildren, and wholly unaffected by invalidity in the latter. They relied on In re Bennett's Trusts, ubi supra, and cited in addition, upon the question of remoteness, Lewis on Perpetuities, 423, 513; 1 Hayes on Conveyancing, 495; 1 Jarman on Wills, 2nd ed., 239; 11 Jarman's Bythewood, 188; Sugden's Gilb. Uses, 270-274, 277; Ashley v. Ashley (6 Sim. 358); In re Merrick's Trusts (35 L. J. Ch. 418; L. R. 1 Eq. 551); Avern v. Lloyd (37 L. J. Ch. 489; L. R. 5 Eq. 383). And upon the true meaning of a "substitutionary gift" they referred to In re Turner (2 Dr. & Sm. 501; 34 L. J. Ch. 660); Loring v. Thomas (1 Dr. & Sm. 497; 30 L. J. Ch. 789).

Mr. Fleming and Mr. Wickens, for the personal representatives of Elizabeth Stuart, argued for an intestacy after the expiration of the life estates. The gift of the corpus is too remote. It is a fallacy to read the latter part of the bequest as a substitutionary gift. It is all one original gift to the children and the grandchildren alike, including children of unborn children, and therefore necessarily void. It is impossible to get over the word "then"; and the class could only be ascertained upon the death of the last survivor of the tenants for life, one of them being an unborn person at the testator's death. They referred to Leake v. Robinson (2 Mer. 363); Cattlin v. Brown (11 Hare, 372); Knapping v. Tomlinson (34 L. J. Ch. 3).

The VICE CHANCELLOR declined to hear Mr. Cottrell, who appeared for beneficiaries claiming under Elizabeth Stuart.

Mr. Cotton was heard in reply.

MALINS, V.C. (March 5), after stating the facts, said: It is contended on the part of the respondents that all the gifts after the life estate to the eldest son of Sir Simeon Stuart are void for remoteness. Property may be given by will or secured by settlement to an unborn person for life, or to several unborn persons successively for life, with remainders over, providing the vesting of the remainders or the ascertainment of those who are to take in remainder be not postponed till after the death of such unborn person or persons.—[His Honour referred to Ashley v. Ashley; Lewis on Perpetuities, 423; 1 Jarman on Wills, 3rd ed. 264; Gilbert on Uses, by Sugden, 269, n.]—I refer to those passages because they were cited in argument, but of course there are many others which illustrate and support this proposition.

In the present case, therefore, the life interest of the unborn son of Sir Simeon Stuart would have caused no difficulty if those who were to take in remainder, subject to that life interest, could have been ascertained with certainty within the allowed period of a life or lives in being at the death of the testatrix, and twenty-one years after. But the gift is to a class of persons consisting of the children and grandchildren of Sir Simeon Stuart who should be living at the death of the survivor of Sir Simeon Stuart, his unborn son and the testatrix's niece, Elizabeth Stuart. That necessarily postponed the ascertainment of the class to take, and consequently the vesting of the property till after the expiration of a life not in being at the death of the testatrix; and the gift is necessarily void for remoteness.

The case is in principle like Jee v. Audley (1 Cox, 324), where the gift was if a person should die without issue then to the children of two living persons. A gift over on failure of issue would be void for remoteness as to mere personal property, but a gift over to children living would have been good if it had been to children living at the death of the testatrix, but as those persons might have had other children it was impossible to say that it meant children then living. The gift was held void for remoteness, and Lord Kenyon would not assume that the two aged persons might not have had other issue. I followed that case in Sayer's Trusts (36 L. J. Ch. 350; L. R. 6 Eq. 319). The decision in In re Bennett's Trusts was much relied on by Mr. Shapter and Mr. Cotton, who argued in support of the validity of the bequest, but there all the gifts in remainder were to take effect at the expiration of lives in being, and the question of remoteness could not therefore arise. I do not stay to refer to the cases. It was a mere question who was to take at the death of the two children of the testator who were living at the time of making his will. That case, therefore, has no application to the doctrine of remoteness upon which this question must be determined.

If the gift over at the death of the unborn son of Sir Simeon Stuart had been confined to the life interest of the niece it would have been good upon the principle of Roe v. Jeffery. That was a devise to Thomas Frisswell and his heirs for ever, and with a gift over if he died without issue to four persons, without words of limitation.

If the limitation over was to take effect upon his death, without issue generally, that was an estate tail, but if it meant dying without issue within a limited period it was a fee with an executory devise over. The Court of Queen's Bench held that it was a fee with an executory devise over. The devisees over could only take for life. The failure of issue must necessarily be within lives in being. So here, if the gift over had been confined to the niece for life it would have been good, because it must have taken effect in her lifetime or not at all.

But as her life interest was followed by remainders to the children and grandchildren, the case is like Barlow v. Salter, which is an authority of the highest importance. The bequest there was in these words: "All my estate, real and personal, of every sort and kind, to my daughter and her heirs, and half the navigation money for her natural life; and in case she dies without issue all to be divided between my four nephews and nieces, Nathaniel Barlow, William, Catharine and Elizabeth, Catharine's part"—this is the point—"only for life, and her part to be divided between the survivors." Now, if the bequest had stopped with the gift over to Catharine for life of course it would have been good, upon the principle of Roe v. Jeffery, which I have just cited, but as it was followed by an absolute gift over to the survivors, Sir William Grant lays down the rule thus, at page 482: "Where nothing but a life interest is given over the failure of issue must necessarily be intended a failure within the compass of that life, but where the entire interest is given over the mere circumstance that one taker is confined to a life interest furnishes no indication of an intention to make the whole bequest depend upon the existence of that person at the time when the event happens on which the limitation over is to take effect. When a remainder for life has been limited after an estate tail it never was argued that an estate tail could not really be meant to be given because of the improbability of intending a personal provision for one person after the indefinite failure of issue of another. The failure may happen during the life, and that chance is what is given to the remainderman for life. So here, if Catharine shall be living when the issue fails she will take a life interest, but the bequest over is still to take place when the failure of issue shall happen whether Catharine be then living or not." So in this case, the niece was to take for life if she was living, but if she was not living those in remainder were equally to take whether her death took place before the period or after the period.

I have referred to the two cases mentioned by Mr. Shapter after the argument. The first is In re Merrick's Trusts. I am not able to see that that has any particular application, because the events there did not call for any application of the doctrine of remoteness. But the second case, of Avern v. Lloyd, is apparently applicable. That was a decision of Vice Chancellor Stuart, in the year 1868. The marginal note is this: "Bequest of personal estate to unborn issue as tenants for life"—that is, to all the children of A, who, as yet, had no children, "as tenants for life," to that there could be no objection—"and to the executors, administrators and assigns of the survivor of the unborn issue." The Vice Chancellor held that that gave an absolute interest to the survivor. Now, that may be reconciled by regarding the words "executors, administrators and assigns" following a gift of life estate as words of limitation. If the Vice Chancellor construed it thus, that it was a gift to all the children for life with a limitation to one of them absolutely, it may possibly be reconciled. But if the Vice Chancellor intended to decide that the vesting of any gift whatever can be postponed till after the expiration of lives not yet in being, then I must respectfully differ from his opinion, because nothing can be more clearly settled (it was finally settled by Cadell v. Palmer,) that you may postpone the vesting of the estate either to a person in existence upon an event which may never happen or to a class of persons not yet in existence but who may come into existence at any time within the life or lives in being and the period of twenty-one years in gross afterwards. But every gift which must not necessarily be ascertained within that period is void.

Therefore, a gift to take effect at the expiration of lives not yet in being must necessarily be void. The Vice Chancellor, I see, uses this expression: "Considering that this limitation to the executors, administrators and assigns must take effect in the lifetime of one of the unborn issue, to whom a good estate for life is given, so as to give him an absolute estate in possession when he becomes survivor, it is not easy to see on what ground it can be considered as too remote." It is clearly too remote if the persons who were to take were not to be ascertained until all the unborn persons were dead; but he goes on to say, "The gift to the executors, administrators and assigns of the surviving tenant for life attaches to the life estate so as to give a contingent absolute interest to each tenant for life." That, I think, was the ground upon which the Vice Chancellor decided it, and upon that ground it may be right; but if it is attempted to say that you may postpone the gift until after the expiration of the lives of all those unborn persons, that is plainly in opposition to all the settled rules on the subject, and I cannot think that Vice Chancellor Stuart intended to decide anything of the kind. I may make an observation also on the case of Ashley v. Ashley, which was cited by Mr. Shapter, where Sir Lancelot Shadwell held that you might give an estate to unborn persons for life as tenants in common, with cross-remainders between them for life. Now, if you were to give an estate to A. for life, remainder to his children, as tenants in common in fee, with a proviso that if any one of the unborn children should die without issue living at the time of his death, his share should go over, nobody would for a moment contend that such a gift would be good, because it is a cross-limitation to take effect at the death of an unborn person. Therefore it is that on such limitations, with cross-limitations in fee, every person acquainted with the subject takes care to limit the cross-remainders over upon the death of the children under twenty-one, it being perfectly clear that if you give to A. for life, remainder to his children as tenants in common in fee, and provide that if any one of the children shall die under the age of twenty-two years, the original gift to them as tenants in fee is good, but the cross-limitation to them is void, as being too remote. But if twenty-two years is too remote, how can it be good when it is at the expiration of a life not yet in existence? Therefore, with great respect to the memory of Sir Lancelot Shadwell, I cannot help thinking that he went too far in holding that life estates may be given to unborn issue as tenants for life, with cross-remainders between them, because every such remainder must either be a remainder upon an estate tail, or a cross executory bequest or limitation limited so as to take effect necessarily within a life in being and twenty-one years afterwards.

The only point, therefore, here is—Is it a gift to a class of persons, to be ascertained at the expiration of an unborn person? The words are, "after the decease of the survivor of them, the said Sir Simeon Stuart, his eldest son, and my said niece Elizabeth" (that is, after the expiration of the lives of two persons who were then in esse, and one who was not then in esse), "then upon trust to pay and transfer the said government securities unto all and every the children of my said nephew Sir Simeon Stuart, share and share alike, if more than one, and if but one, then to such one child and the child or children of such of the children of the said Sir Simeon Stuart as shall be then dead." It is perfectly clear to my mind that the whole class is a class consisting of children and grandchildren, and that the class could not under the terms of this will be ascertained until all the three tenants for life were dead. That is too remote a period, and it is made still more clear by the terms of the ultimate gift over.—[His Honour read the clause and continued]—It is perfectly clear, therefore, to my mind that the object of the testatrix was to give to the children of Sir Simeon Stuart, if there were any at that period; if not, then to the children of her niece, and if there were no children of the niece, then to Sir Charles Cockerell.

Upon every ground it appears to me to be a limitation void for remoteness, not simply, as I have already said, because there is interposed a life interest to an unborn person, but because the vesting is postponed until after the expiration of that life. There must be, therefore, a declaration that the limitations are void for remoteness: the consequence of which, I apprehend, will be, that the next-of-kin of the testatrix will take.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R., April 24, 1869.

In re PEYTON'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS.

Trustee—Power to invest in Fee Simple Lands in Possession—Freehold Ground-Rents—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35. s. 30.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE. Power to invest funds in the purchase of hereditaments of a clear and indefeasible estate of inheritance in fee simple in possession:—Held, to authorize an investment in freehold ground-rents.

By an indenture of settlement, dated the 4th of April, 1843, certain hereditaments were conveyed to trustees and their heirs to the use of John East Hunter Peyton for life; with remainder to the use of the trustees to preserve contingent remainders; with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of J. E. H. Peyton in tail male; with remainders over.

The settlement contained a power for the trustees, with the consent of the person for the time being entitled thereunder for his life to the rents and profits of the settled property, to sell any part thereof, with a declaration that when any part of the settled property should be sold, the trustees should, with all convenient speed, and with such consent as aforesaid, invest the money to arise by the sale in the purchase of other "hereditaments to be situate in England or Wales of a clear and indefeasible estate of inheritance in fee simple in possession, or of lands or hereditaments of a leasehold or copyhold tenure convenient to be held therewith, or with the hereditaments thereinbefore settled."

The trustees had, in exercise of the power, and with the consent of J. E. H. Peyton, the person entitled for life to the rents of the settled property, sold part of such property for upwards of 18,000*l.*, and they and also J. E. H. Peyton were desirous that 8,866*l.*, part of this sum, should be invested in the purchase of several plots of land situate in the parish of Kensington, and on which fifty-five dwelling-houses had been recently erected. Of these houses leases had been granted for terms of ninety-nine years; as to some from the 24th of June, 1866, and as to others from the 25th of December, 1867, at rents amounting together to 403*l*.

Doubts being entertained by the trustees as to whether the contemplated investment was within the meaning of the power contained in the settlement, they, conjointly with J. E. H. Peyton, had presented a petition, under the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, asking for the opinion of the Court as to whether the contemplated investment was an investment within the terms of and authorized by the settlement, and praying that the costs of the application might be provided for.

Mr. Jessel and Mr. E. S. Ford, for the petitioners.

Lord Romilly, M.R.—I am of opinion that the proposed investment is authorized by the settlement. The costs of the petitioner must be paid out of the trust funds.

Principal and Surety—Debtor and Creditor—Proof of Debt.

Banker. Bankruptcy.—A customer of a bank wishing to overdraw his account, procures a surety to the extent of 300*l*. The guarantee provided that all dividends, compositions and payments received by the bank should be taken and applied as payments in gross, and that the guarantee was to apply to and secure any ultimate balance which should remain due. The intending debtor gave to the surety an equitable mortgage to secure him from loss. Afterwards he executed a creditors' deed. The account was then overdrawn to the extent of 410*l*. By arrangement between the assignees and the surety the mortgaged property was sold, and the latter received out of the proceeds of the mortgaged property 300*l*., and paid it to the bank:—Held, that the bank was entitled to prove for the whole 410*l*.

This was an appeal from a decree of Vice Chancellor Malins, declaring the plaintiffs entitled to prove, under a creditors' deed, against the estate of one F. J. Mercer for the sum of 410*l*. 4*s*. 11*d*., under the following circumstances.

The plaintiffs carried on the business of bankers at Sheffield, and in 1865, Mercer was a customer. Mercer wishing to overdraw his account, obtained from one Thorpe a guarantie to the plaintiffs, which was addressed to the plaintiffs in the following terms:

"In consideration of your opening an account with F. J. Mercer, and advancing to him at any time the sum of 300*l*. at my request, I hereby guarantee to you the repayment of all moneys which shall at any time be due from him to you on the general balance of his account with you, and I hereby declare that this guarantie shall be a continuing guarantie to the extent at any one time of 300*l*., and shall not be considered as wholly or partially satisfied by the payment or liquidation at any time or times hereafter of any sum or sums of money for the time being due upon such general balance, but shall extend to cover and be security for every and all future sums of money at any time due to you, notwithstanding any such payment. And I further declare that you may grant to the said F. J. Mercer, or to any drawer, acceptor or indorsers of bills of exchange or promissory notes received by you from him, any time or other indulgence, and compound with him or them respectively, without discharging or satisfying any liability, and that all dividends, compositions and payments received from them or him respectively shall be taken and applied as payments in gross, and that this guarantie shall apply to and secure any ultimate balance that shall remain due to the company; and I further declare that this guarantie shall continue to be binding, notwithstanding any changes that may from time to time take place in the shareholders of the said Midland Banking Company (Limited)."

At the same time this guarantie was given by Thorpe, Mercer gave to Thorpe an equitable mortgage on some property to secure him from any loss by reason of the guarantie. This fact did not appear to be known to the bank.

The bank accordingly made advances to Mercer, the amount of which varied from time to time. At the date of Mercer's executing the deed, presently mentioned, the amount owing to the bank was 410*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.*

On the 6th of January, 1866, Mercer executed a deed of assignment of his estate to the defendants Chambers and Thorpe for the benefit of creditors, which deed was afterwards duly registered under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

The trustees of the deed sold the property mortgaged to Thorpe, and Thorpe, acting in his character of mortgagee, took 300*l.* out of the purchase-money and paid it to the Midland Banking Company in discharge of all liability on his guarantie. The exact arrangement which he and his co-trustee made in reference to this transaction did not appear.

The Midland Banking Company having tendered a proof of the whole of the 410*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.*, of course, however, not claiming to receive more than with the 300*l.* would pay them in full, the trustees refused to admit the proof for more than 110*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.*, the balance after deducting the 300*l.*

This suit was therefore instituted for the purpose of administering the trusts of the deed so as to enforce the proof. The bill prayed that the plaintiff might be declared entitled to prove for the whole, the amount receivable under the proof being limited as above mentioned.

Vice Chancellor Malins having decided in favour of the plaintiffs, the defendants now appealed.

Mr. Cotton and Mr. Kekewich, for the appellants.—The plaintiffs here are creditors who have been partly paid out of the debtor's estate: how can they have any claim to prove for the whole debt? It is true that a surety, if he pays the amount for which he is liable as surety, is ordinarily entitled to stand in the creditors' shoes—Thornton v. M'Kewan (1 Hem. & M. 525; 32 L. J. Ch. 69), and we admit that he may by contract divest himself of that right in favour of the creditor—Ex parte Hope; In re Fernandez (3 Mont. D. & D. 720); yet this admission does not apply here, because Thorpe received from the bankrupt's estate the whole amount he paid to the plaintiffs; he, therefore, had no right or desire to prove. How can the plaintiffs then prove for the 100*l.*? If the Vice Chancellor's judgment be supported there will be this result: that though the bankrupt only gave security for 300*l.*, yet the whole debt may possibly be paid in full, and that without any other person suffering or even incurring any risk. This cannot be the effect of the transaction, as it would practically disregard the rule in bankruptcy that a secured creditor can only prove for the balance after realizing his security. We are not concerned to argue whether if the plaintiffs had proved for the whole amount and received a dividend, and then required payment of the balance from Thorpe, they could have recovered in full. We submit, however, that according to the true construction of the agreement it would not be so; they would then only be entitled to such an amount as was the difference between the dividend on 300*l.* and that sum. The fact, however, is, that they have received out of the bankrupt's estate 300*l.*, and they cannot now prove for it.

Mr. De Gex and Mr. Bristowe, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

[Counsel for the defendants also endeavoured to raise a second point, namely, that the true remedy was in bankruptcy, and not by bill. This point was, as counsel stated, not argued in the Court below, because they felt sure, from previous decisions of his Honour, that he would have decided against them, but they wished to raise the point in the Court of Appeal. Their Lordships, however, refused to hear any argument as to the jurisdiction, as it had not been taken below.]

SELWYN, L.J.—There are two questions in this case: one as to the construction of this contract, and the other a question of principle, as to the effect of the counter security being given to Thorpe, and his being paid in full. It is settled by Ex parte Holmes (Mont. & C. 301: reversing 8 L. J. Bk. 44); Thornton v. M'Kewan; and Ex parte Hope, that where a surety who is liable for part of a debt has paid that part, he is entitled to stand in the place of the creditor for so much as he has paid, against the estate of the bankrupt debtor. The surety may, however, in his contract of suretyship resign this right in favour of the creditor; and the question is, whether he has done so here. I am of opinion that the last clause in this guarantie is to give the creditor the right to the full amount of the dividend, and exclude the surety from the right to have any share in the benefit of the proof. This being so, is the case affected by the existence of the counter security, and the fact of full payment to the surety out of that security? This question seems answered by Ex parte Hope, which differs from the present case in the fact that there the security was upon the separate estate of one of two partners; Lord Justice Knight Bruce, however, who was the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, and was of great experience, in his judgment seems to treat that as immaterial. He says, "The agreement would, I conceive, have been clearly effectual and binding between the creditor and surety if the surety had not, by means of his mortgage or otherwise, received payment from the assignees or from the bankrupt's estate; and if so, I do not see why their redemption of the mortgage, or the payment of the surety in any other way out of the bankrupt's estate, should vary the rights of the creditor. I think they must take the surety's rights, if they take them at all, as he had them himself; that they cannot make any claim against the creditors' dividends which the surety could not have made; that he could not have made this claim, and that their petition must be dismissed. I may observe that I have not stated the facts specifically as they appear, nor, indeed, do all the facts clearly appear; but I have meant to state, and I believe I have stated, the case in a manner as favourable as possible to the petitioners. The debtor was, in truth, a firm of several persons in partnership together, and the mortgaged estate seems to have been the separate property of one of the firm, a circumstance which appears to me to make no difference, at least in favour of the petitioners. I suppose that if it had been originally made to the respondents, it would not have affected their right of proof against the firm." Of course, if there were any fraud in this transaction, different considerations might arise; but nothing of the kind is suggested. The case is simple, and comes within that decided by Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, and I think the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

GIFFARD, L.J.—I quite agree with the opinion of the Vice Chancellor. When we look at this guarantie, I think we cannot doubt what is its meaning: it refers to dividends, which must mean dividends from the debtor's estate. It was therefore a relinquishment of all claim to any such dividends. If the surety had paid the 300*l.* out of his own money, he would in ordinary cases have had a right to prove for that amount. This right, however, he gave to the plaintiffs. The argument depending upon the fact that the 300*l.* came out of the estate is ill founded, because the 300*l.* did not come out of the estate; it came out of property which, having been devoted to this very purpose, did not at the date of the execution of the creditors' deed, form part of the estate. That being so, there is no ground for reducing the proof, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs. It must be distinctly understood that we give no opinion on the question of jurisdiction.[1]

Trustee and Cestui que Trust—Non-enforcement of Covenant—Breach of Trust—Privity—Administrator ad Litem—Lapse of Time.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—A marriage settlement executed in May, 1817, contained a covenant by the husband with a trustee to pay to the trustee within three years a sum of 3,000l., to be held upon the usual trusts in favour of the husband and wife and issue of the marriage, or else to secure that sum by mortgage. The money was neither paid nor secured, and the trustee never attempted to enforce the covenant, but acted as solicitor to the purchaser, on a sale in 1846 by the covenantor for his own benefit of the property he had covenanted to mortgage. The trustee died in 1848; his sons had notice of the settlement in 1851. The covenantor became bankrupt in 1852, and applied to the widow and executrix of the trustee to prove for the 3,000l., which she declined to do. Dividends of 11s. in the pound were declared in the bankruptcy, and new trustees of the settlement were appointed by the Court, whose proof was rejected as too late. The widow and executrix of the trustee died in 1865, and his sons entered into possession of his property as devisees and legatees under his will, but when cited to take out letters of administration to their father, they declined to do so.

Upon a bill filed on the 2nd of October, 1867, by the widow and children of the covenantor and the new trustees, against the sons and an administrator ad litem of the deceased trustee, in answer to which the sons admitted assets:—Held, first, that the sons having admitted assets, the administrator ad litem represented the deceased trustee sufficiently for the purposes of the suit.

Secondly, that the rights of the plaintiff were not barred by lapse of time, and that the sons were liable to make good the loss occasioned by the breach of trust to the extent of the assets of their father in their hands.

By the settlement, dated the 28th of December, 1816, and made in consideration of the marriage of J. T. Woodhouse and Clara Oppenheim, J. T. Woodhouse and his father jointly and severally covenanted with two trustees, of whom Joseph Woodhouse, a solicitor, was one, that they, or one of them, would within three years from the solemnization of the marriage pay to the trustees the sum of 3,000*l.*, with interest thereon at 5*l.* per cent., payable half-yearly. And it was thereby declared and agreed that the trustees should invest the said sum of 3,000*l.* when received, and stand possessed thereof, and of the securities for the same, upon trust, to pay the income thereof, and also the interest payable under the covenant to J. T. Woodhouse for life, and after his death to Clara Woodhouse for her separate use for life, and after the death of the survivor should stand possessed of the said trust fund, upon the ordinary trusts, in favour of the children of the marriage, with the usual powers of appointment by the parents. The settlement also contained a covenant by J. T. Woodhouse with the trustees that, in case the said sum of 3,000*l.* should not be paid to the trustees within the three years, he would secure the payment thereof, with interest, by a mortgage on certain hereditaments therein specified.

The marriage took place in May, 1817, and the settlement was duly executed by all parties.

The 3,000*l.* was not paid to the trustees nor secured by the mortgage either within the three years of the marriage nor after the expiration thereof; and the trustees never made any attempt to enforce either of the covenants.

In 1846, many years after his father's death, J. T. Woodhouse sold for 3,500*l.* the property which he had covenanted to mortgage as a security for the 3,000*l.* Joseph Woodhouse, one of the trustees, acted as solicitor to the purchaser upon the occasion of the sale, and the purchase-money was appropriated by J. T. Woodhouse to his own use.

Joseph Woodhouse survived his co-trustee, and died in 1848, having, by his will, devised his realty and bequeathed a portion of his personalty to his sons, Richard Woodhouse and Joseph Woodhouse, and having appointed his widow executrix.

In the month of December, 1851, the settlement came into the possession of Richard Woodhouse, to whom it was sent for safe custody.

In 1852, J. T. Woodhouse (the husband) became bankrupt, and he applied to the executrix of Joseph Woodhouse, the deceased trustee, to prove under the bankruptcy for 3,000*l.*, but she refused to do so, except upon receiving a release in full, and she also declined to concur in appointing new trustees of the settlements. Dividends amounting to 11*s.* in the pound having been declared under the bankruptcy, a petition was presented for the appointment of new trustees of the settlement. Before the hearing of the petition the executrix of Joseph Woodhouse died, and the sons entered into possession of the remainder of his property.

In February, 1865, an order was made on this petition, whereby William Daggs and Frederick James Hand were appointed trustees of the settlement with power to sue on the covenants, and they then tendered a proof under the bankruptcy for the 3,000*l.* and interest, which was rejected as not having been made within the proper time.

J. T. Woodhouse (the husband) died in April, 1866, and his widow and two children then applied to Richard and Joseph Woodhouse, the sons of the deceased trustee, to take out letters of administration with the will annexed of the estate of their father, of which they were in possession, left unadministered by his executrix. This they refused to do, and having been cited before the Court of Probate, and having failed to appear, by an order, dated the 16th of July, 1867, letters of administration of the unadministered estate of Joseph Woodhouse, limited to the purposes of this suit, were granted to Joseph Carpenter Woodhouse.

On the 2nd of October, 1867, the present bill was filed by the widow and children of J. T. Woodhouse against the two sons of the administrator of Joseph Woodhouse, for the purpose of having the loss sustained by the breach of trust committed by Joseph Woodhouse made good out of his assets. The bill prayed a declaration that the neglect or omission of Joseph Woodhouse to enforce the covenants as to the payment and securing of the 3,000*l.* was a breach of trust on his part, which his estate was liable to make good; for an account of what was due to the present trustees in respect of the trust funds and breaches of trust; that what should be found due might be declared a charge upon the real and personal estate come to the hands of the defendants; that the defendants (the sons) might be ordered to pay what should be so found due, and, if they should not admit assets for the purpose, for an account and administration of the real and personal estate of Joseph Woodhouse, and, if necessary, for an injunction and receiver.

The plaintiffs had previously effected a compromise with the representatives of Secretan, the trustee who predeceased Joseph Woodhouse; and the defendants (the sons) admitted assets of their father in their possession.

Mr. Greene and Mr. Babington, for the plaintiffs.—It was the duty of the trustees to have enforced both the covenants contained in the settlement; and so far from enforcing either of them, Joseph Woodhouse actually concurred in the sale of the lands, subject to the second covenant. It is clear that he committed a breach of trust; that breach of trust was repeated by his widow and executrix; and the rights of the cestuis que trust cannot be barred by the lapse of time. There is nothing approaching to acquiescence, and the defendants, the sons, are liable to make good the loss to the extent of the assets of their father in their hands. They cited Obee v. Bishop (1 De Gex, F. & J. 137 29 L. J. Ch. 148), and Brittlebank v. Goodwin (37 L. J. Ch. 377; L. R. 5 Eq. 545).

Mr. Dickinson and Mr. J. W. Chitty, for the defendants, the sons of Joseph Woodhouse.—First, there is not before the Court any sufficient legal personal representative of Joseph Woodhouse, the deceased trustee, and the plaintiffs shew no such privity between themselves and the defendants, for whom we appear, as to create an obligation on our part to make good the loss which the trust estate has sustained. Secondly, the claim of the plaintiffs is barred by lapse of time and laches. This is not the case of a demand against a defaulting trustee in his lifetime, but of administration of his estate and payment of his debts after his death, and in the latter case his debts, if specialty, are barred after twenty years,—if simple contract, after six years. Although Lord Justice Turner, in Obee v. Bishop, ubi supra, was of opinion that it would be dangerous to hold that a demand against the assets of a deceased trustee, in respect of a breach of trust committed by him, is barred at the expiration of six years from his death, an opposite view has been taken by the Court of Chancery in Ireland—Dunee v. Doran (13 Ir. Eq. Rep. 545), which was the unanimous judgment of the Court of Equity Exchequer in Ireland, and was followed by the Master of the Rolls in Brereton v. Hutchinson (2 Ir. Ch. Rep. 648), whose decision again was affirmed by the Lord Chancellor (3 Ir. Ch. Rep. 361), and the same view was taken in Newport v. Bryan (5 Ir. Ch. Rep. 119). In Brittlebank v. Goodwin, ubi supra, the Vice Chancellor Giffard merely said that he does not agree with the Irish authorities on this point. We claim, however, the benefit of laches, founded not merely on acquiescence, but also on the alteration in the state of the parties. The debt sought to be thrown on the defendants, who are innocent parties, is a debt of 20*s*. in the pound, whereas the sum which the plaintiffs would have recovered from the estate of the deceased trustee in his lifetime, had they used due diligence, would have been only 9*s*. in the pound. So that, even if lapse of time is not a bar to the plaintiffs, their laches is—Browne v. Cross (14 Beav. 105); Bright v. Legerton (29 Beav. 60; 29 L. J. Ch. 852: on appeal, 2 De Gex, F. & J. 606; 30 L. J. Ch. 338). Moreover, the breach of trust committed by Joseph Woodhouse was only in neglecting to sue, and was not a case of misappropriation, by which his assets have been swelled, so that, considering the great lapse of time and the conduct of the parties, to hold the defendants now liable would be a case of extreme hardship.

Thy also referred to The Life Association of Scotland v. Siddal (3 De Gex, F. & J. 58); Fowler v. Bayldon (9 Hare, Ap. 78).

Mr. Greene, in reply.

His Honour reserved judgment.

Stuart, V.C. (March 24).—It was the duty of the trustees of the settlement of 1816 to enforce both the covenants entered into with them. If the 3,000*l*. covenanted to be paid to them by James Thomas Woodhouse and Edward Woodhouse within three years was not paid, they were bound to enforce the covenant by James Thomas Woodhouse to secure that sum by mortgage on the estates mentioned in the deed. The duty of the trustees was neglected as to both covenants, and the concurrence of Joseph Woodhouse, the trustee, in 1846, in the sale of the lands subject to the covenant was as gross a breach of trust as could be committed. Even after that breach of trust the covenants were continuing obligations, with a continuing duty in Joseph Woodhouse, the surviving trustee, to enforce them. Joseph died in 1848, and his widow and executrix soon after his death, and also the devisees of his real estate, were all cognizant of the trust and of its breach. After the covenantor became bankrupt, in 1852, the executrix refused to prove under his bankruptcy for the debt on the covenants. The relief sought in this suit is not against her, for she died in 1865, but against her sons, who upon her death became entitled in possession to the real assets of their father, Joseph, the trustee, and also to part of his personal estate. They, being the defendants in this suit, are in the possession of the assets of the defaulting trustee. They had full notice of the breach of trust, if not in the life time of the trustee, certainly in 1851, when the settlement of 1816 came into the possession of one of them (Richard), and that was before the refusal of the executrix, his mother, to prove the debt on the covenant under the bankruptcy. Upon the death of the executrix, in 1865, they declined to constitute themselves legal personal representatives of their father, the trustee.

There are two grounds on which they resist the right to relief in this suit. First, they say that there is no sufficient legal personal represenative of the defaulting trustee, of whose assets they admit they have obtained possession. But there is before the Court the person to whom letters of administration have been granted limited to the purposes of this suit. This defendant, who is thus appointed administrator ad litem on their refusal, is clearly a sufficient representative for the purposes of this suit, as they themselves are in possession of the assets which are claimed by the plaintiffs as liable to make good the breach of trust.

The other ground of defence is length of time. It was in 1866 that the tenant for life died and that the plaintiffs became entitled in possession. The tenant for life was himself the covenantor, who, with the concurrence of the trustee, in 1846, sold the estate which was subject to the covenant. It can make nothing against the rights of the plaintiffs, who are cestuis que trust in the covenant, that they might have called upon the trustee in 1846 to enforce it, or might have filed a bill against him then, for there is no suggestion of acquiescence. On the contrary, in 1852, the widow and executrix of the defaulting trustee was called upon to prove under the bankruptcy of the covenantor and refused. She held the assets of her husband with full knowledge of the breach of trust, and the statement in the answer of the defendants her sons shews that they too, at that time and since 1851, had notice of the breach of trust by their father. Her duty as executrix of the surviving trustee was to enforce the covenant, and her refusal was a double breach of trust by her. It appears that if she had proved, a considerable dividend would have been obtained, and the liability which clearly attached to her husband's assets in her hands would have been pro tanto relieved. At her death, in 1865, the assets liable to make good the breach of trust (which she had possessed since 1848) passed into the hands of the defendants her sons, who had, not only then but from 1851, full notice of the trust. It seems, therefore, impossible for the defendants, who now possess the assets, to fix upon any date when the right of the plaintiffs was barred by length of time.

It has been argued that the defendants, although in possession of the assets with notice of the breach of trust, are not liable because there is no privity between them and the plaintiffs, and no duty or obligation by them to the plaintiffs. But having notice of the trusts so long ago, and of the breach of trust, they cannot be allowed to say that the assets in their hands are not liable to the plaintiffs' claims. Their defence is rather prejudiced than assisted by their refusal upon citation to take out the letters of administration. The decree will therefore be, that Joseph Woodhouse, the trustee, by not enforcing payment, committed a breach of trust; and that the defendants, having admitted that they have assets of his in their possession, are, to the extent of those assets, liable to make good the 3,000*l*., with interest at 5*l*. per cent. from the 14th of April, 1866, the day of the death of the tenant for life.

Company—Winding-up—Successful Action against Company in Liquidation —Recovery of Costs in full by Plaintiffs from the Company.

COMPANY.—As regards the question of costs there is no difference in principle between the prosecution by a company in liquidation of an action which proves fruitless and the unsuccessful defence by the company of an action brought against them. Accordingly, where the plaintiffs in an action for breach of contract, brought against a company in liquidation by leave of the Court, were successful in obtaining damages against the company, they were allowed their costs of the action in full upon the authority of Mackrill Smith's case (37 L. J. Ch. 185; L. R. 3 Ch. 125).

This was an application to the Court upon an adjourned summons, taken out on behalf of Messrs. Bailey & Leetham, of Kingston-upon-Hull, shipowners, that the official liquidators of the above company might be ordered to pay to the applicants a dividend in respect of an amount awarded to them in an action brought against the company in liquidation in pursuance of an order of the Court, and also to pay to them in full the amount of the taxed costs of the said action, and their costs of proving their claim in the above matter.

By an order of Vice Chancellor Wood, made in the above matter, and dated the 7th of December, 1867, upon a summons taken out by the official liquidators, it was ordered that William Bailey and William Leetham be at liberty to bring an action at law against the company in respect of the non-delivery of two vessels, called the "Lincolnshire" and "Yorkshire." In pursuance of this order Messrs. Bailey & Leetham brought an action in the Court of Exchequer against the company, which the official liquidator obtained leave to defend. In this action the jury, by consent of the parties, found a verdict for the plaintiffs for 11,000*l.*, the amount of their claim, subject to this sum being reduced by the award of an arbitrator, to whom the amount was referred. The arbitrator, by his award, dated the 7th of December, 1868, awarded that the verdict for the plaintiffs do stand, but that the damages be reduced to 6,083*l.* The plaintiffs' costs of the action and reference were taxed at the sum of 516*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*, and judgment was signed by them for these two sums. The claimants, Messrs. Bailey & Leetham, now asked to have a dividend paid to them upon the 6,083*l.*, the amount of their damages, and to be paid in full the 516*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*, the amount of their costs at law, and also their costs of the proceedings in Chancery.

Mr. Little and Mr. Macnaghten supported the application.—If the company had been plaintiffs in an action which had failed, the applicants, as defendants in such action, would have been entitled to be paid their costs in full—In re the Bank of Hindustan, China and Japan; Mackrill Smith's case (37 L. J. Ch. 185; L. R. 3 Ch. 125). In this case the applicants were the plaintiffs in the action at law, but they had been driven to their action by the company. The result of the action in the defendants' favour, shewed that the resistance of the applicants' claim by the company was improper.

JAMES, V.C., said, it seemed to him that the same principle would apply to both cases, and he called upon

Mr. Kay and Mr. J. N. Higgins, for the official liquidator.—They argued that the case was analogous to that of a claim in an administration suit for a debt and costs, where the practice was to add the costs to the debt, and to pay a dividend on the aggregate sum if the estate were not enough to pay the whole amount. In suits of that kind the rule was that the claimant could not recover his costs in full where he could only recover a part of his debt, and in a case of this sort the same rule must prevail.—They referred to Morshead v. Reynolds (21 Beav. 638); Ship's case (13 W. R. 1016); 1 Griffiths on Bankruptcy, 589; The Companies' Act, 1862, ss. 95, 158, 163; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. (The Bankruptcy Act, 1849), s. 181; Rule 27. of General Order, November, 1862, under the Companies' Act, 1862 (32 L. J. Ch. p. iv.); Rule 24. of Consolidated General Orders XL.

[JAMES, V.C., referred to Clinch v. the Financial Corporation (38 L. J. Ch. 1; L. R. 4 Ch. 117.]

The action had been brought by leave of the Court under the 87th section of the Companies' Act, and no terms had been imposed upon the plaintiffs—In re the Exhall Mining Company (33 L. J. Ch. 595).

Mr. Little said, they asked costs of this and the other adjournment into Court, as well as of the action.

JAMES, V.C., said, that in this case the authority of Lord Cairns, L.J., in Mackrill Smith's case led him to the same decision as he would have come to if he had been deciding the case merely upon the unvarying rule of right, viz., that these costs ought to be paid to the claimant. Upon general principles, unless the Court was bound by some express enactment or order to the contrary, a company in winding up ought to be dealt with as a matter of course like any other litigant, and if an action were brought or resisted for the benefit of the estate, and that action were brought fruitlessly, or defended fruitlessly, then the estate, that is to say, the other creditors of the company, ought, like everybody else, to be fixed with the costs to which they had improperly and unnecessarily put their opponent.

The result of the action in this case, to his Honour's mind, shewed that it had been improperly resisted on behalf of the assets; and if so, he thought the assets ought to pay the costs of that improper resistance. There might have been, perhaps, some doubt upon the words of the order; but he rested upon the authority of the Lord Justice in Smith's case, who did exactly the same thing when he allowed the costs of a fruitless action brought by the liquidator to be paid in full out of the assets of the company. As he understood that decision, Lord Cairns made the company pay in full the costs of the application to the Court below and to the Court of Appeal. That being so, he conceived that this plaintiff was entitled to receive this 516*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*, being the costs of the action for which the plaintiff had recovered judgment against the company, exactly in the same way as Smith received the 123*l.* in the case before Lord Cairns. There could be no distinction in principle between the costs of an action which failed and the costs of an action which had been unsuccessfully defended.

That disposed of the 516*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.* Then the other costs, as he understood, were not the ordinary costs of proving a claim, which were governed by the general orders, but the costs of an application extra the claim, that was to say, the costs of the application for leave to bring the action. The order would be, that the costs of the action, of the former application to the Court for leave to bring the action, and of the present application be allowed in full. The other costs to be taxed and added to the debt. The official liquidator to have his costs out of the estate.

DEAR v. VERITY.

38 L. J. Ch. 486; 21 L. T. 185; 17 W. R. 716: affirming, [1869] E. R. A. 310; 38 L. J. Ch. 297; 20 L. T. 268; 17 W. R. 567 (V.C.).

Written Agreement to grant a Lease—Parol Variation of the Contract—Uncertainty—Specific Performance.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.—An agreement to grant a lease of a house was contained in three letters, which specified the term and the amount of rent, and stipulated that the intended lessee (the plaintiff) was to do all repairs, painting, decorating, &c. The intended lessor (the defendant) refused to grant a lease on the footing of the agreement, on the ground that the plaintiff had at the time of entering into the agreement also verbally undertaken to expend 1,000*l. on the premises in a particular manner, and to allow covenants to compel him to do so to be inserted in the lease; that the plaintiff had not performed that part of his agreement, and had objected to such covenants; and further that the agreement as contained in the letters was too uncertain for the Court to enforce:*— Held, on a bill filed for specific performance of the agreement as contained in the letters, that the alleged parol collateral agreement was not substantiated by the evidence, and that there was no ground for saying that the terms of the letters were uncertain, and therefore that the plaintiff was entitled to a decree with costs.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a decree of Stuart, V.C., for specific performance of an agreement to grant a lease of a certain house called Vale Lodge.

The case is reported 38 L. J. Ch. p. 297, where the facts, evidence and documents in the case, and the judgment of the Vice Chancellor, are set out at length.

Mr. E. K. Karslake and Mr. Rowcliffe, for the appellant, contended, (1) that the evidence proved that the expenditure by the plaintiff of the 1,000*l.* on the premises was either a condition precedent to granting the lease or an essential part of the agreement; and, (2) that the terms of the so-called agreement, with reference especially to the words "I agree to do all repairs, painting, papering, decorating, &c.," were too uncertain for the Court to enforce.—They relied on Taylor v. Portington (7 De Gex, M. & G. 328).

Mr. Greene and Mr. Cottrell, for the respondent, were not called upon.

SELWYN, L.J. said that, without being at all prepared to extend that which the late Lord Justice Knight Bruce called the boundary line which divided negotiation from contract in such a manner as to convert letters written for the purposes of negotiation into a concluded contract, he could in this case have no doubt whatever that on the 27th of September, 1865, both the plaintiff and defendant intended to enter into, and did in fact enter into, a concluded agreement. That being so, the real and substantial question for decision was, whether the collateral parol agreement as alleged by the defendant was established in evidence or not; because if it were established it was perfectly clear upon all the authorities that the plaintiff had no ground for coming to this Court and asking for specific performance. On the other hand, if it were not established, then, in his Lordship's opinion, there was no uncertainty at all in the contract as contained in the letters, and the plaintiff was entitled to a decree. His Lordship, on a careful examination of the evidence, could come to no other conclusion than that this question of fact must be decided in favour of the plaintiff. The appeal, therefore, failed, and must be dismissed with costs.

GIFFARD, L.J. said that the defence in this case had been put upon two grounds: the one, that the letters, if they contained an agreement, were too uncertain for this Court to decree performance of it; the other, that the collateral parol agreement as alleged by the defendant had in substance been proved. With regard to the uncertainty, the case of Taylor v. Portington had been relied on; but in his Lordship's judgment Taylor v. Portington was different in principle from this case. That was a case where a lessor agreed as a condition precedent to granting a lease to do repairs and decorations. Here there was no condition precedent at all, but the condition was that the lease should contain covenants, and that in his Lordship's judgment at once made a distinction which put Taylor v. Portington entirely out of the case; and this was no more than the ordinary case of a man agreeing to grant a lease, the lessee undertaking to farm in a particular manner. The Court probably could not see that the farm was carried on in a particular manner, but it would not on that account say that a lease should not be granted. His Lordship was, therefore, clearly of opinion that he need not consider Taylor v. Portington, and that there was no ground for saying that the terms of the letters were uncertain. Then, with regard to the facts of the case, his Lordship was of opinion that the defendant's statement of his case could not be looked upon as accurate, and that the defendant had entirely failed in proving that the transaction was such as it was represented to be by him in his answer. That being so, his Lordship was satisfied that, if in any case specific performance ought to be enforced in equity, unquestionably this was that case. The appeal, therefore, must be dismissed, with costs.

PARTITION.—In a partition suit the Court may, under the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 40, direct a sale of part of the property and a partition of the remainder.

In a partition suit there was evidence that it would be for the benefit of the parties that part of the property should be sold and the remainder retained.

Mr. Wickens, for the plaintiff, submitted the question whether, under the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 40, the Court had power to direct a sale of part of the property and a partition of the remainder.

Mr. Davey appeared for the defendants.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS held that the Court had jurisdiction, and made the order accordingly.

Practice—Petition of Appeal—Certificate of a Single Counsel.

The rule which requires the signatures of two counsel to a petition of appeal will not be dispensed with, except on proof of the existence of exceptional circumstances in the case; and the fact that only one counsel appeared for the intending appellant in the court of first instance is not such an exceptional circumstance.

This was an application for leave to present a petition of appeal from a decision of Malins, V.C., signed by only one counsel. The application was founded on the circumstance that the applicant had been represented by only one counsel on the hearing before the Vice Chancellor.

In proof that a certificate signed by a single counsel was sometimes allowed by the Court,—

Mr. E. C. Willis, who appeared in support of the application, cited Knowles v. Greenhill (30 L. J. Ch. 670); In re the Midland Counties Benefit Building Society (12 W. R. 993).

LORD JUSTICE SELWYN was of opinion that the application must be refused. Where such an application had been complied with, it had been on account of the smallness of the fund which was the subject of the litigation, or of the poverty of the parties. But no such exceptional circumstances had been shewn to exist in the present case.

LORD JUSTICE GIFFARD concurred (see Re Skeggs, 11 Jur. N.S. 274; 13 W. R. 512).

Protestant Dissenters — Endowment — Trustee and Cestui que Trust — Minister, Appointment of—Power of the Majority of the Trustees and of the Congregation to Remove—Injunction.

CHARITY.—A congregation of Protestant dissenters was endowed, by deeds vesting in the trustees of the society freehold and leasehold hereditaments and premises upon certain trusts for its benefit. The deeds contained (inter alia) a trust "to permit and suffer the minister or pastor for the time being of the congregation to have the use or occupation of a house," or "to pay the rents and profits thereof to such minister or pastor, as the same should become due and payable, for so long a time as such minister or pastor should from time to time be and continue minister or pastor of the society or congregation, and officiate as such, and no longer, to and for his and their own use and benefit." Neither the deeds nor the rules and regulations of the society contained any provision as to the mode of ascertaining the will of the congregation upon the dismissal of a minister or pastor; and the only specific grounds stated for his removal were either immorality or heterodoxy. The defendant, the Rev. S. C. G., was unanimously elected by the congregation one of their co-pastors. Some time after his election the congregation became dissatisfied with the mode in which he discharged his duties, and dissensions ensued. Ultimately a meeting of the congregation was held, and a resolution passed by a majority of the members present at it, that the Rev. S. C. G. should be dismissed. No special ground was assigned for his dismissal. He questioned the legality of the meeting, and denied the power of the majority of the congregation or of those present at the meeting to remove him, except for immorality or heterodoxy, neither of which was imputed to him. He further claimed the right to hold his office of co-pastor and to officiate as such and take the emoluments of the office for his life. The majority of the trustees then filed a bill to have it declared that he was properly dismissed from his office, and for an injunction to restrain him from interfering with the property and the services in the chapel of the congregation:—Held, that the defendant, the Rev. S. C. G., was not entitled to preach or officiate in the chapel of the society against the will of the majority of the trustees and of the congregation; that he must be restrained from so doing and in other respects, as prayed by the bill; and that he must pay the plaintiffs their costs of the suit.

The plaintiffs in this suit were all the trustees (but one) of a congregation [1] of Protestant dissenters from the Church of England, called Independents or Congregationalists, assembling for religious worship at the Presbyterian meeting-house or chapel, Broad Street, Reading.

The defendants were the Rev. Samuel Clarke Gordon, one of the co-pastors of the congregation; Mr. George Christie, the remaining trustee of it; and a Mr. James Pike.

The bill in the suit prayed that it might be declared that the defendant the Rev. S. C. Gordon had been duly dismissed from and ceased, as from the 8th of September, 1868, to hold the office of co-pastor with the Rev. William Legg, or any office of pastor of the said congregation of Independents at Broad Street Chapel aforesaid; and that all (if any) necessary inquiries might be made, and directions given for the purpose of such directions and for effectuating the same; that the defendant the Rev. S. C. Gordon might be restrained by the order and injunction of this Court from preaching or officiating in the chapel and from in any manner disturbing or interfering with the performance of divine worship therein, and from acting or attempting to act as such co-pastor or pastor as aforesaid, or otherwise in any manner intermeddling or interfering with the trust premises of the congregation; that the defendants, the Rev. S. C. Gordon and Mr. James Pike, their attorneys and agents, might be respectively restrained in manner aforesaid from receiving or collecting, or continuing or attempting to receive or collect any of the rents payable for pews or sittings in the chapel; and that the said last-named defendants might respectively account for the moneys received or collected by or on behalf of them, or either of them, in respect of such rents; and that they or the defendant the Rev. S. C. Gordon might pay the costs of the suit.

By indentures of lease and release, dated respectively the 1st and 2nd of December, 1707, and the 29th and 30th of December, 1707, the meeting-house of the congregation was vested absolutely in twenty members of it.

By a deed-poll, dated the 11th of March, 1708, it was declared that the "said edifice, building and premises" (the meeting-house) were purchased in the names of those members in trust, and that their names were used in trust, for a certain private church or congregation of Christians, whereof Samuel Doolittle was then bishop or pastor, usually meeting and congregating for religious worship in the said meeting-house, and that the said premises and the property thereof should be to and for the use and behoof of and in trust for the said private church or congregation, from time to time and at all times thereafter, during such time as the assembling of Protestant dissenters for religious worship should be permitted by law at the said meeting-house; and provision was thereby made for the assurance of the premises to new together with the old trustees, as and in the events therein mentioned.

By an indenture of bargain and sale, enrolled and dated the 30th of November, 1808, certain freehold and leasehold premises therein particularly described, and comprising a new chapel or meeting-house in Broad Street, and the burying-ground, yard, passage and vestry-room thereunto belonging, and the ground and soil of the same, or so much thereof as was comprised in the indentures of the 1st and 2nd of December, 1707, and the 29th and 30th of December, 1707, were vested in the then trustees of the congregation, upon trust for the use and benefit of the society or congregation of Protestant dissenters from the Church of England then belonging thereto, commonly called Independents, and which should from time to time resort to and frequent the said meeting-house and premises, and become members of the society, for the exercise of divine worship therein, and peaceably and quietly to permit and suffer them, and every of them, freely to exercise their religion therein, and freely to enter and bury their dead therein, or in some part or parts thereof, under and subject to such orders, rules, regulations and restrictions as had been and were or should be made and observed in the said society or other religious institutions of the like nature. And as to a certain messuage or tenement and workhouse (part of the said premises) in the occupation of Robert Dear, and the rooms over the same, "upon trust to permit and suffer the minister or pastor for the time being of the said society or congregation of Protestant dissenters called Independents, who did or should from time to time meet in the said meeting-house for the exercise of divine worship as aforesaid, to have the use and occupation of the same, or otherwise to receive and pay the rents and profits thereof unto such minister or pastor as the same should become due and payable for so long a time as such minister or pastor should from time to time be and continue minister or pastor of the said society or congregation and officiate as such, and no longer, to and for his and their own use and benefit." That deed then provided as to and concerning all the freehold and leasehold hereditaments thereby assured, that the same and every part thereof should be conveyed unto so many other fit persons who had been subscribers and contributed to the support of public worship at the meeting-house for twelve months then next preceding as they, the trustees, or any new or other trustees, to be chosen as thereinafter mentioned, or the survivors or survivor of them, his heirs or assigns, should choose, nominate and appoint, upon the same trusts as therein declared. And it was further provided, that in case the society or congregation should be totally dissolved, separated or dispersed, and the public worship at the meeting-house should be discontinued for twelve months together, then the trustees should release and convey the aforesaid freehold and leasehold hereditaments and premises unto and to the use of such person or persons, and in such manner, and to and for such intents and purposes, either religious or civil, as the trustees or the survivors or survivor of them, or the major part of them for the time being, by any deed duly executed, should direct or appoint.

(1) The term "congregation" was used by the plaintiffs in their bill as denoting only the assembly of persons for the time being in church membership, exclusive of mere seat-holders or attendants.

The deed then provided for the appointment of new trustees whenever they should be only eleven or less in number; for continuing the full number, if possible, at twenty; and for renewing the leasehold premises thereby assigned.

Under or by virtue of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 28, an act to render more simple and effectual the titles by which congregations or societies for purposes of religious worship or education in England or Ireland hold property for such purposes, and by an indenture, dated the 14th of March, 1855, the plaintiffs and the defendant George Christie became the sole trustees of the chapel and premises, and the entire legal estate therein was vested in them.

In the year 1865, it was considered desirable, by the members of the congregation assembling at the chapel, that the Rev. William Legg, who had for more than twenty years then last past officiated as their sole pastor, should have some assistance in his duties; and that another minister should be appointed to assist and act with him; and during that and the ensuing year candidates for the co-pastorate were invited to preach in the chapel. The Rev. S. C. Gordon was one of such candidates, and preached in the chapel in the spring of 1866. He subsequently received a letter from Mr. Legg, inviting him to preach again in the chapel, on Sunday the 1st and Sunday the 8th of April, 1866. On the 11th of April he received from Thomas Barcham, then the acting deacon of the chapel, a letter, which was as follows:

"From all I hear from all parties, it is the earnest desire of the Church to invite you to the co-pastorship; therefore, I trust, if you in any way reciprocate this feeling, you will kindly hold yourself open."

In reply to that letter the Rev. S. C. Gordon wrote thus:

"My dear Mr. Barcham,—I had your note this morning, for which I beg to thank you. In it you mention that it is the desire of the Church in Broad Street to invite me as a co-pastor and successor to Mr. Legg. Of course it would be premature to say what answer I should give were a unanimous invitation given me; but at the same time I would say that I was greatly pleased with my visit to Reading; and that the sphere of labour there is one which commends itself to me, on many grounds. A charge,—where the sole duties would not immediately devolve on me, and I should enjoy the counsel and mature experience of an aged colleague, in becoming acquainted with the practical working of a Church, while at the same time scope would be afforded for efforts of Christian usefulness,—presents, I think, peculiar attractions. At present I have no engagement to fulfil with any Church; and until I hear from you I shall enter upon none.—Yours sincerely,

"Samuel Gordon."

On the 18th of April, 1866, a meeting of the congregation assembling at the chapel was held, at which a resolution was passed, as follows:

"Broad Street Chapel, Reading,
"Church Meeting, April 18th, 1866.

"Moved by Mr. John Cooper,
"Seconded by Mr. Barcham,
"And carried unanimously,—

"The Church of Christ at Broad Street Chapel, Reading, having on several occasions heard with considerable satisfaction Mr. Samuel Clarke Gordon, of the Lancashire Independent College, Manchester, and believing him to be in every way qualified and suitable, Does now most cordially invite him to become co-pastor with their present esteemed minister, the Rev. William Legg."

A copy of that resolution was forwarded by Mr. Barcham to Mr. Gordon.

On the 23rd of April, 1866, Mr. Gordon wrote to Mr. Legg to ascertain what duties he would be expected to perform, and what would be his position as co-pastor. On the 25th of April Mr. Legg wrote to Mr. Gordon as follows:

"Reading, April 25th, 1866.

"My dear Sir,—The case of our co-operation is very simple. We would equally divide the pulpit labours and the week-night services. The junior to take the Bible Classes—of which at present there are two: a young men's and a servants'. I think the former was held by Mr. Mossop once a week, and I know that the latter is once a fortnight. Of course you would arrange these according to your own views and convenience, or add to them, if you should see fit. We at present would equally divide the income—which is about 300*l.*, and it has at times been 20*l.* more. It is capable of some increase, if your ministry should prove eminently successful, as I hope it would—not that there are any number of pews, or rather sittings, to let—but some would have their value enhanced. There would be no friction in our working. There is no idea that your connexion with the Church would be affected by the continuance of my life; that is, you are not asked to be an assistant minister, but as much a pastor as myself.—I am, yours very truly,

"W. Legg.

"Rev. Mr. Gordon."

On the 30th of April, Mr. Gordon sent to Mr. Thomas Barcham a letter, addressed to the Church worshipping in Broad Street Chapel, Reading, accepting the invitation. That letter was, partly, as follows:

"Being unwilling to keep you any longer in suspense upon the important subject of my settlement at Reading as one of your pastors, I have decided to reply, without further delay."

On the 2nd of May, 1866, Mr. Thomas Barcham wrote to Mr. Gordon as follows:

"I write a hasty line to say that the reception of your welcome letter gives us all pleasure. I have now sent it to Mr. Legg, who will on Friday night read it at our Church meeting."

That was accordingly done; and Mr. Gordon entered on his duties as co-pastor on the last Sunday in July, 1866; and was ordained as minister of the chapel on the 5th of September following.

Some time after the appointment of Mr. Gordon, as such co-pastor as aforesaid, a feeling of dissatisfaction at the mode in which he discharged his ministerial duties arose in the congregation assembling at the chapel. Mr. Barcham, the acting deacon, remonstrated with him for reading his sermons; and he and Mr. Quelch, another of the deacons of the congregation, afterwards requested Mr. Gordon to resign his office. Mr. Gordon was then told that that request was made to him for the eight following reasons, which had been shortly before read to him by Mr. Barcham:

"1st. That Mr. Gordon's sermons were too argumentative, containing trains of reasoning which the people could not carry away with them.

"2nd. That the sermons were above the level of the great mass of the people, not being sufficiently simple.

"3rd. That they were too Armenian in doctrine.

"4th. That they set up too high a standard of Christian life, not taking sufficient account of the influence of trials, &c.

"5th. That there was a deficiency of unction, gospel power, and Christian experience.

"6th. That the motives from which Christians were exhorted to act were not those of Christian love, but of dry, rigid duty.

"7th. That the work of the Spirit was not sufficiently dwelt upon.

"8th. That in some of the sermons there was nothing said to unconverted sinners."

It did not appear that those reasons, although so communicated to Mr. Gordon, were ever formally embodied in any resolution of the society, or otherwise conveyed on behalf of the congregation to him. He however declined to accede to the request made to him. Mr. Barcham and Mr. Quelch then relinquished the office of deacon respectively held by them; and the other acting deacons also and the treasurer of the society soon after resigned.

As the want of harmony between Mr. Gordon and the congregation and between him and Mr. Legg continued, the feelings of dissatisfaction and unpleasantness on all sides increased. Some of the congregation left the Broad Street Chapel and assembled for worship in the Town Hall of Reading. The society was in fact divided. However, at the regular monthly church meeting of the congregation, held at the chapel, on the 3rd of July, 1868, Mr. Gordon appointed Mr. James Pike and three other persons to act as his committee to look after his interests. They were so appointed because the offices of deacons and treasurer to the congregation were then vacant.

Mr. Gordon had never been in the occupation of the house mentioned in the deed of the 30th of November, 1808; and the intention was that Mr. Pike should receive subscriptions for Mr. Gordon; the deacons, as it was alleged, having refused to pay him his moiety of the moneys which they had received.

On the 4th of September, 1868, at the ordinary church meeting of the congregation for that month, a resolution was passed, appointing another meeting for the following Tuesday, the 8th of September.

On the 7th of September Mr. Gordon received notice that a Mr. Charles Smith would, at the meeting on that day, propose a resolution that Mr. Gordon should be dismissed from his office.

Mr. Gordon then instructed his solicitor to write, and he forthwith wrote, to Mr. Legg, protesting against the proposed meeting, and insisting that it had no power or authority to take into consideration Mr. Gordon's dismissal, nor to alter, control or otherwise deal with that gentleman's appointment as co-pastor, and alleging that any such meeting or proceeding would be illegal, irregular, unjust and improper.

The meeting was however held, on the 8th of September. It was convened, as the plaintiffs alleged, in accordance with the constant usage and practice of the society adopted in summoning and holding such meetings. A resolution of the church members present at the meeting, [such members constituting a majority of the church and congregation,] was duly proposed and carried by 115 votes. Only one person present remained neutral, and there was no opposition to the resolution.

By that resolution Mr. Gordon was dismissed from his office of minister or co-pastor of the congregation.

A further resolution was then forthwith passed confirming that for the dismissal of Mr. Gordon, and authorizing and requiring the plaintiffs, as such trustees as aforesaid, to take the necessary steps to carry into effect the church vote of dismissal.

On the same 8th of September Mr. Gordon convened a meeting of his friends, but at a different place from that at which the church meeting had been held, and obtained from them resolutions in his favour. He, moreover, on the same day, received a memorial, signed by 174 persons,—many of whom were members of the congregation, and all of whom were regular attendants at the services held in the chapel—expressing their sympathy with him; that they considered the motion for his dismissal to be illegal, unjust and in direct contravention of the principles of congregationalism, and pledging themselves to continue their support to him.

On the 9th of September Mr. Gordon received from Mr. Legg the following notice:—

"To the Church assembling at Broad Street Chapel, Reading.

"In consequence of the vote at which the Church has arrived, I hereby revoke my consent to the co-pastorate hitherto held with me by the Rev. Samuel Clarke Gordon.

(Signed) "William Legg, Pastor."

"Reading, dated this 8th day of September, 1868."

On the 11th of September the plaintiffs, as such trustees as aforesaid, duly served upon Mr. Gordon a notice not again to officiate or attempt to officiate as co-pastor of the church or congregation.

Mr. Gordon had, since his receipt of the last-mentioned notice from the plaintiffs, and in contravention thereof, preached in the chapel and otherwise officiated as co-pastor in conjunction with Mr. Legg. He also threatened and intended to continue so to do, and to insist upon his right to the moiety of the pew rents.

The bill in the suit set forth several matters constituting the principal ones in dispute between the parties, to which, however, it is not now necessary more particularly to refer, and stated, that Mr. Gordon continued to promote dissension in the church and congregation; that his conduct had been very injurious to and brought scandal upon the church and congregation for whom the plaintiffs were such trustees as aforesaid, and had already diminished, and would if permitted to continue, very greatly diminish the revenues arising from the pew-rents of the chapel. It was further stated that the members of the congregation were unwilling to subscribe a sum of 400*l*.,—which was required to purchase the reversion, which had fallen in, of a portion of the leasehold premises of the society, and without which purchase being effected the services of the chapel were liable at any moment to be discontinued,—until Mr. Gordon was effectually prevented from acting as pastor of the congregation.

Neither the deeds, nor the orders, rules and regulations of the society contained any provisions as to the mode of ascertaining the will of the congregation on the subject of dismissing a minister or pastor of it.

The plaintiffs therefore adduced evidence to prove that dissenters of the denomination in question universally recognized and held as fundamental principles that each congregation of persons in church fellowship assembling at a particular chapel or place of worship, with their pastor, constituted a church complete in itself, and in its government, independently of all other congregations, although composed of persons professing the same religious belief; and that (in the absence of any special usage, rules or agreement to the contrary) the power of electing and dismissing their pastor or minister, or pastors or ministers, resided entirely with such body of church members for the time being assembling at the chapel or place of worship; so that it was well known amongst, and was the established usage of such dissenters as aforesaid (save in such exceptional cases as aforesaid) that each such congregation as aforesaid might at any time, at their discretion, dismiss their pastor or pastors from his or their office; and in the absence of any special usage or rules, the will of every such congregation was in all cases ascertained, and their aforesaid powers exercised by the vote of a majority of the members; and the minority were bound by the decision of the majority, unless the same should be inconsistent with the fundamental doctrines and principles held by the whole body. The mere seat-holders, or attendants at public worship who were not in communion with the church, were not considered to be in church fellowship, and were not entitled to vote in respect of church matters, although occasionally their wishes were consulted. The congregations assembling in the meeting-house aforesaid, and the chapel subsequently erected as hereinafter appears, had always consisted of dissenters of the above-mentioned denomination, and had held and acted upon such principles as aforesaid. No special rules or usage had at any time been recognized or adopted by the congregation assembling at the chapel or at the meeting-house aforesaid, either as to the election or dismissal of the pastors, or as to the mode of ascertaining the decision of the congregation, and the constant practice had been, that whenever such decision was required, it was obtained at a meeting convened for the purpose, by a vote of the majority of the members of the congregation, as the case might be, present at such meeting.

The defendant Mr. Gordon by his answer, admitted the accuracy of those allegations, except as to the following matters. He denied that (in the absence of any special usage, rules or agreements to the contrary) a power of dismissing their pastor or minister, pastors or ministers, resided in any way with such body of church members for the time being assembling at the chapel or place of worship (save as thereinafter mentioned), and he denied that it was well known amongst or the established usage of such dissenters as aforesaid, or the usage of any such dissenters as aforesaid (save in such exceptional cases as aforesaid) that each such congregation[2] as aforesaid might at any time, at their discretion or otherwise (save as thereinafter mentioned), dismiss their pastor or pastors from his or their office. He stated that it was, on the contrary, a fundamental principle among dissenters of the above denomination that (in the absence of special usage, rule or agreement on the subject) all appointments as pastor or minister or co-pastor to a congregation or meeting-house, were for life, so long as the person so appointed should abstain from preaching doctrines at variance with the tenets of such denomination, and should not be guilty of immorality or other similar gross misconduct; and that in except in such cases as last aforesaid there did not exist in any person or persons or body a power to dismiss such pastor or minister or co-pastor from such post.

Mr. Gordon, by his answer, further stated that so long as he had been acquainted with the congregation assembling at the chapel in Broad Street, and as he believed always, it had been customary to hold monthly meetings, whereof notice was given during public worship on the Sunday next preceding each such meeting; and that it had been customary to allow all persons worshipping at the chapel, who had been present at and partaken of the ordinance of the Lord's Supper at the chapel within three months of such meetings respectively to be present thereat, and to vote upon any question properly submitted thereto; but no other person or persons were, or as he believed ever had been, entitled to be present or to vote at such meetings. So long as he had been acquainted with such congregation, and as he believed always, it had been the custom to give a month's notice of motion previously to the same being brought under the consideration of any such meeting; and the powers of such congregation had been exercised by the vote of such meetings conducted in manner aforesaid, and in no other manner whatsoever. He denied that the congregation had held and acted on the alleged principles of church government, except in so far as they were admitted by his answer to have done so. He said that it appeared from the records in the chapel, and he believed that since the foundation of the congregation, more than two centuries ago, no case had ever occurred of a pastor or minister thereof having been dismissed or removed by the congregation or any other authority, although instances had occurred of the congregation being desirous of doing so. In particular, in the year 1845, they wished to remove his co-pastor, Mr. Legg; but the congregation found there was no precedent or authority for such dismissal, except for the reasons aforesaid. He admitted that, save as therein otherwise stated, no special rules or usage had at any time been recognized or adopted by the congregation assembling at the chapel or at the meeting-house aforesaid as to the mode of ascertaining the decision of the congregation; but he said the constant practice, whenever such decision had been required, had been to obtain it at a meeting convened and conducted in the manner stated in his answer. He also stated, with reference to the meetings of the 4th of September and the 8th of September, 1868, that—although he did not attend them—he had been informed and believed that many persons attended and voted thereat who were not entitled to be present or to vote. He further said, that from a printed history of the chapel written by or by the authority of Mr. Legg, and from the records of the chapel, and as he had been informed and believed, on several occasions during the last two centuries co-pastors had been appointed to officiate in the chapel, and that in every instance the survivor of such co-pastor had, upon the death of his colleague, succeeded to him, and become the sole pastor, without further election or invitation. He also contended that his tenure of the office in no way depended on the consent or approval of Mr. Legg. He lastly submitted that the congregation was not adequately represented in the suit, and that Mr. Legg ought to have been made a party to it.

The bill in the suit was filed on the 15th of October, and the answers on the 26th and the 28th of November, 1868. On the 30th of November a church meeting of the congregation was held at the chapel, at which the previous resolutions and proceedings were discussed, but nothing was said or done to affect them. A notice of motion was given for an injunction according to the prayer of the bill; but it was afterwards arranged that it should stand over, to be treated as coming on with the hearing of the cause.

Mr. Hardy and Mr. J. Napier Higgins, for the plaintiffs.—The question in the cause was, whether the majority of the congregation, who had a clear right to elect a minister, had also a right to dismiss him. As the deeds and rules of this society were silent on the point, and there was no express agreement between the parties as to the time for which Mr. Gordon was to hold his office, the usage and practice of such bodies as these, and of this one in particular, must be considered. The congregation made no imputation of any kind upon Mr. Gordon, either as to his doctrines or moral conduct. It was plain, however, that if a minister or pastor and his congregation could not agree, it was for the benefit of all parties that they should separate. But if the minister would not depart peaceably, it was as evidently necessary that the congregation should have the power of dismissing him. By whom then, if not by the majority of those who had elected him, was he to be removed? The evidence proved that in all the transactions of the congregation, a majority of it, in meeting assembled at the chapel, had always governed its affairs.

[STUART, V.C.—But the congregation are not now before me.]

They were represented by the plaintiffs.

Perry v. Shipway (1 Giff. 1; 4 De Gex & J. 353; 28 L. J. Ch. 660), shewed that the pastor of such a congregation as the present was at law merely a tenant at will to the trustees.

[STUART, V.C.—The plaintiffs here are trustees with an admitted legal title; and as they seek the aid of the Court to protect their property from intrusion by the defendant Mr. Gordon, I think it is for him to shew why they should not have the relief they ask.]

Mr. Greene and Mr. Yate Lee, for Mr. Gordon, then opened his case.—The question was not merely whether the majority of the congregation had the power of dismissing their pastor, but whether they could do so without assigning any just or sufficient cause? There was nothing, in fact, alleged against Mr. Gordon, and nothing existed to disqualify him from discharging the duties of his office. It was suggested only that he did not cordially agree with Mr. Legg and some other members of the congregation. But was that a just cause for depriving him of his subsistence? Perry v. Shipway was a very different case from the present one. And what then were the facts of this case? The deeds and rules of this society were, no doubt, silent as to the mode of ascertaining the will of the congregation when dismissing a pastor. Immorality and heterodoxy were out of the question; and the eight reasons privately stated to Mr. Gordon were manifestly insufficient, and would not have been of avail even if made the substantial grounds for dismissing him. But there was in evidence a model deed, adopted by most of these bodies. That deed contained special directions, enabling a majority of the congregation or society to remove a minister or pastor for the reasons there alleged and subject to those reasons; or, in the absence of them, the pastor or minister duly elected was considered to hold his office for life. What then was the inference as to Mr. Gordon's position from the non-existence of any such directions in the deeds or rules of this society? Clearly this, that the majority here had no power to remove him at their mere will and pleasure, and that he was entitled to hold his office for life. Then, again, that was further illustrated by the position of his co-pastor, Mr. Legg. He was tenant for life of his office; for it had been treated as a freehold, and he had been allowed a vote for the county in respect of it. Why then should not Mr. Gordon be also a freeholder and life tenant of his office? A clergyman of the Established Church, a rector of a parish, a parish clerk and a public officer, were all entitled to hold their offices for life, and the position of a minister of one of these bodies was quite analogous to those.

[STUART, V.C.—The whole matter here is one arising out of the voluntary association of certain private individuals for special and religious purposes, and cannot be likened to the case of a person appointed to a public recognized office and for a public purpose.]

Then, the peculiar circumstances under which Mr Gordon was invited to the office must be looked at.—(He referred to the letters above stated.) There was no express reference in those letters to the exact time during which Mr. Gordon was to remain a pastor of the society; but it must be inferred from them, that he was to continue so for his life. He was certainly told that he was not to be a mere assistant to Mr. Legg, but in every sense his co-pastor. He was expressly assured that the death of Mr. Legg would not affect his tenure of office. The representations then made to him were authorized or, at all events, confirmed by his unanimous appointment by the congregation. Although Mr. Gordon's position was in no way dependent on Mr. Legg's consent or approval, the fact of that gentleman formally withdrawing his presumed assent shewed that he believed the representations made by him, as pastor of the congregation to be binding on them. How then could the trustees—even assuming for a moment that they duly represented the congregation, though that was not admitted by Mr. Gordon—be allowed now to break their contract so deliberately entered into with him? In truth, the onus of proof in this case was really cast upon the plaintiffs.

[STUART, V.C.—If your argument is correct, although the congregation might to a man object to their minister, they could not remove him; and yet he might get rid of them.]

Otherwise, the minister would be at the mercy of the congregation.

[STUART, V.C.—But you would place the congregation at the mercy of the minister.]

In The Attorney General v. Pearson (3 Mer. 353-357 and 402), the "usage" of appointing a minister to these congregations "for life" was recognized as the common practice. Of course, if the trust which the Court was called upon to establish were otherwise, the case would be different. Then there was a further ground on which Mr. Gordon relied. This society was an endowed body. Mr. Gordon was, under the deeds of the society, a cestui que trust of its property, and, as minister, specially interested in the rents of a portion of it. The plaintiffs were his trustees, and could not, as such, deprive him of any interest to which he was lawfully entitled in the trust premises. His office was part of that interest to which he was so entitled—Lewin on Trusts, 402, s.17. They then insisted, with respect to the constitution of the meetings of the 4th of September and the 8th of September, 1868, that Mr. Gordon had not had (for the reasons above stated) proper notice of them; that they were not duly constituted; that the majority was not that of the whole congregation, but only of those present at the meeting; and that the resolution for his dismissal, even if the majority of the congregation had been present and could have legally passed it, would have been irregular, informal and inoperative as against him—Foley v. Wontner (2 Jac. & W. 245); Daugars v. Rivaz (28 Beav. 233; 29 L. J. Ch. 685); The Attorney General v. Drummond (1 Dru. & W. 353). They lastly urged that nothing was shewn to have been done at the meeting of the 30th of November, 1868, to cure the defects of the former proceedings.

Mr. Gordon Whitbread was for the defendant Mr. Christie.—He had declined to concur with the plaintiffs in instituting this suit, because he considered it was quite uncalled for; and he had been and still was unwilling to enter into any litigation with respect to the matters in question in the suit. He did not claim to be made a party to it, and asked for his costs of it.

Mr. Greene and Mr. Yate Lee were also for the defendant Mr. James Pike. —He was only the agent of Mr. Gordon. He stated in his answer that he had never applied for or received any of the pew rents; and the bill ought therefore to be dismissed as against him with costs—Dove v. Everard (1 Russ. & M. 231).

Mr. Hardy replied.—He objected to the appearance of Mr. Christie by counsel. Notwithstanding the allegation in Mr. Pike's answer, there was the evidence of three witnesses, Charles Smith, Mary Swain and Thomas Barcham, to shew that he had, in fact, interfered with the receipt of some of the pew rents, and was therefore properly made a party to the suit. With respect to the alleged irregularities in the constitution of and the proceedings at the meetings, what had to be decided at them must, ex necessitate, be done by the majority of the church members actually present; and, to bind the congregation, it was not absolutely requisite that the majority should be that of the whole congregation. In truth, however, the evidence shewed that in this case it was the majority of the whole congregation who voted for the dismissal of Mr. Gordon.

[STUART, V.C.—The real question is as to the fact of a majority of the congregation voting for his dismissal. I think the evidence does establish that there was such a majority. What, therefore, was otherwise done or omitted at the meetings appears to me to be immaterial.]

Mr. Gordon contended that he was entitled, as cestui que trust under the deeds, to the office for life. But, taking all the deeds together, the congregation were the true cestuis que trust of them. At the utmost, he was only, so far as the deeds were concerned, an individual member of the congregation. If he was correct in his view of his position, what would be the result? The deeds provided that, in case the congregation was totally dissolved and public worship at the chapel discontinued for twelve months, the trustees were to release and convey the property to such persons as they might then think proper. But if Mr. Gordon was right, they could not execute those trusts; because he would be entitled to interpose his life interest in the property. Then there would be this further consequence: Mr. Gordon must claim a right to continue for life the pastor or minister of the congregation after it had been dissolved. But so absurd a result of his contention shewed that, unless he had been expressly appointed for life so as specifically to bind the congregation to such a contract, he could not be correct in his argument. He then cited The Attorney General v. Aked (7 Sim. 322); The Protestant Dissenters' Catechism, 25th edit., by Dr. John Pye Smith. The plaintiffs admitted that the contract which originally existed between them and Mr. Gordon was valid at law; but they insisted that under it Mr. Gordon was, at law, only tenant at will to them—Perry v. Shipway, ubi supra. But he was also tenant at will to the congregation. He could have no higher position in equity than at law. It was a strange thing that Mr. Gordon should have conceded that the majority of the congregation had power to elect him, and to do every other act that was requisite for managing the affairs of the society, but should have denied that the majority had a right to dismiss him. He had compared his office to that of a clergyman of the Church of England. But what an "office" was was stated in 6 Bac. Abridg. tit. 'Office' (A), and in Doe v. Jones (10 B. & C. 718; 8 L. J. K.B. 310); Doe v. M'Kaeg (10 B. & S. 721-723, cited in Perry v. Shipway). The principle on which Doe v. Gartham (1 Bing. 357; L. J. 2 C.P. 17), and The King v. Gaskin (8 Term Rep. 209), were decided was in favour of the plaintiffs in this suit. Although no immorality or heterodoxy was imputed to Mr. Gordon, his conduct had led to divisions in the congregation and tended still to uproot it; and what could be worse for the society than that?—Porter v. Clarke (2 Sim. 520). In some cases an inquiry had been directed in whom lay the right to appoint a minister—Davis v. Jenkins (3 Ves. & B. 151); but he submitted that a cognate inquiry as to the right to dismiss was unnecessary here. He then cited—2 Hayes on Conveyancing, edit. 1840, 38; note, 40, as to the registration of dissenting ministers as county voters in respect of lands attached to their offices. In conclusion, he insisted that, if the Court should not decide in favour of the plaintiffs, they would be deprived of the legitimate use of their own property; divisions and dissensions would increase in the congregation; the trusts which had been created for its especial benefit, and which this Court was bound to enforce, would be defeated; and the continuance and very existence of the society imperilled, if not destroyed.

Mr. Yate Lee then commented upon some of the cases cited by Mr. Hardy. —He said the question involved in this case was of immense importance to the various bodies of Protestant dissenters in this country. Indeed, its importance could not be exaggerated, and might in time come to be extended beyond those bodies. He then distinguished The Attorney General v. Aked from the present case. There the minister had been guilty of a neglect of duty. So also in Doe v. Gartham and The King v. Gaskin. In the last-mentioned case the offence of the minister was intoxication. Then, again, the cases of Porter v. Clarke, ubi supra, and Davis v. Jenkins, ubi supra, were not cases of "endowed" bodies. None of those cases therefore applied to this one.

STUART, V.C. (April 26) reserved his judgment; but exhorted the parties, in the interest of religion and of peace, to come, in the meantime, to some arrangement, and not to leave the question between them to be settled by a hostile decision of the Court.

STUART, V.C. (May 28.)—After a careful reconsideration of the evidence and of the arguments in this case, I can find no just grounds for the claim of the defendant the Rev. Mr. Gordon to continue to perform the duties and enjoy the emoluments of minister against the will of the trustees and of the majority of the congregation.

There is nothing in any of the written instruments to countenance the notion that the choice of a minister by the trustees and the congregation is an irrevocable choice, or that he is to continue the officiating minister for life, or during his good behaviour. Indeed, considering the nature of the duties, the purpose of the choice and the constitution of the congregation, they are inconsistent with any such irrevocable appointment. If the minister has a right to continue in that situation against the will of the majority of the congregation and of the trustees, and to enjoy the emoluments for his life, the numbers and the proportion of the majority could make no difference. Instead of being the minister of the congregation he might be the minister of a minority of ten or of one. Such a position would certainly not be that of the minister or pastor of the congregation described in the Declaration of Trust of 1808.

As to the argument that this congregation is not a society existing by voluntary subscriptions, but is endowed with property held upon certain trusts, and that the minister is a cestui que trust under the deeds, it in no degree supports Mr. Gordon's claim to continue minister during his life or good behaviour. By the deeds he is a cestui que trust only so long as he shall continue minister or pastor of the society or congregation, and officiate as such, and no longer. The endowment is for the benefit of the congregation, and that they may be benefited by the services of the proper minister. The declaration of trust as to the rents and profits which the minister is to receive creates a trust for the benefit of the congregation, and a remuneration for those services by which they are to be benefited. There is no trust or purpose for the personal benefit, except to reward the services which he performs for the congregation.

Mr. Gordon has, by his answer, admitted "that in the absence of any special usage or rules, the will of every such congregation is in all cases ascertained and their powers exercised by the vote of the majority of the persons in church fellowship worshipping at the particular chapel." He adds this qualification, "and that the minority are bound by the majority in all points, so long as such majority act consistently with the fundamental doctrines and principles held by the whole body." Such a qualification is futile, because as soon as the fundamental doctrines are contravened by the majority they cease to be the fundamental doctrines of the whole body, and unless the minority submit there is no longer a united body held together by fundamental doctrines and principles.

No doubt the trustees and the congregation, by the unanimous vote which appointed Mr. Gordon to be minister, might at the same time have contracted that he should enjoy all the emoluments for his lifetime. It may, however, well be doubted whether such a contract would be valid as binding the property, or justified by the terms of the trust deeds, for the purposes for which the trust was created. That reasonable degree of harmony which is secured by the submission or complete secession of the minority, seems essential to the endurance of an association formed for the sacred purposes which united this congregation.

In the case of Perry v. Shipway I noticed the authority which established these two main points: first, that the minister of a dissenting congregation is, at law, merely the tenant at will of the trustees; secondly, that in such bodies the decision of the majority of the trustees binds the minority. Indeed, unless the law were so settled, nothing could follow but confusion and defeat of the very purposes for which these congregations are formed. The submission of the minority is the principle on which civil society is founded. It is a principle essential to that reasonable harmony which is necessary for the coherence of all societies, great or small, civil or religious.

In the case of The Attorney General v. Aked, it was decided that the minister of a body of dissenters has no equity to hold the office against the legal right of the majority to dismiss him. The judgment leaves open the question whether, in case of a capricious or improper dismissal, the Court might interfere. That is not very important, because of the improbability that anything done by the majority of the congregation, concurring with the majority of the trustees, could be capricious or improper. This Court would be very slow to interfere—and more probably would not interfere at all—with the discretion of the majority. In the present case there is nothing to prove that there is anything capricious in the decision of the majority of the trustees and of the congregation.

It is in vain to try to confound Mr. Gordon's position, as to the permanence of the tenure, with that of a public officer or the rector of a parish, or a parish clerk. The permanence of their tenure is established by the law of the land, for a public purpose and for a public benefit.

The minister of a dissenting congregation has a position which the law respects, and will protect, as that of one chosen by a voluntary association of private persons, united for sacred purposes, and entitled to choose a minister suitable to their own particular opinions, whose services are to be rewarded out of their own private funds. He is engaged upon a contract, which is merely a private one, and which is to be construed with the same regard to the rights of each of the contracting parties as any other private contract. His position as to tenure under the trustees is clearly defined by the law. There is nothing to shew that, in equity, he can have any position higher than he has at law; nor is there any equity to control that power of the majority of the trustees which is established at law. The power of the majority of the congregation seems to me to rest upon the same principle. Indeed, the statement as to the secession from this congregation—(which is admitted by Mr. Gordon himself in his answer)—and which occurred in the year 1845, shews the practical wisdom of maintaining the power of the majority. When the minority refuse to submit, peace is maintained by their seceding and forming themselves, if they can, into another harmonious congregation. This seems more suitable to the purposes for which such religious bodies are formed. It is better that it should be so, than that a contentious and recusant minority should continue members of the congregation, which would thereby be disturbed by feelings and passions that should not prevail among persons meeting together for public worship.

It is scarcely necessary to notice the argument, that the tenure of his ministry for life must be implied from the terms of the invitation and acceptance mentioning no shorter period. Nothing that involves an absurdity can, by mere implication, be made part of a contract. If it is to be implied that he was made minister for his lifetime, then the unanimous vote of the congregation could not displace him; and if he could not be displaced, there would be the absurdity of his being the officiating minister of a congregation unanimously recusant of his services.

There must be a decree declaring that the defendant Mr. Samuel Clarke Gordon is not entitled to preach or officiate in the chapel of the society against the will of the majority of the trustees and of the congregation; and an order for an injunction against him and the defendant Mr. Pike, according to the prayer of the plaintiff's bill.

It is unnecessary to direct any account; indeed, it has not been pressed for. The plaintiffs are entitled to the costs of the suit against the defendant Mr. Gordon, and also against the defendant Mr. Pike. Notwithstanding the allegation in the answer of that defendant, and the argument that he was merely the agent of the defendant Mr. Gordon, the evidence of Charles Smith, Mary Swain and Thomas Barcham proves his interference as to the pew rents, and he was properly made a defendant. The defendant Mr. Christie, having refused to join as a plaintiff, must bear his own costs.

on which the Attorney General ought to refuse to allow a second provisional specification by another inventor to be filed; and in the event of the later applicant for provisional protection being the first to obtain a grant of letters patent, his patent is a bar to the grant of letters patent for the same invention to the earlier applicant for such provisional protection.

The petitioners William Redgate and Stephen Bates claimed to have discovered, in May, 1868, an improvement in the manufacture of lace, and to have brought their invention into a state fit to be patented on the 5th of June, 1868. They did not, however, file their provisional specification till the 2nd of October, 1868. In the provisional specification they styled their invention an invention for "improvements in the manufacture of lace made on bobbin-net or twist-lace machines." On the 2nd of November, Joseph Hume Bertie filed a provisional specification for an invention for "improvements in the manufacture of lace and twist-lace machines." This invention was stated by him to have been made about the middle of June, 1868. Bertie was the first to obtain a warrant for affixing the great seal to his patent. His letters patent were, in fact, sealed on the 12th of January, 1869, Bates & Redgate having omitted to enter any caveat against their sealing; and on the 26th of February he lodged a notice of objection to the grant of letters patent to Bates & Redgate for their invention, on the ground that he had reason to believe their invention to be similar to that for which he had obtained a patent. Bates & Redgate applied for a warrant for affixing the great seal to their patent on the 19th of March, and notwithstanding the resistance of Bertie, the Attorney General issued his fiat authorizing their application to proceed on the 24th of March. They then gave notice at the Patent Office of their intention to proceed with their application for letters patent, and Bertie, on his part, gave notice of his intention to oppose the application. The question accordingly now came before the Lord Chancellor, Bates and Redgate petitioning him to order the great seal to be affixed to their letters patent, and to have the letters patent dated the 2nd of October, being the day of the filing of their provisional specification, or some other day prior to the 2nd of November, when Bertie's provisional specification was filed. There was no question which of the two inventions was in reality the earlier; nor was either charged with being a plagiarism on the other. The petitioners relied chiefly on the fact that, whereas formerly letters patent were always dated the day when the great seal was affixed to them, the practice, since the passing of the Patent Law Amendment Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 83), has been to date the patent, when eventually granted, the day of the application for provisional protection.

Mr. T. Webster (of the common law bar) and Mr. Everitt appeared in support of the petition.—They contended that the prior registration gave the petitioners a prima facie prior right to a patent. The Attorney General moreover had consented to the grant of the patent, and his discretion could not be properly interfered with in the absence of any fraud or surprise on the part of the applicants. They had not been guilty of delay in giving notice to seal. Having been the first to obtain provisional protection they could not be expected to anticipate that a second provisional protection for the same invention would be granted. At all events, if Bertie had any valid objection to make to their patent that could be no ground why the Lord Chancellor should refuse to seal their patent, for this would not prevent the objection being hereafter raised at law. The only case which touched the point was—Forsyth v. Rivière (1 Webster Rep. Pat. 97 n.) They referred also to In re Vincent's Patent (L. R. 2 Ch. Ap. 341); 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. ss. 10, 19, 20.

Mr. Grove and Mr. T. Aston (both of the common law bar), for Mr. Bertie, argued that his patent was prima facie a good patent, and that the Lord Chancellor had no jurisdiction to override a valid patent. The petitioners could not make out a case of hardship. The 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. s. 12. provided means by which a patentee might protect his rights if he would. That section enacted that an application for letters patent must be advertised, and that notice might be lodged of objections to the grant; but the petitioners had neglected to make any such objection for the purpose of protecting the inchoate right which they had acquired by being the first to obtain provisional protection. It was against public policy that the provisional protection should be accepted as tantamount to the sealing of the patent, for the provisional protection did not secure the publication of the invention for the eventual benefit of the public. So far from section 10. of the act barring Bertie's claim, he was himself entitled to rely on that. They cited Oxley v. Holden (8 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 666; 30 L. J. C.P. 68); In re Russell's Patent (2 De Gex & J. 130).

Mr. T. Webster, in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said the point was a very short one, on the construction of the statute. He was of opinion that an inventor who had filed a provisional specification after another inventor had filed one in reference to the same subject-matter, but who succeeded in procuring his patent to be sealed the first, was in the same position as he would have been before the passing of the statute which provided this machinery of provisional specifications. The benefit which the statute contemplated that inventors were to derive from provisional specification was a considerable one. It was, however, not absolute protection against all the world, but only security from the consequences of accidental imprudence on their own part giving opportunities to workmen and others in a position of confidence for betraying their trust. If they desired to obtain fuller protection, section 9. of the statute afforded the means of procuring it by filing a complete specification, which would, for a limited time, confer the same rights as letters patent, and would operate as a bar to any other persons who might be seeking a patent for the same invention. The general effect of these two several modes of procedure was made plainer still by section 10, which provided against the case of a fraudulent filing of a second specification. The petitioners had not filed such a complete specification, but they now contended that the effect of a provisional specification was to give the person first filing it protection in the meantime against all rival inventors, and that the original wrong was in the Attorney General suffering a second provisional specification to be filed. His Lordship was, however, of opinion that the Attorney General could not reasonably have refused Mr. Bertie's application in the absence of a prima facie case of fraud on the part of Mr. Bertie. There was no power to compel a person who had filed a provisional specification to proceed with his invention; and if the Attorney General were to reject a second applicant on the ground of one such specification having been already lodged, the consequence might be the loss to the public for a year or more of the fruits of the ingenuity of many minds which often were working simultaneously on the same track. The right which a provisional specification conferred on him filing it to have his letters patent when granted dated back to the time of the filing of the provisional specification was conditional on no rival inventor intervening and obtaining a patent first. It had been complained indeed, on behalf of the petitioner, that on Mr. Bertie's contention an inventor might be left helpless against rivals for six months. But this was not so. A person filing a second specification must advertise, and one who had filed the first provisional specification ought—as he would have had to do independently of the statute—to keep a watch over the advertisements, and to observe if any invention were advertised of an apparently similar character to his own. In the present case Mr. Bertie's advertisement was just like that of the petitioner's. They might, therefore, have applied to the Attorney General, entering a caveat, which would have made it incumbent on him to decide which was the first inventor. The petitioners had been negligent, and had only themselves to thank for having lost the opportunity of entering a caveat at the right time. The Lord Chancellor could not protect against the effects of such an omission by now antedating the patent. If there were anything in the petitioners' patent not covered by Mr. Bertie's patent, it was quite right that they should have a patent for that; but it would be improper to seal a patent which would interfere with the patent rights of Mr. Bertie, who had now possession in his favour. As, however, the matter was one of first impression it was not a case for making the petitioners pay costs. They might have their option either to have their petition simply dismissed without costs, or[1] the order might be that there should be no costs of the present hearing, and the petitioners might have leave to apply to the Attorney General for a patent for any part of their invention not covered by Mr. Bertie's patent. Such patent would be dated the 19th of March, 1869, being the day when the petitioners bespoke their patent.

JODRELL v. JODRELL.

Apportionment Act, 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 22.—Dividends payable under Decree of the Court to a Person for Life—No Apportionment.

APPORTIONMENT.—Under a will, dated in 1858, A. was tenant for life of an estate subject to impeachment for waste. B. was tenant for life of the same estate in remainder without impeachment for waste. In A.'s lifetime the Court had authorized the sale of some of the timber on the estate, and had ordered the dividends of the money arising from such sale to be paid to A. during his life. After A.'s death B. claimed the whole of the dividend which was accruing at the death:—Held, that such dividend was not apportionable between B. and the personal representatives of A.

John William Jodrell, by his will, dated the 22nd of May, 1858, devised certain real estates to the use of his brother Francis Charles Jodrell, and his assigns for his life, subject to impeachment for waste, with remainder to the use of Edmund Henry Jodrell and his assigns, for his life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to the use of Thomas Jodrell Phillips Jodrell, the petitioner, for his life, without impeachment of waste, with remainders over.

The testator died on the 25th of May, 1858. Francis Charles Jodrell died on the 4th of June, 1868, having survived Edmund Henry Jodrell, the second tenant for life.

There were upon the devised estates woods and plantations of great value, and the object of the suit which was instituted by Francis Charles Jodrell, was to get the direction of the Court respecting the timber.

By the decree which was made on the 15th of January, 1859, Francis Charles Jodrell was directed to fell and sell certain parts of the timber, and it was ordered that the proceeds of the sale thereof should be brought into Court and invested in 3*l.* per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, and that the dividends to accrue due on such annuities during the life of Francis Charles Jodrell should from time to time, as and when the same should accrue due, be paid to him or until further order.

In pursuance of the decree the sum of 1,022*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* consols had been purchased with moneys arising from the sale of the timber, and this sum together with the dividends which had become due thereon in July, 1868, and January, 1869, was in Court. Thomas Jodrell Phillips Jodrell had presented a petition praying for a transfer and payment to him of the above-mentioned annuities and dividends. It was admitted that the petitioner was entitled to the 1,022*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* consols, as representing the corpus of the timber moneys; but a question arose as to whether the dividend, which became due in July, 1868, was to be apportioned between the petitioner and the personal representatives of Francis Charles Jodrell, or the petitioner was to take the whole thereof.

Mr. Rigby, for the petitioner.—The dividends were payable to Francis

(1) Mr. Webster intimated that this alternative would be accepted by the petitioners.

Charles Jodrell under a decree of the Court, and a decree of the Court is not an instrument within the meaning of the Apportionment Act of 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 22.

He referred to Cattley v. Arnold (28 L. J. Ch. 352; 1 Jo. & H. 651); In re Longworth's Estate (1 Kay & J. 1; 23 L. J. Ch. 104); In re Lawton's Estate (L. R. 3 Eq. 469).

Mr. Dryden, for the personal representatives of Francis Charles Jodrell.—Cattley v. Arnold was a case of rent, and does not apply. In the other cases cited, the instrument which created the life interest was executed before the Apportionment Act. If the petitioner's view be correct, moduses, &c., are out of the act altogether.—Knight v. Boughton (19 L. J. Ch. 66; 12 Beav. 312).

Mr. Rigby, in reply.—The will did not contemplate the payment of these dividends. It was by virtue of the decree alone that they were made payable. It is impossible to distinguish the case from Cattley v. Arnold.—He also referred to In re Markby (4 Myl. & Cr. 484).

Lord Romilly, M.R. (April 19).—I think that there is no apportionment in this case. I must follow the authorities, and according to the authorities I cannot make out that there is in this case any instrument within the meaning of the Apportionment Act. The act is ill drawn.

Malins, V.C., May 25, 26, 1869.

LEWIS v. MATTHEWS.

Legacy to Executor Virtute officii—Power of Attorney—Proof of acting by Executor—Costs of Legatees not Parties to Record in Administration Suit.

Executor and Administrator.—To entitle an executor to a legacy bequeathed to him as such, he must prove the will, or at least act in the execution thereof; probate of the will is the best, but not the only possible evidence of his intention to act.

Residuary legatees, not parties to the record, but having by leave of this Court attended in chambers, held entitled to one set of costs amongst them.

James Lewis, by will, dated the 28th of September, 1850, gave and bequeathed " unto his executors thereinafter named the sum of 200 guineas for their trouble in the execution of the trusts of that his will, in addition to any other legacy he might have given them "; he then gave all his real and personal estate to Benjamin Lewis and William Lewis upon the trusts therein mentioned, and he nominated and appointed the said Benjamin Lewis and William Lewis his executors.

Benjamin Lewis pre-deceased the testator; William Lewis went to Australia in 1851, and resided there till his death, having, in 1854, executed a general power of attorney to the plaintiff, Alfred Lewis, to act as his attorney in all matters.

The testator died in 1859. In 1860 administration of his estate with the will annexed was granted to the plaintiff, the brother and one of the residuary legatees of the testator, limited until William Lewis should, by himself or by his attorney, apply for or renounce probate. Shortly after this grant of administration the plaintiff received a power of attorney from William Lewis, dated the 12th of July, 1860, authorizing him to procure letters of administration with the will annexed to the testator's estate, but " nevertheless for the use and benefit of the said William Lewis until he should apply for or obtain probate of the said will." Administration having been already granted to the plaintiff as above stated, no action was taken under this power of attorney.

William Lewis died in 1862, having, by will, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to the defendant Hannah Walker, who afterwards married the defendant Richard Matthews.

This bill was filed for the administration of the testator's estate; various questions were raised, amongst others a doubt was suggested whether William Lewis was entitled as executor to the above-mentioned legacy of 200 guineas, which was now claimed by the defendant Hannah Matthews, as his legal personal representative. The 20th and 21st paragraphs of the bill were as follows:—

"20. The plaintiff [Alfred Lewis] has, as such administrator as herein mentioned, received a large portion of the personal estate of the said testator James Lewis, and in consequence of the absence of the said William Lewis, and under such general power of attorney as aforesaid, the plaintiff has also, as the attorney of the said W. Lewis, received rents of the said testator's freehold and coyphold estates, and the plaintiff is willing to account for the same, as this honourable Court shall direct.

"21. The said W. Lewis accepted and acted in the execution of the trusts of the will of the said J. Lewis by the plaintiff as his attorney as aforesaid."

The chief clerk, in his certificate, disallowed the payment of the "executorial fee" of 210*l.* to the defendant Hannah Matthews, and submitted to the Court whether, under the circumstances stated, that legacy was or was not payable.

Mr. J. Pearson and Mr. Ellis, for the plaintiff.—William Lewis never proved the will, and is not therefore entitled to a legacy given to him as executor.—They cited Griffiths v. Pruen (11 Sim. 202); Hanbury v. Spooner (5 Beav. 630; 12 L. J. Ch. 434); Angermann v. Ford (29 Beav. 349); In re Hawkins's Trusts (33 Beav. 570; 34 L. J. Ch. 80); as shewing a concurrence of opinion among three Judges on this point.

Mr. G. Hastings, for residuary legatees in the same interest.

Mr. Glasse, for the defendants Richard and Hannah Matthews.—It is a mistake to suppose that to enable a man to take such a legacy it is necessary for him to take out probate; it is sufficient that he manifest an intention to act; here there is sufficient evidence of that in the execution of the special power of attorney and the assumption of all responsibility. In all the cases cited on the other side there was no sufficient expression of intention.—He cited Roper on Legacies, p. 778.

Mr. W. Pearson (with Mr. Glasse).—The executorial acts and duties performed by William Lewis and Hannah Matthews, in her representative character, are sufficient to entitle his estate to this legacy—Harrison v. Rowley (4 Ves. 212); Brydges v. Wotton (1 Ves. & B. 134).

Mr. J. Pearson, in reply.—In Harrison v. Rowley (ubi supra), the executor had acted as such. The acts on which the defendants rely were done by the deceased not as executor but as trustee; their duties are distinct; and a legacy for trouble in doing the duties of executor is not answered by trouble in doing the duties of trustee—Lord Brougham v. Lord Poulett (19 Beav. 119; 24 L. J. Ch. 233). Moreover, the plaintiff administered the testator's estate in his own person, not as attorney of William Lewis, who could not therefore claim the benefit of that act. Nor was the plaintiff bound to take out a second administration under William Lewis's power of attorney, and thereby increase the expenses of administration unnecessarily. In the cases cited the executor had been prevented from acting by some cause from without; here William Lewis might have acted at any time between the testator's death, in 1859, and his own death, in 1862. Having wilfully abstained from acting, he cannot take the legacy.

MALINS, V.C. said, that the rules of the Court as to legacies to executors were not open to doubt; such a legacy is given in respect of the office, and there must therefore be evidence of the intention to act, in order to entitle the legatee to the legacy. The best evidence of such intention that could be produced was, of course, the act of proving the will; but this was not the only possible evidence. Harrison v. Rowley was still law, and it was clear that an executor might do before taking probate all acts that he might do after taking probate, subject only to the risk of the will being invalidated. Such acts done anterior to probate were of themselves sufficient evidence of the intention, and would entitle the executor named to the legacy, even though he died before he had actually proved the will. But where, through age, infirmity or illness, the executor named had not proved, nor taken any step in the execution of the will, he could not have the legacy—Hanbury v. Spooner; In re Hawkins's Trusts. The case of Angermann v. Ford, following Read v. Devaynes (2 Cox, 285; 3 Bro. C.C. 95), shewed that where the executor named has the opportunity of proving the will, and of thus clothing himself with the character of executor, he must do so in order to entitle himself to a legacy as executor; and further, that probate is sufficient evidence of the consent to act, although delayed, as in that case, for six years. But, nevertheless, probate, though sufficient evidence, was not the only evidence of consent; and in the present case it was shewn that William Lewis had executed a power of attorney to the plaintiff authorizing him to take out administration with the will annexed of the testator's estate on his behalf. It was true this power was never used, the plaintiff having already taken out administration, but it was none the less evidence of William Lewis's consent to act. But, further, the plaintiff stated in his bill that he took the rent and profits of the testator's real estate as attorney for William Lewis, and that William Lewis had acted in the execution of the will by the plaintiff as his attorney; in fact he admitted himself to have been the agent for William Lewis, and he could not now be heard to say to the contrary. The legacy of 210*l.* to William Lewis must be allowed, and the chief clerk's certificate varied to that effect.

Some discussion took place with reference to the costs of legatees not parties on the record who attended proceedings in chambers.

Mr. W. Pearson objected to the costs of parties not on the record being allowed out of the estate. There were four residuary legatees, one of whom was represented by the defendant Hannah Matthews; the other three all attended separately in chambers; their interest in the estate was the same as the defendant's; they ought not, therefore, to have their costs of attending the taking of the accounts—Daubney v. Leake (35 L. J. Ch. 347; L. R. 1 Eq. 495); Hubbard v. Latham (35 L. J. Ch. 402); Stevenson v. Abington (11 W. R. 936); Wragg v. Morley (14 W. R. 949).

Mr. G. Hastings, for the residuary legatees.—Formerly the residuary legatees would all have been parties to the record, and would then have had their costs as a matter of course; we had liberty to attend, and were compelled to avail ourselves of it. In Bellew v. Bellew (3 Weekly Notes (1868), 253) one set of costs was given to parties other than those on the record.

MALINS, V.C. said, the rule in this matter must be cautiously exercised; he would follow the principle on which the point was decided in the last case cited, and give one set of costs to the parties attending the proceedings beyond those payable to the parties to the record.

Company—Call—When owing.

COMPANY.—A call is owing from the day on which it is made, although it is "payable" on a subsequent day.

Digitized by Google

The directors of this company on the 27th of November, 1866, made a call payable on the 20th of December. On the 17th of December the shares of Mr. Dawes were declared forfeited for non-payment of previous calls. The question was, whether the call made on the 27th of November was recoverable from him. The articles of association contained the following clause:—

"Any member, whose shares shall have been forfeited, shall notwithstanding be liable to pay to the company all sums or calls owing upon such shares at the time of the forfeiture."

Mr. Roxburgh and Mr. Wickens, for the liquidators, argued, that the call was "owing" from the time when it was made, although payable at a future date.

They cited Mackenzie's case (17 W. R. 343; 38 L. J. Ch. 199; L. R. 7 Eq. 240); The North American Colonial Association of Ireland v. Bentley (15 Jur. 187; 19 L. J. Q.B. 427).

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Eddis, on behalf of Mr. Dawes, urged, that "owing at the time of the forfeiture" meant payable at that time.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS said—There is no question that the call made on the 27th of November, 1866, is payable on that day, and it is due on that day; but it cannot be compulsorily enforced until the 20th of December, 1866. The moment the call is made it is a debt due in every respect.

On the 17th of December, three days before the call can be compulsorily enforced, Mr. Dawes's shares are forfeited; and thereupon he asks whether he was bound to pay it. I should have thought it clear that he was, without any words in the articles. The case of The North American Colonial Association of Ireland v. Bentley seems to me to establish that; but the thing is made still more clear by the 34th clause of the articles, which says, "Any member, whose shares shall have been forfeited, shall notwithstanding be liable to pay to the company all sums or calls owing upon such shares at the time of the forfeiture." That expressly means that the call is owing the moment it is made, and all the cases are to the same effect. I am of opinion, therefore, that Mr. Dawes was bound to pay the call.

Power of Appointment—Fraud on Power—Improper Influence—Second Appointment—Continuance of old Influence.

POWERS.—Where an appointment has been set aside on the ground that, though not based on any actual agreement between the appointor and the appointee, it was made in reliance on a sense of moral obligation known to be operating on the mind of the appointee, which would lead her to carry out the appointor's wishes, nothing short of a distinct declaration by the appointor, that he considers the appointee relieved from such obligation, can make a fresh appointment to the same person valid.

This was a suit to test the validity of two appointments by the Duke of Portland, whose former exercise of the same power was one of the subjects of dispute in a suit which came before the Master of the Rolls in 1862, and was finally determined by the House of Lords in 1864. That case is reported (31 Beav. 525: on appeal, 1 De Gex, J. & S. 517; 11 H.L. C. 32; 32 L. J. Ch. 81, 257).

The facts, so far as material to the present case, were as follows: By indenture, dated the 24th of June, 1843, the late Duke of Portland covenanted with his sons, the present duke (then Marquis of Titchfield), Lord George Bentinck, and Lord Henry Bentinck to transfer a sum of 52,000*l.* 3*l.* per cent. consols into their names; and it was declared that they should stand possessed thereof upon trust to invest the dividends during the life of the late duke, and that after his decease the said trust fund and all accumulations should be held by them, on trust for Lady Harriet Bentinck and Lady Mary Bentinck (the two surviving unmarried daughters), or for one of them exclusively of the other who should be living at the time of the appointment, and the issue then living of both or either of them, or all or any one or more of the objects of the power, in such priorities, &c. as the late duke, or after his decease the Duke of Portland for the time being should by deed appoint, and in default of and until such appointment, and as to such part or parts of the trust funds, and the dividends, interest and annual income to arise therefrom to which such appointment, if made, should not extend, upon trust during the joint lives of Lady Harriet and Lady Mary, to pay the interest and annual income to Lady Harriet and Lady Mary in equal shares, for their absolute use and benefit, and after the decease of either of them upon trust to pay the whole of the interest and annual income to the survivor for life; and, after the decease of the survivor, the trust fund and dividends were to go to such person as should then be Duke of Portland for his own absolute use and benefit.

By another indenture, dated the 24th of November, 1848, the late duke limited all his Marylebone estates to Charles Heaton Ellis, upon trust after his death (amongst other things) to raise a clear annuity of 2,720*l.* during the joint lives of Lady Harriet and Lady Mary, and pay the same to the present duke and Lord Henry Bentinck, to the intent that they should pay the same annuity, when payable to Lady Harriet and Lady Mary, or to either of them in exclusion of the other, in such parts and subject to such conditions or restrictions as the present duke during his life, or after his decease Lord Henry, or after his decease the personal representative of the survivor of them should from time to time by deed direct or appoint, and in default of such appointment to pay the annuity between Lady Harriet and Lady Mary in equal proportions.

The late duke died on the 27th of March, 1854, and Lady Mary married Colonel Topham on the 5th of October in the same year.

On the 21st of September, 1854, the present duke made two temporary appointments in favour of Lady Harriet alone under the above-mentioned settlements; and on the 19th of December, 1854, he executed two other deeds-poll, by the first of which, after reciting the marriage of his sister, he declared that, in pursuance of the power in that behalf contained in the deed of the 24th of June, 1843, he appointed that, until further or other appointment, and subject thereto, all the dividends to accrue during the life of Lady Harriet on the said sum of 52,000*l.* and the accumulations, should be paid and belong to Lady Harriet; and a power of revocation was reserved to the Duke of Portland for the time being. The other deed dealt in like manner with the annuity of 2,720*l.*

It will be seen, in the report above referred to, that the appointment was set aside, on the ground that it was an attempt to make the power subservient to a purpose foreign to the intention appearing on the face of the instrument creating the power, though entirely in accordance with what were known, or supposed to be known, to have been the real wishes of the settlor, viz., if possible, to deter Lady Mary from contracting a marriage of which he disapproved, or, if that failed, to tie up a moiety so that it should be available for her benefit in the event of her becoming by any means a feme sole; and that the chief circumstances which led their Lordships to this conclusion were: 1, the tenor of the correspondence between the present duke and his man of business, Mr. Ellis, and especially an A. B. case submitted by them to counsel, shewing that as to one moiety of the funds there was no intention to give Lady Harriet any beneficial interest, and that her agency would have been dispensed with altogether, if it had been thought possible to keep it out of the plaintiff's hands by any other means; 2, the fact that, after the temporary but before the permanent appointments to Lady Harriet, she had been induced to sign an order to Messrs. Drummond, the family bankers, applying in terms to future dividends as well as to those actually appointed to her, directing them to invest a moiety of the payments to be made to her from the account marked "S," in the joint names of the duke, Lord Henry and herself; 3, the fact that even the permanent appointments were made subject to revocation, so that the appointor still retained a hold over the appointee; and, 4, that the appointments were made on a well-grounded expectation that Lady Harriet would be disposed from her own feelings to co-operate in carrying out her father's wishes.

The decree of the House of Lords having been made without prejudice to any question as to any future exercise of the powers of appointment, the Duke of Portland proceeded to execute the two new appointments hereinafter described:

1. By a deed-poll, dated the 6th of July, 1864, after reciting the indenture of the 24th of June, 1843, the appointment thereunder by the said deed-poll of the 19th of December, 1854, the decrees of the Lords Justices of appeal, and that the capital fund then subject to the trusts of the said indenture of settlement consisted of a sum of 39,200*l.* invested on mortgage, and a sum of 33,467*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.* stock in the new 3*l.* per cent. annuities; it was witnessed that, pursuant to and in exercise of the power to him by the said indenture of the 24th of June, 1843, for that purpose given, and of every or any other power in anywise enabling him in that behalf, he, the Duke of Portland, did thereby irrevocably direct, limit and appoint that the dividends, interest and annual income of the said sums of 39,200*l.* and 33,467*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.* new 3*l.* per cent. stock, and of the stocks, funds and securities upon which the same might be invested, and of all other the capital, trust moneys, stocks, funds and securities (if any) for the time being, subject to the trusts of the same indenture of settlement thenceforth to accrue during the life of the said Lady Harriet Cavendish Bentinck, should be paid to the said Lady Harriet Cavendish Bentinck, her executors, administrators and assigns, for her and their own absolute use and benefit during the life of the said Lady Mary Elizabeth Topham, her executors, administrators and assigns; and it was further witnessed, that "so far as it might be necessary to give effect to his intention to appoint the income of the said trust funds in manner thereinbefore mentioned, but not further or otherwise, and by way of confirmation of the appointment thereinbefore made, he, the Duke of Portland, in exercise of the powers for that purpose given by the said indenture of the 19th of December, 1854, did thereby revoke and determine the trusts of such indenture declared of the said premises thereby appointed, and did irrevocably direct and appoint" as above stated.

2. By another deed-poll of the same date, after reciting the indenture of the 24th of November, 1848, the appointment thereunder of the annuity of 2,720*l.* thereby created, by the said deed-poll of the 19th of December, 1854, and the decrees of the Lords Justices and of the House of Lords, the Duke of Portland made an irrevocable appointment of the said 2,720*l.* annuity in substantially the same terms as the last-mentioned appointment. In the mean time, after the decree of the Lords Justices and pending the appeal to the House of Lords, Lady Harriet had signed the following order:

"Nice, 16th Nov., 1863.

"Messrs. Drummond,—Be pleased to transfer to an account to be headed and kept, 'Lady Harriet Bentinck's separate account,' the sum of 1,831*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.*, being a moiety of the following sums which have been paid to my account by the Duke of Portland and Lord Henry Bentinck Account S. (explained to mean 'Sisters' Account'), namely, 1863, March 27, 654*l.* 10*s.*, April 11, 406*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.*, June 27, 660*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, July 4, 850*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, September 28, 660*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*, October 19, 430*l.* 19*s.* 11*d.* Also pay or transfer to the same separate account one moiety of all sums, which hereafter may be paid or transferred to my account by the Duke of Portland and Lord Henry Bentinck Account S.

"Harriet Margaret Bentinck."

And by a subsequent letter, dated the 28th of May, 1864, she had requested them to deal with all moneys standing to the separate account so opened by her according to the signature of her solicitor, Mr. E. S. Bailey, who was also the solicitor of the Duke of Portland.

No direct communication appeared to have taken place between the Duke and Lady Harriet respecting the new appointments made in her favour, but she was informed of them by the following letter from the said Mr. E. S. Bailey (the receipt whereof she duly acknowledged):

"Berners St., London, 1864, July 29th.

"Madam,—I have the honour of informing your ladyship that the Duke of Portland has executed two deeds of appointment, dated the 6th day of July last, by one of which his Grace has irrevocably appointed to you, for your own sole absolute use and benefit, during the joint lives of yourself and Lady Mary Topham, the whole of the annuity of 2,720*l.* charged by the late Duke of Portland on his Grace's Marylebone estate; and by the other, the Duke of Portland has also irrevocably appointed to you, for your like sole absolute use and benefit, during the joint lives of yourself and Lady Mary Topham, the whole of the yearly dividends and interest payable on the sum of 32,000*l.* 3½*l.* per cent. annuities settled by the late of Duke of Portland in the year 1843, and the accumulations; and which fund is now represented by a sum of 39,200*l.* sterling lent on mortgage and 33,467*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.* new 3*l.* per cent. stock. I inclose copies of these two appointments, the originals of which are held by my firm on your ladyship's account and subject to your order. I also inclose a copy of an order given by the Duke of Portland and Lord Henry Bentinck to Messrs. Drummond, to pay these funds as received by them to your account with them. I shall feel obliged by your ladyship's acknowledging the receipt of this letter and the inclosures. I have the honour to be, Madam, your ladyship's very obedient servant,

"E. S. Bailey."

The order referred to was in the following terms:

"Langwell, 6th day of July, 1864.

"Gentlemen,—We desire to cancel all existing orders, which relate to certain sums paid to our joint account with you marked S. As to the future disposal of such sums as will be paid to that account, we request that it may be as follows: As to the quarterly payments of an annuity of 2,720*l.* sterling and the half-yearly payments made by Mr. Watkins, and the half-yearly dividends on a sum of 33,467*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.* new 3*l.* per cent., from the last payment thereof to the date of this notice, we request that one moiety may be paid to the account of Lady Margaret Harriet Cavendish Bentinck, and the other moiety to the account of Lady Mary Elizabeth Topham. And as to all future sums paid to the said joint account of the said annuity, interest and dividends, and of any accumulation of the same stock, we request of you to pay the whole amount to the account of Lady M. H. C. Bentinck. We are, gentlemen, your obedient servants,

"Scott Portland,"
"Henry Bentinck."

Under these circumstances a bill was filed by Lady Mary Topham, in June, 1865, against the duke, Lord Henry and Lady Harriet, praying a declaration either that she was entitled to a moiety of the income of the trust fund and of the annuity respectively appointed to Lady Harriet by the deed-poll of the 6th of July, 1864, or that such appointments were void as against her, and that she was entitled to such moieties as in default of appointment from that date; and for consequential directions.

Sir William Topham, having by an indenture, dated the 5th of October, 1854, covenanted to settle all after-acquired property of the plaintiff upon trust for her separate use, he and the sole acting trustee of such indenture were also made defendants.

The following passages occurred in the Duke of Portland's answers in the former and the present suit respectively:

In the former suit he said: "When the said deeds poll of the 19th of December were executed by me I fully intended that from and after the execution thereof the defendant Lady Harriet Cavendish Bentinck should receive the whole of the dividends or income and annuity thereby appointed to her; and I was aware when and before such appointments were made that the said Lady Harriet Cavendish Bentinck would have, and I intended that she should have, the power, if she thought fit to exercise it, of dealing with and disposing of the whole of the dividends, yearly income and annuity as her own moneys. But the said appointments were made in consequence of the marriage of the plaintiff, and as the only mode by which, as I was informed, the immediate and absolute vesting in the plaintiff of a share of the dividends or income and annuity so appointed could be prevented; and I did hope when the said appointments were executed that the defendant Lady Harriet Cavendish Bentinck would not on receiving the same proceed at once to apply the whole thereof to her own personal use and purposes, but as to a moiety thereof would set apart the same as a fund to be dealt with in accordance with the wish of the late duke in the event, which has occurred, of the plaintiff marrying the defendant Sir William Topham."

In the present suit he said: "I have in my said answers filed in the suit hereinbefore referred to said that when the said appointments of the 19th day of December, 1854, were executed I did hope that Lady Harriet Bentinck would not on receiving the said income and annuity so appointed to her proceed at once to apply the whole thereof to her own personal use and purposes; but when I made the said last-mentioned appointments of the 6th of July, 1864, I had not, nor have I now, any opinion, hope or expectation as to the manner in which Lady Harriet Bentinck would, or will, think proper to dispose of or apply or deal with the said income and annuity so appointed to her and of which she is the absolute beneficial owner so far as the appointments so executed by me and my full purpose to make her so can make her. I do not know, and cannot answer, as to my knowledge, information or belief, whether it is or is not the fact that Lady Harriet Bentinck does not apply or does not intend to apply more than one moiety of such income and annuity for her own benefit."

Lady Harriet, by her own answer in the present suit, stated that her order of the 16th of November, 1863, was not intended to apply to any moneys other than such as were paid under the appointments of 1854 (in fact pending the appeal), but that as it applied in terms to all moneys transferred to her account from the account marked "S," her bankers had acted accordingly, and that she had not thought it necessary to interfere at present, more especially as the plaintiff had instituted the present suit, and Sir William Topham had long since, as she (Lady H.) was informed and believed, intimated his intention to dispute any appointment of the whole of the income annuity which the Duke of Portland might make in her favour. Under the circumstances aforesaid she had not actually applied more than a moiety of the aforesaid income and annuity for her own personal use and purposes, but she entirely denied that she held them as a fund to be disposed of in accordance with any agreement or in trust for any person, and she intended to dispose of the same in any way she might from time to time think fit, either for her personal use or otherwise, at her sole will and pleasure.

In her cross-examination (taken abroad) she said, among other things, as follows [as to the order to Messrs. Drummond of the 18th of October, 1854, with respect to the moneys to be received under the former appointments]: "In signing that order I trusted to my brother. I never spent the money that accumulated; it would have been a dishonest act to spend the money which I had agreed to allow to accumulate. When I opposed Lady Mary's claim in the former suit, I did so to carry out my father's intentions. He told me so solemnly that she was not to have the money that I could not conceive her trying to get it. I mean if she married Mr. Topham. On that occasion the present duke's lawyers acted for me, and they do so in this suit. The duke paid all the expenses in the last suit, and I believe he does so in this suit.—[It was not clear whether the next passage referred to the former or the present suit.]—I have adopted what Messrs. Bailey did in this matter; my brother paid for it and I adopted it; I adopted whatever the duke's solicitors did. I knew that they were carrying out the late duke's wishes and the present duke's wishes. I left the whole matter to the lawyers, and I think that is the usual thing to do.—[Then as to matters subsequent to the former suit.]—In signing that order [of the 16th of November, 1863] I did not think whether I was carrying out the late duke's wishes. I left it entirely to Mr. Bailey. I trusted Mr. Bailey to carry out the late duke's wishes. . . . . I signed that [the letter of the 28th of May, 1864] and sent it. I think it probable it was drawn up by Messrs. Bailey for me. The bankers may under that order have dealt with the money according to the order of Messrs. Bailey. The bankers have had directions from Messrs. Bailey as to the money referred to in that order. The money is now entirely my own. . . . . The money which my brother made over to me after the late suit I have now invested in my own name. I did not do it directly, but I have done so since. I do not recollect the exact time at which it was invested. Mr. Bailey advised me not to invest it till the whole thing was settled. I invested it some little time before I heard from Mr. Bailey that the plaintiff was really going to appeal again. I mean by that to bring this suit. . . . . I reckon that dividend part of my income. I intend to spend it, as distinguished from accumulating it. I cannot tell whether I have spent it. I have a pass-book, but I keep no other account. When Messrs. Drummond draw this dividend they carry it to my general account. I cannot give any idea of what those dividends amount to in the whole. I have not looked particularly to see whether I have touched the dividends you speak of or not. The money is invested in my name only. My brother has made the money over to me unconditionally; and I have not thought whether I am carrying out the late duke's wishes. I left the matter to my brother. I left it all to my brother. I left it all to Mr. Bailey because he was my brother's solicitor. The investment had no reference at all to the late duke's wishes.

Sir R. Palmer, Mr. Hall and Mr. Rowcliffe, for the plaintiff.—(Mr. Hall was also for Sir William Topham and the trustee of Lady Mary's settlement.)—It is true that the question as to any fresh appointment was left open by the House of Lords, but it was left open to be examined upon such evidence as arises legitimately from antecedent circumstances, and those circumstances shew that an influence was known to be operating upon Lady Harriet's mind which would lead her to apply the funds appointed to her to a purpose foreign to the object of the power.

[JAMES, V.C.—Would this case be governed by the decision of the House of Lords: A father has two sons, and says, "one of my sons is so excessively extravagant that I cannot make any appointment to him. The other is a very prudent and good fellow, and I am quite sure he would never allow his brother to starve"? If the appointment were made in that way, would it be good?]

Yes, if, as the question seems to imply, it is the intention of the appointment that he shall unite that property with his own, and reliance is placed upon him with regard to the use he will make of that which is his own money; but the question is here, as to a series of transactions, whether the later transactions are substantially disengaged from the first. To such a case the general principle applies, which is laid down (with reference, it is true, to quite a different class of contracts) in the first volume of White and Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity, in a note to The Earl of Chesterfield v. Janssen, p. 549, ed. 1866, viz., that confirmation or acquiescence will be of no avail whilst the contracting party continues in the same situation as when he entered into the contract; and still more the observations of Lord Langdale, M.R. in Askham v. Barker (12 Beav. 499, 503), where, with reference to the case put by counsel of an appointment discovered to be invalid and a fresh appointment made with the concurrence of all parties, including and excluding the same objects as before, he said he should feel a great difficulty, because it would be almost impossible for the parties to get into the same situation in which they were before. In the former case, as here, it was denied that there was any actual agreement, but it was considered, on the authority of In re Marsden's Trusts (4 Drew. 594; 28 L. J. Ch. 906), that where there was reliance on a previously acquired influence over the mind of the appointor, the absence of agreement would not make the appointment a good one. Then, compare the Duke's language on the two occasions—[the learned counsel read the passages from his answer above set out].—His Grace's meaning apparently is this: "I had the opinion of lawyers, and was told that without the right being given to Lady Harriet to do what she pleased with the money, it would be good for nothing; at the same time I hoped she would not exercise it." Then, when we come to the answer in the present suit, he drops out the hope, and the rest is exactly the same. There was experience in that case, and knowledge of the character of Lady Harriet as well as the other facts. Lady Harriet, in her cross-examination, connects the giving of the order (still unrevoked) of the 16th of November, 1863, with the original purpose as distinctly as it is possible to do so. Lord Cranworth suggested in the former suit that if Lady Harriet had only been told that as between her and the duke there was to be no moral obligation whatever, it might have been all very well (even though he had gone on to state what, in his opinion, were her father's wishes); but that suggestion has not been acted on in any way. In fact, having learned something by the former proceedings, he thought it was better to leave the chain and net in which former circumstances had placed Lady Harriet to operate in the manner in which it was quite certain they would operate if nothing more was done.

Mr. Amphlett, Mr. T. Stevens and Mr. Michael B. Smith, for Lady Harriet Bentinck.—The question of law really comes to this, whether a person who has attempted to make an illegal appointment can afterwards make a new appointment. On this point the authorities are decisive—Farmer v. Martin (2 Sim. 502); Birley v. Birley (25 Beav. 290; 27 L. J. Ch. 569); Carver v. Richards (27 Beav. 488; 1 De Gex, F. & J. 548; 29 L. J. Ch. 169, 357); Ward v. Tyrrell (25 Beav. 563; 27 L. J. Ch. 749). In Jackson v. Jackson (Dru. 91), Lord St. Leonards said, "It is clear upon the authorities that if a man exercise a power improperly, so that his execution of it is void and he subsequently discovers his error, he may then exercise the power in the manner warranted by law," though in that case the will which it was sought to establish as an appointment was made on the assumption that the power had been well exercised already, and therefore could not take effect as such. There is a dictum of Lord Hardwicke in Hervey v. Hervey (1 Atk. 567), to the same effect. In Askham v. Barker (ubi supra), the second appointment was one which could not on any principle be supported. It was in fact a question of intention whether the appointor could have meant to include by general words in the second appointment property which he imagined himself to have disposed of by the first appointment. Lord Langdale, however, said "If it had been authoritatively and properly declared that the first execution of the power was entirely gone, for anything he knew to the contrary, the second execution of the power might not have been bad."

[JAMES, V.C.—Suppose a father receives a bribe from his son to appoint to him, and the appointment is set aside on a bill filed by another son, could the father appoint again to that other son?]

Undoubtedly.

[JAMES, V.C.—Could he appoint again to the son who received the bribe?]

The Court would, no doubt, look jealously into the whole transaction, but would not presume, in the absence of evidence, that the illegal consideration still pervaded the second appointment. Now, it is clear that, apart from the previous transactions and the former suits, there is no proof here by any external circumstances of any motives which would invalidate the appointments; but it is contended that these appointments are a continuation of the scheme which was held to be illegal and set aside in the former suits. It will be seen, on comparison, that there are most material and decisive differences. First, the letter by which Mr. Bailey informed Lady Harriet of the appointments must, with the legal knowledge the former suit must have given her, have made it clear to her that she had the absolute disposal of the money; whereas the former appointments were communicated in such terms that she could hardly suppose, and, in fact, did not suppose that she had any interest in the matter, but considered, as she said in her answer, that she was acting a formal and ministerial part only. It is true that the duke seems to have intended, even on the former occasion, that she should be informed of the real effect of the appointment; but she was not so informed, and the duke was responsible—at least, so Lord Westbury appears to have thought,—for the omission of his agents. As to its being a bare formal communication, the letter might, no doubt, have gone on to say, "You are entirely absolved from any obligation to carry out what were supposed to be the wishes of the late duke;" but the present duke had no business to say anything of the kind. She was perfectly independent of him, knew as well as he did what had been her father's wishes, and was as well able to judge of her obligations in respect of them. Therefore, In re Marsden's Trusts, which went on the express communication of the appointor's wishes to the appointee, has no application; indeed, it was not referred to even in the former suit by their Lordships, though it was relied on in argument. Then, as to her dealings with the appointed funds. The reasons given in her answer for still keeping a separate account are true and sufficient, and you have the positive oath of both her and the duke that there was no arrangement between them as to how the money should be disposed of; whereas, in the former case, an order by which she put both present and future dividends beyond her own control was sent to and signed by her as a matter of course. In the terms of the appointments themselves there is the very important difference that the former were revocable, whereas these are not. As to the intention of the appointor to make a bona fide appointment, the only possible evidence is that of the duke himself, which is distinctly in the affirmative. In fact, it was the only thing he could do. It is probable that even the late duke, if he were alive, would no longer desire the fund to be kept in suspense; for the result of the former suit was to give Lady Mary a considerable addition to her fortune, and she is now as well off as the other married daughters. The attention of the Court was also called to the concluding words of the A. B. case which was sent to counsel previously to the former appointments: "The fear, however, is, that if such an absolute interest be apportioned to J. K. in the dividends, &c., she will promise and give over to her sister one-half, ... and thus defeat the intentions of the settlor," as shewing that the moral influence which the duke was supposed to be relying on now, and which was likely to be much weaker after the lapse of ten years, was even then by no means so strong as it had been represented,—at all events, far less strong than that exercised in In re Marsden's Trusts.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. A. Bailey, for the Duke of Portland.—The duke's answer is complete and explicit on every point as to which he has been interrogated, and the Court has no alternative but either to hold that his statement is wilfully false, or that he had a bona fide intention to give the absolute control of the whole property to Lady Harriet. As to the motive which might have led him to exclude Lady Mary, it is well settled that an appointment cannot be questioned on the ground of anger and resentment—Vane v. Lord Dungannon (2 Sch. & Lef. 118, 130); at all events, not unless the motive appears on the face of the appointment itself. From the very fact that her brother appoints to her absolutely, Lady Harriet will naturally conclude that there is no moral reason connected with her father's wishes why she should not accept it and apply it to her own purposes. She has so accepted it; it has been invested in her own name, and neither Mr. Bailey nor anyone else has any means of finding out what she does with it. The duke did not even know of her previous dealings with it by the order of the 16th of November, 1863, and the letter of the 28th of May, 1864, as appears by his affidavit sworn in June, 1868, whereas, he was by no means equally ignorant of her proceedings under the former appointments. Even if she feels a delicacy after what has passed about applying it to her own purposes, she may intend to give it to charity. But, even if the duke knew that she intended to give it all to Lady Mary, it was still the best thing he could do to give it to her unconditionally; for he thus, at least, shifted the responsibility from himself on to her; and he must otherwise have given it to Lady Mary himself, or allowed it to go to her in default of appointment. As to the mode of communication, the duke might well be unwilling, with the prospect of a fresh suit, to write a private letter which would be exposed to hostile criticism and every possible misconstruction at the bar.

Sir R. Palmer, in reply.—The machinery employed in the former case still subsists, except that the account marked " S " has now become Lady Harriet's separate account, and that what Mr. Ellis was then, Mr. Bailey is now. His letter communicating the appointment to her was a mere formal intimation of a formal deed, and the legal knowledge which she may be supposed to have acquired from the former suit, so far from operating in the way suggested on the other side, would lead her to attribute no more meaning to the words " for her own use and benefit " than they had in the former case.

JAMES, V.C. (June 7).—The late Duke of Portland was minded to place a very large sum of money in trust for his two daughters, Lady Mary and Lady Harriet, subject to a power of appointment in his son, the present Duke of Portland.

In making that settlement and giving that power the duke had certain motives, objects, purposes, and wishes, of which he made the present duke and, to a certain extent, Lady Harriet the depositaries. He did not, however, embody these in the written document which, and which only, it is competent for a Court of law or Court of equity to regard; and, construing that document as it must be construed, by the ordinary rules applicable to such instruments, a Court is compelled to hold that the duke had no such motive, object, purpose, or wish in making such settlement and giving such power. The defendants, however, persistently regarding those wishes, which, in spite of all the lawyers have said or can say, they with filial reverence hold binding upon them in foro conscientiæ, have involved themselves in the past and present litigation to which that settlement has given rise.

In the year 1854 the present duke, in the exercise of his power, appointed the whole of the property to Lady Harriet, to the exclusion of Lady Mary. This deed was executed without the knowledge of Lady Harriet, without any bargain with her, without any promise by her. The House of Lords, however, affirming the decision of the Lords Justices, having regard to the whole history of the transaction, the motive, purposes, and object of the appointor and the position of the appointee, and the relation and understanding existing between the duke and Lady Harriet, determined that the deed of 1854 was what in our technical language is called a fraud upon the power, and was therefore void.

After that decision the duke, in 1864, executed another deed of appointment, again appointing the whole to Lady Harriet. The only difference between the deeds of 1854 and 1864 is, that the one was expressed to be revocable, the other is expressed to be irrevocable. I cannot, however, find in the judgment either of the Lords Justices or of the House of Lords any trace of their decision being based on the fact that the deed of 1854 was revocable.

The deed of 1854 was not communicated to Lady Harriet, but that was a slip, an unintentional omission of a formality; and the omission was only important as affording corroborative evidence of how unsubstantial the whole transaction was. It is to my mind clear that if the deed of 1864 had been made in 1854, whether in substitution for or in addition to the deed they actually executed, and if there had been the formal communication of it to Lady Harriet, the result of the litigation would have been precisely the same.

The only other circumstances which I can see differing the deed of 1864 from the deed of 1854 are: 1, that all the parties are ten years older, and that Lady Mary and her husband, whose enjoyment of the property jure mariti was the thing sought to be prevented, have lived ten years more of wedded life; 2, that there was the former litigation between the donee of the power and one of the objects of it, in which the donee of the power was defeated.

Besides those two circumstances, and the fact that another piece of parchment or paper has been engrossed, signed, sealed and delivered by the duke, I can find nothing to distinguish the position of the parties on the day after the second deed was executed from what it was on the day after the execution of the first deed.

The lapse of ten years, and the uninterrupted continuance of Lady Mary's wedded life during those ten years cannot be prejudicial to her; and assuredly the fact that the donee of the power has been defeated in litigation with an object of the power is not one to give additional validity to the exercise of a fiduciary discretion intended to be to the prejudice and operating in punishment of that object.

It has been pressed upon me, more especially by the counsel for the duke, with a vehement, almost passionate, eloquence that I cannot decide in favour of the plaintiff without holding either, first, that the appointments thereby made in favour of Lady Harriet being tainted with illegality by reason of the circumstances under which and the purposes for which they were made, it was impossible for the duke to make a fresh appointment in her favour free from the same taint of illegality; or, secondly, that I must discredit the statement made by the duke's answer and affidavit. I do not find myself under any obligation to accept either alternative. As to the first, without saying that it is impossible to set what was wrong right, and to make any subsequent appointment free from the taint, I hold that it was necessary, in order to set it right, that something should have been done and said clearly, unambiguously and sufficiently to disconnect the new appointment from the old understanding, from the old purpose, from the old influences, which rendered the old appointment illegal and void; and that merely executing a new deed and sending a dry, formal, lawyer's letter to the appointee, informing her of the new appointment and of the legal effect of the instrument, were not sufficient for the purpose. And on the second point, I hold that every man must be presumed to intend and mean that which is the natural and necessary effect of his acts.

Now, when the new deeds of appointment were made things stood thus: The duke had said in his answer in the former suit this.—[His Honour read the passage above set out.]—Lady Harriet knew that he had so said, and the duke knew that she knew it. In Lord Henry Bentinck's evidence in the former suit this appears: "When I say that I have heard and believe that Lady Harriet also gave her consent to a similar proposal, I mean that I heard it direct from Lady Harriet, last July. She told me that she had agreed to carry out the late duke's wishes." The duke knew, or must be taken to have known, that she had so agreed. Nothing was said or done before or at the time of the new appointment to get rid of the effect of what had been so said by the duke and agreed to by her. The new deeds, therefore, must be read with reference to what had been so said and agreed to. They were made by an appointee who had stated what his hope was, and what the wishes of the late duke were, to an appointee who had agreed with the late duke to carry out those wishes. It is impossible to regard any cesser of hope or wish, or any change of motive or wish, if any such cesser or change there was in the recesses of the duke's own mind not communicated to the appointee, and the new appointments must in all Courts of law and for all legal purposes be considered to have been made to Lady Harriet for the purpose of carrying out the late duke's wishes and because she had agreed to carry out such wishes; and the duke must be held to have known that Lady Harriet would of course receive such new appointment as bound morally and in honour by such agreement. And what to my mind is absolutely conclusive as to this case is, that Mr. Bailey has not been called as a witness. In the former suit there was the most unreserved communication of all that had taken place with and been done by the legal advisers of the duke. In the present case Mr. Bailey was for all practical purposes the duke; Mr. Bailey was for all practical purposes Lady Harriet. The deed could not have come into existence without some suggestion or communication from or to Mr. Bailey. But there is absolute reticence on the part of Mr. Bailey. Mr. Bailey knew as certainly as anything depending on mere moral certainty can be known that Lady Harriet would be governed entirely by him, the duke's solicitor, as to what she would do with the money; and there was the order still in force to the bankers to deal with the appointed money as Mr. Bailey should direct. It was essential therefore to know what Mr. Bailey's intention, purposes, objects and views with respect to the fund were, for Mr. Bailey's intention, purposes, objects and views were the duke's; and Mr. Bailey, it is clear, has no evidence to give which would be favourable to the validity of the appointment. Mr. Bailey knows everything and says nothing.

All the material and relevant circumstances on the day of the execution of the new appointment were in my judgment essentially the same as they were at the time of the execution of those former appointments which were pronounced by the House of Lords to be illegal and void.

My duty is simply therefore to abide by the decision of the House of Lords. That decision is binding on every Court in the kingdom, including the House itself in its judicial character. Some old writers have said that even the great Zeus himself submitted to the decrees of Fate. Perhaps the Duke of Portland, illustrious member as he is of the House of Lords, may be persuaded to submit to the decision of that House, and to feel that he ought not to struggle any more against the irreversible fiat of the law, even in his pious and honourable desire and resolve to do what he believes and knows (as, if it were permitted to me to speak otherwise than in my judicial capacity, I should say I believe and know) to have been the real wish of his deceased father, the creator of the power reposed in him.

My decree will be simply a repetition of the decree of the House of Lords, with the requisite verbal alterations and consequential directions; including, of course, a direction giving the plaintiff the costs of the suit as of the former litigation.

Railway Company—Scheme of Arrangement—Debenture Holder—Assent of Creditors—Majority Holders of Invalid Debentures—30 & 31 Vict. c. 127. s. 10.

issued; but he will be bound unless he can shew that the assent of the majority was obtained by fraud.

This was a petition for obtaining the confirmation of a scheme between the company and their creditors, filed under the provisions of the Companies' Act, 1867.

The company, under the powers of their original act, passed in 1864, had issued and called up the whole of their original share capital of 300,000*l.*, divided into 15,000 shares of 20*l.* each, and, with the exception of 420*l.*, they had borrowed on debentures the whole sum of 100,000*l.*, which by their act they were authorized so to borrow. The company's debts and liabilities were about 8,700*l.* for arrears of interest on debentures down to the 31st of July, 1868; 6,800*l.* for principal due on certain debentures then due; and 92,700*l.* for principal on their other debentures, to fall due before January, 1871; debts to outside creditors exclusive of landowners, nearly 46,380*l.*; due in respect of purchases of lands not completed, about 35,000*l.*; and for costs in relation to such purchases, about 5,000*l.* The company had partially completed twenty out of thirty-three miles of their railway, but no part had been opened for traffic, and they had made or paid deposits for purchase-money, and held for the purposes of their undertaking land to the value of 43,000*l.* Beyond this the company had no other property of any sort, and they stated that they were quite unable to meet their engagements and liabilities to the outside creditors, or to pay the interest or principal due on their debentures, and for want of funds the works upon the said line of railway had been stopped since August, 1866.

By the East and West Junction Railway (Capital) Act, 1866, the company was empowered to raise additional capital to the amount of 300,000*l.*, and 100,000*l.* upon debentures, and special resolutions of the company had been passed authorizing the directors to raise such additional share capital, but no part of it had in fact been raised.

The company proposed by their scheme, 1. That the directors be at liberty to enter into a contract for the completion of the railway within twenty-four months at a sum not exceeding 230,000*l.* 2. That in lieu of the additional 300,000*l.* share capital and 100,000*l.* debenture capital authorized to be raised as before stated, there should be created and issued at a discount not exceeding 20*l.* per cent. on the nominal amount thereof, debenture stock, to be called first debenture stock, to the amount of 400,000*l.*, bearing a fixed and perpetual preferential interest at 5*l.* per cent. 3. That the first debenture stock and the interest thereof should be a first charge upon the company's undertaking, and have priority over the existing debentures of the company and interest already or thereafter to become due thereon. 4. That the existing debentures be converted into a sum of 100,000*l.* second debenture stock, bearing interest as from six months after the date of the opening of the line at 6*l.* per cent., payable only out of the net profits of the year during which such interest accrued, and having priority over all other charges except the first debenture stock. 5. That there should also be created and issued a third debenture stock, not exceeding 100,000*l.*, bearing interest at 6*l.* per cent., payable out of the net profits of the half-year during which it should accrue as from six months after the opening of the line, to rank next in priority after the second debenture stock, and to be allotted to and taken at par by outside creditors of the company (including the 8,700*l.* arrears of interest due upon debentures, and the future interest to accrue due upon the debentures and debts of the outside creditors from the 31st of July, 1868, to the expiration of six months after the opening of the line) as fully paid-up stock, according to the amount of their respective debts and in satisfaction thereof. The first debenture stock, or the moneys to be raised thereby, to be applied, first, in payment of the purchase-moneys and costs in respect of the land acquired for the undertaking; secondly, in payment to a contractor for the completion of the railway; thirdly, in payment of the interest on the first debenture stock to the expiration of twelve months after the completion of the line.

The scheme was assented to unanimously at a special meeting of shareholders convened specially for that purpose, at which shareholders representing 161,440*l.* of the company's shares had been present. Debenture-holders of the company representing 75,280*l.* out of 99,580*l.*, being more than three-fourths in value, had also assented to it; and the directors stated they had the concurrence of nearly the whole of the company's outside creditors.

The confirmation of the scheme was opposed by Mr. Toogood, a holder of nine debentures of 500*l.* each, and by Mr. Pell, an outside creditor. Mr. Toogood had obtained judgment against the company for arrears of interest due upon his debentures, and had also filed his bill in this Court to enforce his securities. Mr. Pell, who was a solicitor, claimed to be a creditor to the amount of 15,000*l.* for costs and professional charges. But he had delivered to the company no detailed account or bill of costs, and the company disputed his claim.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. Fry, for the railway company, supported the application.

They referred to In re The Teign Valley Railway Company (17 L. T. 201).

Mr. Dale, for outside creditors to the amount of 25,000*l.*, supported the application.

Mr. Westlake, for Mr. Pell, an outside creditor, opposed the scheme, upon the authority of In re The Cambrian Railway Company's Scheme (37 L. J. Ch. 409; L. R. 3 Ch. 278); In re The Bristol and North Somerset Railway Company (37 L. J. Ch. 851; L. R. 6 Eq. 448).

[JAMES, V.C. intimated his opinion that the scheme did not attempt to bind outside creditors.]

Mr. Kay and Mr. Higgins, for Mr. Toogood, opposed the application.

[JAMES, V.C. said, that debenture-holders bound by the statutory majority of assenting debenture-holders could not come to oppose the scheme, except under circumstances which would justify a cestui que trust in coming to oppose the conduct of his trustee.]

In this case there were special grounds for the interference of the Court. The debentures had been fraudulently issued by the company, before they had the requisite amount of share capital required by their special act subscribed for. The majority of debenture-holders were the holders of invalid debentures, and were not entitled to vote or bind the others. Then, again, the act of 1867 applied only to bona fide shareholders who had paid for their shares; that was not so here, and Mr. Toogood, as a debenture-holder, was entitled to come and realize his security—Furness v. the Caterham Railway Company (27 Beav. 358).

Then there was another point: many of the debenture-holders who formed the statutory majority were also shareholders having opposing interests. They could not be reckoned in the majority so as to bind dissenting debenture-holders.

JAMES, V.C. (without calling for a reply) said that, notwithstanding the objections which had been taken to the scheme, he was of opinion that it must be confirmed. As to the objection with regard to outside creditors, the Court had already stated its opinion that, according to the true construction of the scheme, it did not bind, and did not purport to bind, the creditors mentioned in paragraph 5. to accept debentures in payment of their debts. The scheme only pointed to an arrangement by which they were willing to do so. That disposed of the objection of Mr. Pell. If his Honour had thought that the effect of the scheme would be to deprive any creditor of a reasonable prospect of being paid, he should have had more hesitation in confirming it, but it was evident that, unless some scheme were resorted to, there would be nothing whatever for outside creditors.

With regard to debenture-holders the case might be different, for there might be some value in the land taken by the railway. As he understood the act of 1867, a majority of three-fourths in value of the debenture-holders could, by their assent in writing to the scheme, bind all the other debenture-holders, and upon such assent having been given the scheme should be deemed to have been assented to by all the debenture-holders. So that in this case the debenture-holder, who now came to dispute the scheme, must be taken, in fact, to have assented to it by the vote of the majority. It would be open to a debenture-holder to shew that the assent of this majority had been obtained by fraud, as, for instance, by means of bribes, and that would be a very substantial objection. But in this case there was nothing to shew that the majority was obtained in any way by fraud, or to shew that the debenture-holders who had assented were not bona fide debenture-holders, or that the act had in any way not been complied with. The question was not whether there had been fraud in originally issuing the debentures, but whether there had been any fraud in obtaining the consent of the debenture-holders. There was no evidence of any such fraud, and therefore all the debenture-holders were bound by the assent of the majority. The proposed arrangement seemed the best thing to be done under the circumstances, and he must confirm the scheme.

Companies' Act, 1862, ss. 159, 160—Winding-up—Compromise—Sanction of Court.

COMPANY.—The Court has jurisdiction, under sections 159. and 160. of the Companies' Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), to sanction a compromise between a company and its creditors and contributories, and to declare such compromise binding upon dissentient creditors and contributories.

This was a petition by the official liquidator of the above-named company to obtain the sanction of the Court to a compromise proposed to be made under section 160. of the Companies' Act, 1862, between the creditors and contributories, which should be binding on all parties.

The company had, in 1864, been incorporated by charter obtained by certain members of an older corporation called the Commercial Bank of India, to whose business the present corporation had succeeded.

The present corporation having, by order, dated the 28th of May, 1866, been ordered to be wound up, many intricate and expensive litigated questions arose between various classes of creditors and contributories; and in particular a suit was instituted by the older against the present bank, involving claims to a large amount.

In order to put a stop to the enormous litigation which was otherwise inevitable a compromise was arranged between the creditors and contributories, the particulars of which it is unnecessary to state further than that the creditors were to receive 17*s.* in the pound, and all proceedings were to be stayed.

The proposed scheme was approved by 821 out of about 1,100 creditors. only eight dissenting, the remainder being silent; the assenting creditors representing 2,250,000*l.* and the dissenting 25,000*l.* in value. Of the contributories 332, holding nearly two-thirds of the shares, assented, one dissented, and 102 were silent.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. Kekewich, for the petitioners, submitted that the Court had jurisdiction to sanction the compromise and make it binding on all parties under sections 159, 160, of the Companies' Act, 1862. They referred to the judgments of the Privy Council in the case of The Bank of Hindustan, China and Japan v. the Eastern Financial Corporation (17 W. R. 554), on the 15th of March, 1869, in which it was held that under the similar sections of the Indian Companies' Act (Indian Act of 1866, sections 173, 174, which are substantially the same as sections 159. and 160. of the Companies' Act, 1862), the High Court of Judicature in Bombay had such jurisdiction.

Mr. Southgate and Mr. H. F. Bristowe, for the old bank.

Mr. Jessell, Mr. Swanston, Mr. W. F. Robinson, Mr. Fischer, Mr. Lindley and Mr. Ferrers, for other parties.

Mr. Devigne, a creditor for 3,600*l*., one of the eight dissentient creditors, opposed the application in person.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—Having had much experience of the winding up of companies, and having on many occasions had this company before me, I feel the strongest opinion that this compromise ought to be carried into effect. It seemed to me probable that the present litigations would, if allowed to go on, grow into the largest and most expensive ever known. The result would, in my opinion, be that many persons would be ruined, that enormous time would be consumed, and the litigation would in all probability outlast the lives of many of the persons concerned in it. I have therefore decided to assist this compromise by expressing my very strongest opinion in favour of it.—[His Lordship then shewed from the statistics stated above that the scheme was approved by a large majority of creditors and contributories both in number and value.]—I am satisfied that by this arrangement the creditors will not only obtain speedier payment, but will also lose less by accepting 17*s*. in the pound than they would waste in costs.

My only doubt is as to my jurisdiction to enforce the compromise and make it binding on all parties. As to this I wish to read the papers in the case before the Privy Council, The Bank of Hindustan, China and Japan v. the Eastern Financial Association.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS (May 31).—I have read the judgment of the Privy Council to which I referred, and it leaves no doubt on my mind that I have jurisdiction to approve this compromise, and I now give my sanction to it. I repeat that if those who have objected knew as much of this matter as I do they themselves instead of opposing would accept it.

Company—Winding-up—Contributory—Infant Transferee—Acquiescence.

COMPANY.—A transferee of shares in a company, who at the date of the winding-up order was still an infant, is entitled to treat the transfer to him as a nullity, unless and until he has since attaining twenty-one done acts amounting to complete acquiescence. Such acquiescence was held not to have arisen, from the fact that the solicitors consulted by him appeared for him and many other clients at the same time to resist a summons for a call.

This was an application by Mr. Wilson to have his name removed from the list of contributories of the above company, on which he had been placed in respect of certain shares which had been transferred into his name during his minority.

Digitized by Google

The list of contributories under the winding-up was settled on the 8th of December, 1866.

The applicant attained twenty-one in January, 1867.

A summons to shew cause why a call should not be made was taken out by the official liquidator on the 9th of August, 1867, and served upon the applicant in Bombay, being made returnable in November, 1867.

On the 13th of October, 1867, the applicant's then solicitors entered an appearance for him, and on behalf of him as well as of several other contributories, opposed the call. The call was, however, ordered to be made on the 19th of December, 1867.

The present summons was taken out on the 7th of April, 1869.

Mr. Roxburgh and Mr. Ince, for the applicant. They referred to Lumsden's case (L. R. 4 Ch. 31) and Capper's case (L. R. 3 Ch. 458).

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. Kekewich, for the official liquidator, contended that the applicant by appearing to oppose the call and by his delay had acquiesced in and accepted his position as a shareholder.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I do not think that the fact that the solicitors, whom the applicant consulted, included him among a great number of other clients, for whom they put in appearances and attended to resist the call, amounts to such a distinct and complete acquiescence as is necessary to bind the applicant, who, at the date of the winding-up order, was an infant. Mr. Wilson's name must be taken off the list.

JAMES, V.C., June 5, 1869.

Ex parte THE LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

38 L. J. Ch. 527.

Lands Clauses Act—Doubtful Title—Valuation by Surveyor—Practice—Costs of Respondents appearing when not interested.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—Where there is a doubt as to the true ownership of land taken by a railway company, but neither claimant is absent or prevented from treating, the value of the land should not be determined by a surveyor appointed under sections 58, 59. of the Lands Clauses Act, but by the verdict of a jury, or by an award under section 23; and when the wrong course has been adopted the compensation money so deposited will not be paid out till the value has been ascertained in the proper manner and paid into Court.

On a petition (not in a cause) for payment of a fund out of Court, where parties who were necessarily served because of the title to the account, but had ceased to have any interest in the fund, appeared by counsel,—Held, that the proper course would have been to tender such sum as would cover the cost of consulting a solicitor as to whether they were interested or not, with an intimation that if they appeared their costs would be objected to, and that not having been done the respondents were entitled to their costs.

The company having given notice of their intention to take part of a certain piece of land, called Poor's Wood, which the Rev. John Frederic Fixsen, Julian Robins and James Spofford, as trustees of the poor of the parish of Merton, claimed to be interested in, and entitled to sell and convey, and being desirous of entering on the same before purchase, caused the interest of the said trustees therein to be valued by a surveyor, in the manner provided by section 85. of the Lands Clauses Act, paid into Court the sum of 64*l*., being the amount at which such interest was valued, and gave the usual bond to secure payment of such purchase money or compensation as might ultimately be payable, with interest. Subsequently a certain James Mathias gave notice that he, as lord of the manor of Merton, claimed to be interested in the said land called Poor's Wood, and therefore the company, on the occasion of serving the trustees with notice to treat for another part of the said land, also served the said James Mathias with notice to treat for the whole land required, had the interest of both claimants therein valued afresh, paid the sum so ascertained, viz., 750*l.*, into Court (to the credit of Ex parte the company, the account of the said trustees and James Mathias), and gave another bond for the amount which should ultimately be payable.

Subsequently the company, owing to doubts as to the true ownership of the land, applied to two Justices of the Peace to appoint a surveyor, under section 59. of the act, to determine the amount of compensation; the amount so determined was 476*l.* 5*s.*, which was deposited in the bank (section 64), and a deed-poll was executed vesting the lands in the company (sections 75. and 76).

The company now presented a petition for payment out of Court of the two sums of 64*l.* and 750*l.* previously deposited, but the petition was dismissed by Vice Chancellor James on the ground that the provisions of the act had not been complied with, inasmuch as the compensation to be paid had not been ascertained by the verdict of a jury or the award of an arbitrator. Thereupon the company issued their warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury under section 39, and on the 12th of May, 1869, a verdict was returned for the sum of 600*l.*, both of the claimants attending the proceedings. Such sum was accordingly paid into Court, to the same account as the former sum of 750*l.*, and the company now presented another petition for payment out of Court of the three sums of 64*l.*, 750*l.* and 476*l.* 5*s.* above mentioned. The petition was served on the trustees of Poor's Wood and James Mathias, both of whom appeared by Mr. Cookson.

Mr. Jenkinson, for the company, objected to pay the respondents' costs on the ground that they could not now be interested in anything except the 600*l.*, and therefore, although served, ought not to have appeared—Day v. Croft (19 Beav. 518). [See Morgan & Chute's Chancery Acts, pp. 73, 542.]

JAMES, V.C. thought the proper course in such cases was, for the petitioners to tender to the respondents such a sum as would cover the costs of taking advice from a solicitor as to whether they were interested or not, with an intimation that if, after that, they chose to appear, their costs would be objected to. This not having been done, the costs must be according to the act.

Will, Construction—Wills Act, s. 24.—Word "now"—Will speaking from Death.

WILL.—A will contained a bequest of "all my ready money, bank and other shares, freehold property, plate (family), books, and any other property that I may now possess":—Held, that the bequest comprised what the testator had at his death, and was not confined to what he had at the date of the will. Cole v. Scott (1 Mac. & G. 518) *distinguished. This was the hearing on further consideration of a suit for the administration of the estate of James Wagstaffe, who died on the 13th of August, 1867, having made his will, dated the 22nd of July, 1865, which contained the following bequest: "I desire that all my ready money, bank and other shares, freehold property, plate (family), books, and any other property that I may now possess, except the house situated at Plumstead, in the county of Kent (this belongs to my daughter Elizabeth), shall be valued, and if necessary sold, the proceeds to be divided into eight parts, in the following manner: First, to my only daughter, Elizabeth Wagstaffe, two eighth shares, the remaining six parts to be equally divided among my six sons (whom the testator then named). All debts that are now due, or that may fall due, on any liability that may arise out of this my estate to be equally divided amongst and settled by my said six sons above mentioned."

Mr. Jolliffe, for the plaintiff, who was one of the six sons, contended that the word "now" referred to the date of the will. There was a sufficient indication of a "contrary intention," within the meaning of those words in section 24. of the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), to prevent the will speaking from the death of the testator. The bequest, therefore, only passed what testator possessed at the date of his will—Cole v. Scott (1 Mac. & G. 518; 19 L. J. Ch. 63).

[The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I do not know of any case before the Wills Act in which the word "now," applied to personalty, confined the bequest to what the testator had at the date of the will. A will of personal estate was, before the Wills Act, construed as speaking from the death. The statute only extended to real estate what was already the law with regard to personal estate. There was real estate in the case of Cole v. Scott.]

In the present case there is a devise of real estate, though there turns out in fact to be none. In the case of In re the Midland Railway Company (34 Beav. 525; 34 L. J. Ch. 596), your Lordship said as follows: "If a testator had by his will said, 'I leave all the money I now possess in the 3*l*. per cent. consols to A. B,' it would, I apprehend, be properly confined to the stock he held at the date of the will."

[The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—That dictum was not necessary to the decision in that case, and now that I hear it read I am not sure that I approve of it.]

Mr. W. W. Cooper, for the defendant (who was one of the six sons and heir-at-law, and who on this point had the same interest as the plaintiff), supported the plaintiff's contention, and argued that as the word "now" had in the case of Coles v. Scott been held to make the will speak from its date and not from the death as to real estate, it would be very inconvenient to hold the contrary in the case of personalty, and thus impose two different laws of construction.

Mr. Southgate and Mr. A. G. Marten, for the defendant Elizabeth (whose contention was that the will spoke from the death), were not called on.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I certainly do not intend so to construe this will as to introduce one rule of construction for real and another for personal estate. I do not think that Cole v. Scott applies to this case. In Cole v. Scott the testator devised and bequeathed "all such lands and hereditaments, as well freehold, copyhold and leasehold, as are now vested in me, or as to the said leasehold premises as shall be vested in me at the time of my death," thus shewing that the testator had drawn a distinction between the date of his will and the date of his death, a distinction which had to be acted upon.

Now, a testator may make a bequest in three different forms: he may say simply, "I give all my real and personal estate,"—this would mean what he has at his death; or he might say, secondly, "I give all I possess,"—this also would mean at death; or, thirdly, he may say, "I give all I now possess." How does this differ from the first and second? "All my estate" and "all I possess" mean "all I now possess." Even before the Wills Act the will spoke from the death as to personal estate; but devises of residuary real estate being formerly treated as specific devises, a different construction was applied to wills of real estate. The statute removed this distinction, and to avoid uncertainty declared that "every will shall be construed, with reference to the real estate and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear from the will"—1 Vict. c. 26. s. 24. To raise a case of such "contrary intention," and to except a will from the rule of law, some clear and distinct words must be found in the will to indicate the intention. Such words were found in the case of Cole v. Scott. They are not to be found in the present will. I therefore hold that this will speaks from the death.

Copyright — Injunction — Literary Piracy — Plagiarism of Substance — Evidence—Damages.

COPYRIGHT.—Plagiarism does not necessarily amount to an invasion of copyright, and the author of a published book has no monopoly in the theories and speculations, or even in the results of observations therein stated; but no one, whether with or without acknowledgment, is to be permitted to take a material and substantial portion of the published work of another author for the purpose of making or improving a rival publication.

Accordingly, a defendant who had systematically, although in different language, appropriated in his book the arguments, rhetoric, results of observations and quotations from authorities from a previous book of the plaintiff on the same subject was held to have infringed the plaintiff's copyright, although the defendant had employed considerable labour and skill in altering, transposing and adding to the plaintiff's language.

Order of procedure where evidence is taken viva voce at the hearing.

Observations upon the question how far the Court is bound to give weight to the positive oath of an interested party.

The mode of estimating damages in cases of literary piracy.

This was a suit seeking relief against the defendant for an infringement of the plaintiff's copyright.

In 1865, the plaintiff competed at the National Eisteddfod, held at Aberystwith, for a prize offered for the best essay, in English, Welsh, French or German, on 'The Origin of the English Nation, with reference to the Question how far that Nation is descended from the Ancient Britons.' The essay sent in by the plaintiff was distinguished by his initials, L. O. P. No award of a prize was then made; but it was remitted to the Eisteddfod of the following year. The arbitrators, however, expressed a hope that the essay distinguished by the letters L. O. P. would be published. Accordingly the plaintiff, after having carefully revised his essay, published it in May, 1866, under the title 'The English and their Origin, a Prologue to authentic English History.' The defendant, who had competed for the prize in 1865, again competed for it at the Eisteddfod of 1866, and sent in a second essay distinguished by the letters

A. B. C. Z. The defendant, as appeared by his answer in this suit, finished this essay on the 13th of June, 1866, and sent it in to the Secretary of the Eisteddfod on the 2nd of July, 1866. Again no prize was awarded. Lord Strangford, who had been appointed adjudicator of the prize, summed up his judgment by a reference to the plaintiff's essay of the previous year, and stated that none of the essays before him could be held to surpass the essay of L. O. P. in any essential degree, or otherwise than in detached points. He, however, specially commended the defendant's essay in several particulars, though characterizing it as a work "essentially, indeed typically, secondhand, run easily off the pen by a well trained and very able writer." In July, 1867, the defendant issued a circular, calling attention to a book which he intended immediately then to publish, under the title 'The Pedigree of the English People Investigated: an Argument Historical and Scientific, shewing that the present Inhabitants of England have largely, if not mainly, descended from the Celtic Race, and especially from the Ancient Britons.' The circular, after stating that the argument of the book was framed with the view of proving "how largely the Modern are descendants of the Ancient Britons," and laying down the proposition that "the Ancient Britons were not subjected to a war of extermination by either Roman or Teuton," contained this passage:

"The monkish chroniclers, and, following in their wake, almost all English historians have given an account totally fallacious and totally incredible on this subject. Gildas is the great original authority! But who was Gildas? and whence did he derive the materials of his story? History surely has become too much of a science, and ethnology has pushed its researches too far to permit blind reliance any longer on such authority as his." The defendant's book, which was divided into three parts, was accordingly published in March, 1868, by Messrs. Longman, under the title of 'The Pedigree of the English People.' A copy of this book was, in March, 1868, sent to the plaintiff to review it for the Anthropological Review; and after reading it for that purpose, the plaintiff came to the conclusion that the defendant in his work had made an unfair, unwarrantable and illegitimate use of his, the plaintiff's, book, in infringement of his copyright. Accordingly he filed this bill. In it he alleged that "nearly the whole of the argument contained in the said third portion of the defendant's said book is copied from and a piracy of the plaintiff's said book; and the defendant has made an unfair and illegitimate use of the plaintiff's said book, so that the book of the defendant does not constitute, as it professes to do, an original work." This allegation was expressly denied by the defendant in his answer. He stated in effect that his book was a genuine original work, alleging that "the manuscript from which my said book was printed" (with the exception of certain appendices inserted at the suggestion of Prof. Max Müller, and of the Index and of some additional sentences and notes principally suggested by Prof. Max Müller and Dr. Rowland Williams) "is verbatim the same manuscript as that which I submitted for competition at the Eisteddfod in 1866, some months before I had ever seen or heard of the publication of the plaintiff's work." He also further stated by his answer that "if any portion of his said book had anything in common with, or corresponded to any portion of the plaintiff's said work, such correspondence had arisen from the fact of their having written on the same subject and drawn their materials from common sources"; and the defendant further expressed his belief that his book did not contain any sentence (with the exception of identical quotations) which corresponded with any part of the book written by the plaintiff, and asserted that he had compiled and arranged the plan of such third part of his said book long before he saw or knew of the existence of the plaintiff's work; and that the plaintiff's said book was not consulted by him, the defendant, until his manuscript was already in substance prepared for publication, and for the purpose only of comparing the same with his own MS., which was then substantially finished; and that his MS. was not substantially added to or altered after or in consequence of his having so consulted the plaintiff's said book.

The respective plans of the plaintiff's book and of the third part of the defendant's book, as described in their tables of contents, were as follow:

Plaintiff's Book.	Defendant's Book.
	PART III.
	The argument for admixture of race. The question to what extent is the English nation of Celtic origin discussed.
CHAP. I.—The historical evidence.	CHAP. I.—The historical argument.
CHAP. II.—The philological evidence.	CHAP. II.—The evidence of philology. CHAP. III.—The evidence of topographical and personal names.
	CHAP. IV.—Evidence of the influence of the Ancient British race upon the Anglo-Saxons supplied by the development of early English law.
CHAP. III.—The evidence of physical characteristics. CHAP. IV.—The evidence of psychical characteristics.	CHAP. V.—The evidence supplied by the physical, mental and moral characteristics of the English.

The bill prayed for an injunction to restrain the defendant from printing, publishing, selling or disposing of any copy of his said work containing the said third part thereof, for an account of gains and profits, and for damages. The plaintiff's contention was not that the defendant had copied passages verbatim from his book, but that the defendant had pirated from the plaintiff's book the plan of arrangement, arguments, ideas, illustrations and references to authorities which he himself had never consulted. The whole of the evidence upon both sides was taken viva voce at the hearing, and the effect of it sufficiently appears in the judgment.

A doubt having been raised as to the proper course of procedure where witnesses were to be examined in chief and cross-examined at the hearing of the suit,—

JAMES, V.C. said that the proper course was for the plaintiff's leader to open his case, then for the plaintiff's witnesses to be called and examined, and, if necessary, cross-examined and re-examined, then for the plaintiff's junior counsel to address the Court; and for the same order of hearing the defendant's counsel and the defendant's witnesses to be adopted.

Mr. Grove and Mr. Jemmett were for the plaintiff.—Their arguments consisted chiefly of a comparison between the two books and in pointing out the similarities between them.—They cited Kelly v. Morris (35 L. J. Ch. 423; L. R. 1 Eq. 697); Scott v. Stanford (36 L. J. Ch. 729; L. R. 3 Eq. 718).

Mr. Kay and Mr. Osborne Morgan, for the defendants, argued that the similarity between the two works was due to the similarity of the common subject-matter discussed by both.—They referred to Bramwell v. Halcomb (3 Myl. & Cr. 737); Spiers v. Brown (6 W. R. 352); Wilkins v. Aikin (17 Ves. 422, 425).

Mr. Grove, in reply, urged that the books were so parallel in line of argument, thought and quotation, that their similarity could not be attributable to accident. The mass of coincidences shewn to exist between them amounted to an absolute certainty of unfair use and piracy of the plaintiff's book by the defendant.

JAMES, V.C.—In this case the plaintiff complains that the defendant has piratically availed himself of his, the plaintiff's, labours, so as to be an infringement of his copyright. The plaintiff is the author of a work called 'The English and their Origin.' After this work had been published the defendant published another work called 'The Pedigree of the English People.' The plaintiff says in substance this: "I wrote my book in support of a theory that the English are not, as generally supposed, mainly and substantially of Anglo-Saxon or Teutonic race, but that, on the contrary, they are mainly and substantially of the old Celtic race, the same people which possessed this island before the invasion of the Romans. I proceeded to consider the subject under the heads of—1, The Historical Evidence; 2, The Philological Evidence; 3, The Evidence of Physical Characteristics." The defendant has pursued in the third part, which occupies by far the greater portion of his book, precisely the same plan, with this difference, that he has added a chapter on English laws; that he has made a separate chapter of the evidence of topographical and personal names, and that for the word "psychical" he has used "mental and moral." The plaintiff says, "That plan, which is in substance identical with mine, is copied from mine." He further says, "It was necessary to my argument to get rid of a good deal of what had been taught us as history of the Anglo-Saxon invasion, and I accordingly proceeded to shew that the stories of Hengist and Horsa, of Vortigern and Vortimer, and the complete expulsion of the British race by the Saxon invaders were mythical. In the investigation of that subject I traced the whole of what has passed for history to Gildas; and I proceeded to inquire to what extent, according to the canons of modern historical criticism, reliance could be placed on the narrative of Gildas, and I came to the conclusion, on several grounds, that the narrative is wholly untrustworthy. In the defendant's book I find that he adopts exactly the same course of argument,—the early English history is treated as of the same legendary character. I find it traced to Gildas as the sole foundation for it. I find the authority of Gildas then tested by the same canons, and the same conclusion which I had arrived at is also reproduced, and on the same or substantially the same grounds. It is not only the logic which is the same, but the rhetoric shews most singular coincidences." He says, "In my book there is this passage: 'There are probably few educated Englishmen living who have not in their infancy been taught, that the English nation is a nation of almost pure Teutonic blood; that its political constitution, its social customs, its internal prosperity, the success of its arms, and the number of its colonies, have all followed necessarily upon the arrival, in three vessels, of certain German warriors, under the command of Hengist and Horsa. Hengist and Horsa are a necessary part of a child's education; so are Rowena and Vortigern, and the Heptarchy, and many other pretty stories, which have found their way under the disguise of facts into respectable histories. The press even now seems generally to assume that the ordinary Englishman does not carry his historical criticism beyond the point which it reached in his childhood; and a Cambridge Professor of History does not scruple to dilate upon the merits of our Teutonic race.'" In Dr. Nicholas's, the defendant's, book, there are these words: "Before proceeding further, it is necessary to search into the foundation of the popular belief respecting the state of the Britons at the crisis of the Anglo-Saxon invasion, and their complete expulsion by that invasion from the soil of England. That belief is to the effect that the Britons, after the departure of the Romans, were in a completely prostrate condition, were incapable of offering resistance to Picts, Scots and Saxons, and were ruthlessly mown down by the sword without deliverance, a small 'remnant' only barely escaping, like sheep from the jaws of devouring wolves, into the mountains of the west, or as miserable fugitives across the sea to Brittany. This belief instilled to this day alike into the child's mind in the nursery and the student's in the lecture-room is, in all probability, as gratuitous and as impossible of rational credence, as any wild and idle romance ever imposed upon unsuspecting childhood."

The plaintiff further says: "I took especial pains with respect to certain physical characteristics, the colour of the hair and the form of the skull. I said that there was a popular theory starting with two assumptions: 1, That the Anglo-Saxons were a fair-haired, red-haired, or flaxen-haired people; 2, That the English are fair-haired, red-haired, or flaxen-haired people. I proceeded to demolish both these assumptions. The defendant has done the same. As to the second assumption, I proceeded to give the results of my personal examination of 4,848 heads in London, and proceeded further to shew from the population abstracts that London might be considered a fair representation of the whole of England—that it is peopled not exclusively by Londoners, but by natives of all parts of the country. I find in the defendant's book a similar statement of identical results of personal investigation; and, what is very extraordinary, I find that though the defendant's results are given as arrived at both in London and the north of England—6,000 in the one and 5,000 in the other—he, too, proceeds to shew, and to shew from the population abstracts, that the population of London is drawn from all parts of the island." "I proceeded," the plaintiff says, "to ascertain what was said by ancient authors, and with what qualifications their statements were to be received as to the hair, colour, eyes, and complexion of the ancient inhabitants of these islands, the Gauls and the ancient Germans. The defendant has referred to the same descriptions, and made the same qualifications. For example, I pointed out that when Tacitus (Tac. Germ. 4.) and other writers asserted that all the Germans had blue eyes and rutilæ comæ it was to be noted that the Greeks and Romans were generally dark-haired, and may have regarded fair hair as a rare and great beauty, and may have been struck by a proportion of light hair greatly in excess of that which they found among themselves. The defendant has done the same. Again having premised that the passages in which the Gauls or Celts are described have been carefully collected by Pritchard, I made a comment on the passage quoted by Pritchard from Livy (lib. xxxviii. 17), that the expression was 'rutilatæ comæ,' and not 'rutilæ comæ,'—'reddened,' not 'red.' The same comment is made by the defendant. Having come to the conclusion that the Gauls were in the habit of dyeing their hair of a lighter hue, I made a passing reference to the alleged custom now prevalent in France and England of dyeing the hair red. The defendant has made the same fashion the subject of a rhetorical paragraph."

"I referred to a passage in Suetonius (Suet. Cal. 47), in which it is stated that certain Gauls were compelled by Caligula to make their hair light or red, and to learn German. The defendant refers to the same passage. I referred to a passage in Strabo; the defendant has referred to the same passage. Then" (the plaintiff says) "I applied myself to the evidence afforded by the cranium, and, after examination of the authorities, I arrived at the conclusion that the old Celtic skull was, in the great majority of instances, long, oval, and singularly like the Greek skull. I proceeded to shew that the modern English skull is long and oval, and that the modern Teuton skull is on the whole round and short, and came to the conclusion that all the evidence, without exception, points to the Cymry as the progenitors of that part of the English people which possess the long, oval skull, and which constitutes the bulk of the nation. The defendant has come to the same conclusion from the same premises." The plaintiff says, "In arriving at that conclusion, I referred, among others, to the work of the Swedish author, Retzius, for his conclusion that the long, oval skulls found in the ancient burying-places of the Cimbri, who at some early time had dwelt there in no inconsiderable numbers, proved that tribe to be of Celtic origin, and I made a long quotation from him, in which he calls the long, oval form the true Celtic, and described a shorter Celtic oval form, with the sides more arched, which is Norman, and closely allied to the German; the defendant gives in substance the same things from Retzius."

These are some, and some only, of the points to which the plaintiff's counsel has drawn my attention. I have read both books carefully in the parts complained of, and if the matter rested on a comparison of the two works I could have no doubt whatever that the defendant's work was in these parts a palpable crib from the plaintiff's, transposed, altered, and added to—to use the words of Lord Strangford's award, "essentially, indeed, typically, secondhand, run off easily from the pen by a well-trained writer"—a writer, I would add, skilful in appropriating the labours of another and in disguising, by literary artifices, the appropriation. But the defendant has pledged his oath to this, that his work is an independent work, written substantially before he had seen the plaintiff's work, and that the resemblances are due to the nature of the subject, —to the object, which was common to both, of establishing for the ancient British a large share in the production of the great British nation of the present day,—to the obvious nature of the topics which such an object would suggest to any persons who had followed the course of modern historical criticism and anthropological research and speculation, and the like obviousness of the authorities which such persons would refer to and quote. His answer (par. 18) contains the following passage:—

"I say that the MS. from which my said book was printed, with the exception of appendices A, B, and C, which I afterwards inserted at the suggestion of Prof. Max Müller, and of the index and of some additional sentences and notes principally suggested by Prof. Max Müller and Dr. Rowland Williams, is verbatim the same MS. as that which I submitted for competition at the Eisteddfod in 1866, some months before I had ever seen or heard of the publication of plaintiff's work."

The defendant has been examined and cross-examined before me at considerable length. He adheres to his statement in par. 18 of his answer, with one most notable exception. He now states that the whole chapter about Gildas was written, or, as he calls it, re-written, after he had seen the plaintiff's book, and after the MS. had been submitted to Prof. Max Müller and Dr. Rowland Williams, and he, not an illiterate man, but an author accustomed to test the truth and estimate the weight of historic testimony, can give no further explanation of the deliberate and emphatic statement in paragraph 18. than that it is stronger than his instructions to his solicitor. It has been pressed on me that I cannot decide against the positive oath of the defendant without convicting him of wilful and corrupt perjury. I have had occasion more than once to say that this is not a criminal Court; that I am trying no one for any crime; I am here bound by my own judicial oath "to well and truly try the issue joined between the parties, and a true verdict give according to the evidence"—that is to say, according as I, weighing all the evidence by all the lights I can get, and as best I may, find the testimony credible or incredible, trustworthy or the reverse. The law which admitted the testimony of the parties and of interested persons was passed in full reliance on the Judges and on juries that they would carefully scrutinize such testimony, and would give it such weight as it deserved and no more, or no weight at all. Is then the result of the defendant's examination and cross-examination such as to entitle me to place reliance on his story? To begin with, I have read carefully through the whole of the notes marked A. and B, which were the materials for his first essay, and I am satisfied that he had not at the time he wrote them the remotest idea of that which is now found in the parts of his book complained of. To the author of A. and B. the common school histories of England were genuine histories. Hengist and Horsa, Vortimer and Vortigern were historic personages; there is no trace whatever of the sceptical criticism which will have it that the whole of that history, fit only for the nursery, is to be carried back to Gildas only, and that Gildas, if not himself a mythical or shadowy personage, is an historic witness wholly untrustworthy. Indeed, the author was so little versed in the subject that he tells us of Gildas copying Bede and putting in darker colours. There is no trace whatever in these notes of the examination of the ancient authorities as to hair and complexion of Britons, Gauls and Germans, and of the numbering of the colours and shades of hair of the present people of the country. There is no trace whatever in these notes of the examination of the evidence afforded by ancient skulls, and of the comparison between that evidence and the results of a careful examination of the existing types of modern heads, English and German. The plaintiff says, "If you did not take all this from my book, tell me where you took it from. Where are the materials from which you elaborated it?" The defendant is unable to say when or where he gathered the materials, or when or where, indeed, he wrote any part of his present essay. The collection of materials for a genuine literary work is a thing of time and labour. You cannot walk by instinct to the proper shelf of a library, take down the right book, open it at the right page, and hit on the right passage, and just the book, the page, and the passage which somebody else has found before you. The defendant has not a single rough note to produce, no trace of his quarrying in the British Museum, or any other like quarry, from which the stones of the literary edifice were to be built up. I have before me the defendant's diary from February, 1866, up to the 2nd of July, when the prize essay was sent in. Up to the 17th of May he seems to have been incessantly travelling and canvassing, and certainly does not seem to have had either time, or opportunity, or means for any such literary investigation or labour, nor is there a trace of any such work.

On the 18th and 19th of May I find an entry, "At Carmarthen, writing prize essay"; a similar entry in London on the 25th and 26th, and again on the 5th and 6th of June, the 8th and 9th, 11th and 12th, and on the 13th, "Finished writing do."; on the 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, 22nd and 23rd, "Revising essay"—which entries are the only light the diary throws on the subject.

It is certainly very singular that an author should not be able to give a single place or time when or where he consulted a single authority, and that he should not be able to produce a single original note, extract or quotation. Then there were some special matters on which he was especially pressed: "You have quoted, says the counsel, Retzius; where did you find him?"—"I cannot say." "You have quoted George Pouchet (Pluralité des Races Humaines, Paris 8vo., 1864); where did you find him?"—"I cannot say." It is to be observed that these works are not in the British Museum.—[In the course of the hearing his Honour had sent to the librarian of the British Museum to inquire whether these books were there, and had ascertained the fact that they were not.]—Again, he was asked about the public meetings at which it is stated in the book that 10,000 complexions had been marked for the purposes of this essay, with the detailed figures and the results obtained. "Can you produce the times and places of these meetings?" He is again unable to fix time or place. I have been therefore obliged to arrive at the conclusion that the account which the defendant has given of his composition of his work in the matters complained of is not probable, is not credible, is not trustworthy; and the result of his answer, his examination and his cross-examination, on my mind, so far from displacing, has confirmed the conclusion produced by the internal evidence and the comparison of the two works. This conclusion, however, is not sufficient to dispose of the case. Plagiarism does not necessarily amount to a legal invasion of copyright. A man publishing a work gives it to the world, and, so far as it adds to the world's knowledge, adds to the materials which any other author has a right to use, and may even be bound not to neglect. The question, then, is between a legitimate and a piratical use of an author's work. In considering this I have not been unmindful of the small comparative extent of literary composition that is traceable from the one to the other; I have not been unmindful that there was some not immaterial exercise of literary labour and skill in the transfusion and transposition which I have held to have been taken, and I have endeavoured to guard myself against any prejudice derived from my hostile conclusions against the defendant, which I have stated. I have considered it as if the defendant had openly borrowed from the plaintiff's book and had candidly acknowledged the source. And I think there is a good deal which he might have done, so doing it. There is no monopoly in the main theory of the plaintiff, nor in the theories and speculations by which he has supported it, nor even in the use of the published results of his own observations. But the plaintiff has a right to say this—that no one is to be permitted, whether with or without acknowledgment, to take a material and substantial portion of his work, of his argument, his illustrations, his authorities, for the purpose of making or improving a rival publication. That the part taken is in this case material and substantial there is no better evidence than the defendant's own circular inviting subscriptions.—[His Honour here read the part of the defendant's circular referring to Gildas, set out above.]—The plaintiff has therefore, in my judgment, made out his case, and he is entitled to an injunction to restrain the publication of the book in its present state, or of any book containing the 7th section of chapter 1. of part 3, or section 1. of chapter 5, being the parts connected with Gildas, the hair, colour and the shape of the skulls, and an order for the cancellation of those parts. He is entitled to his costs of the suit, and to an account and payment of damages. I stated at the outset that my view of the damages in cases of literary piracy is that the defendant is to account for every copy of his book sold as if it had been a copy of the plaintiff's, and to pay the plaintiff the profit which he would have received from so many additional copies, and I adhere to that mode of assessment.

Specific Performance—Mistake—Vendor and Purchaser—Purchaser misled by Particulars of Sale.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.—The defendant contracted to purchase a portion of an estate offered for sale by the plaintiff, relying on a condition that no building on any part of the property should be used as a public-house. The plaintiff, however, owned a small plot of land adjoining the estate, and indeed forming part of one of the fields sold, which was excepted from the sale, in order that a public-house might be built upon it. This fact was not stated upon the conditions of sale:—Held, that the defendant was not bound to complete without a covenant by the vendor extending the restrictive condition to the excepted land.

The plaintiff, being the owner of an estate at Chiselhurst, in Kent, of about thirty-five acres in extent, and called the Manor House estate, put up the whole of it except about one rood for sale by auction, subject to conditions, one of which was thus worded: "Each of the respective purchasers of building land at this sale shall, in the deeds of conveyance to them respectively, enter into covenants with the vendor not to build thereon otherwise than in conformity with the plan annexed to the particulars, and for the observance and performance of such conditions relative to the erection of fences, modes of building and using lots as are mentioned in the general stipulations as to building land annexed to the particulars."

These general stipulations contained a provision that no house should be used as a public-house or place of business or trade, and that no business, trade or manufacture should be carried on on the property.

The particulars also contained a map of the property to be sold.

The property was not sold at the auction, but the defendant contracted for the purchase of the greater part of lot 1, subject to the same conditions so far as they were applicable to a sale by private contract. The part which he bought contained the Manor House and grounds, and was intended for his own residence.

When the defendant entered into the contract, he supposed that the whole of the Manor House estate was being offered for sale, and was therefore subject to the general stipulations as to building land; but he afterwards discovered that the plaintiff was reserving a small piece, about one rood in extent, at a corner where three roads met, intending to build a public-house upon it. He thereupon insisted that the plaintiff's covenants giving effect to the general stipulations as to building land should extend to the reserved piece. The plaintiff, who admitted that he was bound to enter into such covenants in respect of all the land offered for sale, resisted this demand, and filed the present bill for specific performance of the agreement.

The defendant denied that he was bound to complete without having the more extended covenants, since he had entered into the contract in the belief that the whole of the vendor's property would be bound by the stipulation.

In his answer he thus explained the mistake: "The said particulars contained a map of the property sold, on which the whole of the lots offered for sale were coloured by different colours or numbered, so as to distinguish the one from the other; while the lands of adjoining proprietors were indicated by their respective names, but were left uncoloured. The plot of land so reserved by the plaintiff is shewn on the said plan, but without being coloured, and in such a manner as to lead any person examining the plan to the conclusion that the same did not form part of the Manor House estate, but either belonged to Lord Sydney or formed part of the Chiselhurst Common; and I myself had no idea from the inspection of the plan that the piece of land now referred to belonged to the plaintiff."

The defendant had been to see the property, and the plaintiff declared that anyone visiting the spot must have seen that the piece of land in question formed part of the Manor House estate.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. Jason Smith, for the plaintiff.—The defendant is bound by his contract, and no such mistake has been committed as to afford him ground for relief—White v. Bradshaw (16 Jur. 738); The Duke of Beaufort v. Neild (12 Cl. & F. 248).

Mr. H. M. Jackson (with whom was Mr. Jessel), for the defendant.—The Manor House estate meant, as the purchaser thought, the whole estate; and, but for the restrictions as to building, he would not have agreed to purchase. The Court will not enforce a contract to purchase founded on such a mistake—Webster v. Cecil (30 Beav. 62), even though the mistake be not common to both parties—Harris v. Pepperell (L. R. 5 Eq. 1).

Sir R. Baggallay, in reply.—The defendant did not contract in the expectation of obtaining a covenant which would bind this piece of ground. He says, he came to the conclusion that it was not the property of the plaintiff.

The Master of the Rolls (May 25) said: The question is, whether the defendant is bound to complete the contract, leaving the plaintiff at liberty to erect any building he pleases on this plot of ground, or to use it for any purpose whatever. I think that he is not so bound. I am of opinion, on the evidence, that he bought the property in the firm belief that no noxious trade could be carried on and no inferior building or public-house could be built on any part of the estate. And, as on all other sides the estate was bounded by Chiselhurst Common, Lord Sydney's property, and the glebe of the rector of Chiselhurst, it was morally certain that no public-house could be placed with any injurious proximity to the residence of the defendant if it were not on the plaintiff's estate.

It is said, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the defendant inspected the property and saw the field a part of which was reserved, and must therefore have perceived that the reserved plot formed part of that field, and that it did not form part of the property put up to auction. This, however, does not, in my opinion, remove the fact, which is sworn to by the defendant and is supported by other evidence, that the defendant and his adviser believed that the covenant would override the whole property of the plaintiff. The fact has great weight with me that nothing in the way of colour or of the name of the proprietor appears on the unsold plot, to mark that it was part of the vendor's esate. If it had been expressly stated in the conditions of the sale that the vendor reserved this plot for the purpose of erecting there a public-house, I cannot doubt that it would have had a very injurious effect on the sale of all the lots in the immediate vicinity of it, and would have seriously diminished the prices bid for them. I think the defendant bought in the firm persuasion that no such use was to be made of the plot in question, and that the acts of the plaintiff's agents in framing the conditions of sale as if including the whole estate without any reservation, and so framing and colouring the plan as to contribute to that belief, are such that he cannot now compel the defendant to execute the contract if he insists on retaining this plot free from any restrictive covenant. The defendant, however, cannot compel the plaintiff to complete the contract and prevent him from retaining and using the plot. The plaintiff is entitled, at his option, either to a decree for specific performance, with a covenant including the reserved plot, or to have his bill dismissed. In both cases he will, in my opinion, have to pay the costs of the suit. The error has, in a great measure, been the consequence of the peculiar manner in which the map and conditions of sale were drawn up.

It is very important to remember that the most perfect truth and the fullest disclosure are necessary in all cases in which the specific performance of a contract is required; and that if these are wanting, the same consequence will follow as if there had been intentional suppression, and the Court will grant relief to the man who has been thus deceived, provided he has acted reasonably and openly.

Bill of Exchange, Amount of, paid into Bank—Suit by Drawer against Bankers as for Money had and received on Trust—No Privity.

BANKER. BILLS OF EXCHANGE.—A. having accepted a bill of exchange paid money into his bank upon the express understanding that it was to be applied in taking up the bill at maturity. A. suddenly died before the bill fell due, and the bank retained the money in satisfaction of moneys owing to them upon A.'s general account. The bill was returned dishonoured to the drawers, who thereupon sued the bank in this Court for the amount:—Held, that there was no privity to sustain the suit.

On the 5th of April, 1867, Robert Kershaw, of the firm of John Kershaw & Son, accepted a bill of exchange for 738*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, drawn by the plaintiffs Hill & Warren, who carried on business as wool-merchants in Rochdale. The bill was made payable at the London and Westminster Bank four months after date, and would accordingly fall due on the 8th of August. On the 7th of August, Kershaw paid into the defendants' bank (Clement Royds & Co., of Rochdale) the sum of 745*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*, at the same time leaving with them an advice note of the bill, whereupon Messrs. Royds wrote and advised their agents, the London and Westminster Bank, to take up the bill when presented for payment. The next morning, however, about nine o'clock, Kershaw died suddenly, being at the time largely indebted to the defendants on his general account. Immediately upon hearing of his death they telegraphed to London to stop payment of the bill, and on the 11th of August the bill was returned dishonoured to the plaintiffs.

They now filed their bill for a declaration that the defendants Messrs. Royds & Co. received the above sum in trust to apply the same in payment of the said bill of exchange, and were liable to make good to the plaintiffs the whole amount, with interest and all costs and damages occasioned by the bill having been dishonoured.

The defendants denied that the money was paid into their bank or received by them upon any express or implied understanding as to the payment of the bill in question; on the contrary, they alleged that it was paid into the credit of Kershaw's general account, and that his estate being indebted to them (as was admitted to be the fact), in moneys exceeding the amount then paid in, they were entitled to retain the whole sum in part satisfaction of their debt.

There was some conflict of evidence as to what actually took place at the time of payment, but the Court came to the conclusion that the facts were as above stated, and that the evidence supported the allegations contained in the plaintiff's bill.[1]

It appeared that 150*l.* (part of the 745*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*) was actually advanced by the plaintiffs to Kershaw, at his request, to enable him to meet the bill.

Mr. Osborne and Mr. Locock Webb, for the plaintiffs, argued that the defendants having distinct notice of the bill, must be taken to have accepted the money upon trust to pay the bill, and were now liable for breach of trust. In any view of the case they were not justified in countermanding the instructions once sent to their London agents. As between the plaintiffs and the bank there was an implied contract.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. North, for the defendants, having referred to Moore v. Bushell (27 L. J. Ex. 3), and submitted that there was no privity between the plaintiffs and themselves to sustain the present suit, were stopped by the Court.

Mr. Dixon appeared for Kershaw's widow and administratrix.

MALINS, V.C.—Upon the merits of this case I am with the plaintiffs, and should be inclined to give judgment in their favour, but the technical point is too strong. In order to sustain the suit, the plaintiffs must shew some privity between themselves and the bank. No doubt, as drawers and holders of this bill, they have suffered by the bank allowing it to be dishonoured, which is the act complained of. The defendants ought to have given notice of their intention to dishonour the bill, and not to have received the money for the express purpose of taking it up, and then credited the amount to Kershaw's general account. But what is there on the face of the bill to constitute any privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants? There is no undertaking given to the plaintiffs on the part of the bank. The bill is in these terms: "Rochdale, April 5th, 1867.—Four months after date pay to our order 738*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, addressed to Messrs. J. Kershaw & Son, King Street Mills, Rochdale," and signed "John Hill & Co." Then across the bill is written in the usual form, "Accepted, payable at the London and Westminster Bank, London. —John Kershaw & Son." The only possible ground upon which the case could be put in this Court is that of trust; accordingly, the plaintiffs charge that the defendants, by receiving money for the express purpose of meeting this bill, became trustees for them as the holders of the bill; but this is clear, that if it could be shewn that the money belonged to the plaintiffs on the 7th of August, when it was paid into the bank, an action at law would lie against the defendants for money had and received to the plaintiffs' use, and the remedy would be at law and not in equity. But here we have the very point expresssly decided by the Court of Exchequer in this case of Moore v. Bushell. The circumstances of that case are very similar to the present, yet it was held that the drawer, the holder of the bill, could not sue the bankers for the amount, there being no privity to sustain the action. The money therefore is not recoverable at law; and on the same principle there can be no relief in this Court, and I have no alternative but to dismiss the bill.

June 1.—The case was again spoken to on the question of costs.

His HONOUR ordered the bill to stand dismissed, without costs as against the bank. Costs of Kershaw's administratrix to be paid of his estate.

(1) The following allegation in the bill is material with reference to the plaintiff's case. "It was customary when moneys or drafts were paid by the said Robert Kershaw to the credit of his general or current account with Clement Royds & Co. for the particulars of such moneys or drafts to be entered in a printed form, provided by the said bank for that purpose, with a direction that the same should be placed to his credit. But on the other hand, when moneys or drafts were paid by the said Robert Kershaw to his said bankers for the specific purpose of meeting any bills of exchange accepted by the said Robert Kershaw and made payable at either of the said bankers' or their London agents, it was customary for the said Robert Kershaw to pay such moneys or drafts to Clement Royds & Co. and to furnish them at the same time with a copy of such bill or bills instead of entering the particulars of such moneys or drafts upon such form or paying the same to the credit of his general or current account."

Equitable Deposit—Simple Contract Debt—Interest.

INSURANCE.—Where a policy of assurance was deposited to secure a simple contract debt, without any agreement as to interest, and the creditor paid the premiums down to the death of the debtor:—Held, following Carey v. Doyne (5 Ir. Ch. R. 104), that the policy was charged not only with the original debt and the amount of the premiums, but also with interest on both sums at 4l. per cent.

This was a petition, under the Trustee Relief Act, in respect of a fund of 1,073*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.* 3*l.* per cent. Bank annuities, representing a sum of 1,000*l.*, paid into Court by the trustees of the London Life Association. The petition stated that William Grace previously to the 8th of July, 1850, advanced the sum of 300*l.* by way of loan to John Kerr, who promised to repay the same to him; that the repayment of the said sum of 300*l.* "and interest" was secured by the deposit by the said John Kerr with the said William Grace of a policy for 1,000*l.* on the life of the said John Kerr, which had previously been effected by the said John Kerr with the said London Life Association; that due notice in writing of such deposit was given on the 8th of July, 1850, to the London Life Association; that the said William Grace died on the 19th of October, 1862, having by his will appointed the petitioner Thomas Bowman and Walter Bovill executors thereof, and that such will was duly proved by the petitioner alone, Walter Bovill having renounced probate. The petitioner, however, by his affidavit, stated simply that the sum of 300*l.* was advanced, and the repayment thereof secured in the manner above stated, without making any mention of interest.

John Kerr died in 1867 intestate, and in consequence partly of there being no legal personal representative, partly of doubts as to the validity and effect of a deed assigning all his property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors, of which a notice appeared in the London Gazette a few days after, and which was alleged to have been executed a few days before the deposit aforesaid (of which deed the Court ultimately took no notice, it never having been executed by any creditors and having since disappeared), the trustees of the London Life Association paid the said sum of 1,000*l.* into Court. Administration to the estate of John Kerr was soon afterwards taken out by a Mr. Murray.

It appeared that William Grace in his lifetime and since his decease the petitioner, as his executor, paid all the premiums on the said policy which accrued due after the 8th of July, 1850, amounting in the whole to 111*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.* No payment in respect of the said principal sum of 300*l.*, or of the premiums, or of the interest due in respect thereof, had ever been made to the said William Grace or to the petitioner, and the latter now claimed to have paid to him out of the fund in Court 411*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.* for principal in respect of those sums, and 352*l.* 5*s.* for interest thereon, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent., besides costs.

Mr. North, in support of the petition, said that on the question of interest, the only English authorities were Anon. (4 Taunt. 876), where interest had been given on a debt secured by a deposit of title-deeds and a promise to execute a mortgage, and Ashton v. Dalton (2 Coll. 565), where the point was discussed, but it became unnecessary to decide it. But there was an Irish case directly in point, Carey v. Doyne (5 Ir. Ch. R. 104), which decided that, if deeds are deposited by way of equitable mortgage to secure a simple contract debt, the debt bears interest from the date of the deposit, and by reason of it, though there be no express contract that the demand should bear interest. In that case the learned Judge (the Right Honourable Cusack Smith, the Master of the Rolls for Ireland) took great pains to inform himself as to the English practice, and especially as to the facts in the case of Ex parte Haigh (11 Ves. 403), erroneously cited in Christian's Bankrupt Law, 2nd edit., vol. 2. p. 278, and Powell on Mortgages, 5th edit., vol. 2. p. 945, as having decided that no interest must be allowed, if the debt without the deposit would not have carried interest. The general result of his inquiries was that he felt the same doubt as was expressed by Lord Justice Bruce when Vice Chancellor, in Ashton v. Dalton; but being bound to decide the question, he considered it, and came to the conclusion that interest ought to be allowed.

Mr. Higgins, for Price, the trustee of the last deed of assignment, objected to the claim for interest.—In Carey v. Doyne (ubi supra), there was a memorandum of deposit, which was considered equivalent to an agreement to give a legal mortgage, which legal mortgage would naturally include a covenant to pay interest. But here the petitioner does not allege any contract to pay interest, and such a contract will not be implied—Page v. Newman (9 B. & C. 378); Chitty on Contracts (595, edit. 1868); not even in the case of a legal mortgage where the deed is silent on the subject—Thompson v. Drew (20 Beav. 49). At all events, he cannot have more than 4*l.* per cent.

Mr. Daniel Jones, for the administrator of John Kerr, referred to Rhodes v. Rhodes (Johns. 653; 29 L. J. Ch. 418); Atkinson v. Jones (2 Ad. & E. 439); Price v. the Great Western Railway Company (16 Mee. & W. 244; 16 L. J. Ch. 87).

Mr. Robinson, for the trustees of the London Life Association.

JAMES, V.C. held that the petitioner was entitled to interest, though only at 4*l.* per cent. If he had had to determine the case for the first time he should have determined it in the same way as the Irish Master of the Rolls, who was a very able Judge, had done in the case which had been cited. An equitable mortgage by deposit was, in fact, equivalent to an agreement to execute a legal mortgage in the usual form, which would include a covenant for payment of interest; and, even if that were not so, he would at least be entitled to as much as would cover the damages that a Court of law would award. But anyhow he was bound by the decision of the Irish Court, especially on a point like this, on which it was very important that the laws should be uniform, but mattered little which way it was settled. There would, therefore, be a declaration that the petitioner was entitled to the 300*l.* and the advances for premiums, with interest at 4*l.* per cent. on such sums from the date of the respective advances. The costs of all parties (those of the insurance company as between solicitor and client, but not including any charges or expenses) to come out of the fund in Court, and the balance to be paid to the legal personal representative of Kerr.

Bankruptcy—Creditors' Deed—Covenant to pay in full at end of Two Years —Future Calls on Shares.

Digitized by Google

BANKRUPTCY. COMPANY.—A deed of arrangement, under the 192*nd section of the Bankruptcy Act*, 1861, containing no cessia bonorum, but postponing payment of the creditors' debts for two years, and giving to the creditors no advantage beyond a covenant to pay in full at the expiration of that period, is not necessarily invalid; and where there is no fraud or inequality among the creditors, the Court will not judge of the reasonableness of the deed.

At the date of the deed the company was still going, but was shortly afterwards ordered to be wound up:—Held (reversing the decision of Wood, V.C.), that as the deed provided only for existing debts, the future calls were not within its scope, and the official liquidator was not precluded by the deed from proceeding against the debtor.

This was an appeal from the decision of Wood, V.C., reported 36 L. J. Ch. 718, where the facts are stated.

The official liquidator appealed.

Mr. E. K. Karslake and Mr. W. W. Karslake, for the appellant.—Since the deed and the schedule of debts, which is in substance part of it, contained no mention of the official liquidator's claim, the deed is bad. The registration is invalid. Creditors who, like the company, are not parties to the deed cannot take advantage of it. Therefore, there is an inequality in its effects upon different creditors. Moreover, the deed is unreasonable in its provisions. The creditors get absolutely nothing for giving up their rights for two years. Dissenting creditors, therefore, are not bound by it.

They cited on these points, Johnson v. Barratt (35 L. J. Ex. 15; L. R. 1 Ex. 65); Stone v. Jellicoe (3 Hurls. & C. 263; 34 L. J. Ex. 11); Ex parte Godden (1 De Gex, J. & S. 260; 32 L. J. Bk. 37); The Chesterfield and Midland Silkstone Colliery Company v. Hawkins (3 Hurls. & C. 677; 34 L. J. Ex. 121); Ilderton v. Jewell (14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 665; 33 L. J. C.P. 148). In any view of the case we ought not to be precluded from proceeding in respect of calls made after the date of the deed, for those at all events were not covered by the deed. It will be noticed that the company was not ordered to be wound up till after the date of the deed, and there was no reason why it should be assumed that any calls would be made. Therefore, clearly the future calls could not be proved.

Mr. North, for the respondent King, on the first points raised by the appellant, cited, in addition to some of the cases cited below—Woods v. De Mattos (L. R. 1 Ex. 91; 35 L. J. Ch. Ex. 64); Gresty v. Gibson (L. R. 1 Ex. 112; 35 L. J. Ex. 74). And on the last point, again relied on Williams v. Harding (35 L. J. Bk. 25; L. R. 1 H.L. 9).

Mr. E. K. Karslake replied.

LORD JUSTICE CAIRNS.—There seems to be but little difficulty as to the first two calls. The debtor executed a deed under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, made between himself and his creditors, not by name, but collectively. Every person who was a creditor might have claimed the benefit of the deed, and enforced observance of its provisions. There is therefore no ground for contending that any inequality existed as regards different classes of creditors. Next, it was contended that the provisions were unreasonable, because it gave the creditors no advantage other than they would have had if it had not been executed, but it gave up rights. It is not the duty of this Court to judge of the reasonableness of a bargain between creditors and their debtors. It has only to see that the deed does not bear unequally between different classes of creditors, and that there has been no fraud or undue influence.

If it be free from these objections the law has, whether wisely or unwisely, declared that the majority of creditors shall bind the minority. As to the calls already due, therefore, I am in accordance with the Vice Chancellor. The only difficulty I have felt relates to the last call made after the date of the deed. The argument before the Vice Chancellor does not appear to have called his Honour's attention to the distinction between the two sets of calls, and I have not therefore the advantage of his opinion on this question.[1] The 75th section of the Companies Act, 1862, provides that the liability of a contributory to calls shall be a debt in bankruptcy, and that an estimated value shall be put upon future calls; and it was argued that this applies also to a proof under an arrangement deed. But the deed in this case is not in the form given in Schedule D. of the act. It contains no cessio bonorum, and is therefore not one of those deeds to which the act provides that the law and practice of bankruptcy should apply. It is a special bargain between the debtor and his creditors, and the Court must take the deed as it stands and endeavour to ascertain what its meaning is.

The recital seems to point to debts in præsenti only, and these the debtor is to be allowed time to pay, his property being in the meantime preserved from process. This provision is followed by a covenant by the creditors not to enforce payment of any debts "now due and growing due from him upon any security or otherwise." And then comes the covenant by King that he would at the end of two years pay to each of his creditors "the debt owing by him to such creditor with interest thereon at the rate of 5*l*. per cent. per annum from the date of these presents." It would be absurd to suppose that he would pay interest from the date of the deed upon calls not made till months after the date of the deed. There is a covenant to pay within three months the costs of those creditors who had commenced actions, with a provision as to their rendering accounts of their costs. It might be that future calls were not considered at all; and this seems probable, for specific sums are mentioned relating to calls in sundry companies, but no mention is made of future calls, as if it were thought that by including such calls the whole arrangement might be upset and the assent of the creditors not obtained. I lay a stress upon this point, but rely upon the words of the deed, and I think they do not include future calls. Therefore I must differ from the Vice Chancellor, and decide that the order, so far as it applies to them, must be discharged.[2]

Ante-nuptial Settlement—Voidance of against Creditors—Fraud of Husband and Wife.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE. SETTLEMENT.—Defendant, pending an action against him for the recovery of a debt, married a woman with whom he had cohabited for several years, and in consideration of the marriage executed a settlement of all his property. The Court, upon the suit of the creditor, finding that the wife had knowledge of the facts, declared the settlement fraudulent and void.

On the 12th of February, 1867, the defendant Robert Hunter received notice of trial in respect of an action commenced against him by the plaintiff Margaret Bulmer, for the recovery of 150*l*. and certain arrears of interest due to the plaintiff upon the defendant's promissory note.

(1) There seems to have been some misapprehension in his Lordship's mind on this point, as the Vice Chancellor's attention was called to the question of the future calls, and dealt with by him—see the former report, 36 L. J. Ch. p. 721).

(2) See as to including future calls, when the company is already in course of winding-up, In re Pickering (38 L. J. Bk. 1); and where the company is a going concern Martin's Patent Anchor Company v. Morton (37 L. J. Q.B. 98), and other cases cited 38 L. J. Bk. p. 1. note.

On the 15th of February, Hunter, in consideration of his then intended marriage with Sarah Pounder, settled the whole of his property (including his furniture and other effects) upon trust for her for life, and afterwards for his son by a previous marriage. The settlement (which contained a power of revocation) was prepared by Hunter's attorney in the action. The marriage was solemnized on the 18th of February.

On the 1st of March, the plaintiff recovered a verdict in the action for 183*l.* 17*s.* and costs. Judgment was entered up on the 9th of May; on the 14th, Hunter was arrested for nonpayment of the debt, and after two months' imprisonment was adjudicated a bankrupt.

The plaintiff having proved her debt under the bankruptcy, filed the present bill to set aside the above-mentioned settlement as fraudulent and void, alleging that it had been executed by Hunter with intent to defeat and delay his creditors.

It appeared in evidence that Hunter and Sarah Pounder had cohabited together as man and wife for many years previous to their mariage; and the bill charged that the execution of the settlement and the solemnization of the marriage, while the action was pending was hastily and fraudulently determined upon, with the privity and concurence of Sarah Pounder, in order to defeat the recovery of the plaintiff's debt.

Sarah Hunter (the wife), by her affidavit, admitted that she knew of the action pending against Hunter at the time of the marriage, but stated that Hunter had informed her that he did not owe the money for which the action was brought; she further swore that their marriage had been agreed upon long before, but was put off in consequence of her ill health.

Other facts bearing upon the case will be found stated in his Honour's judgment.

The plaintiff was the only creditor who proved under the bankruptcy.

Mr. Bagshawe, for the plaintiff.—The case comes within the principle of Colombine v. Penhall (1 Sm. & Gif. 228). It is clear that the intended wife knew of the circumstances and was party to the fraud; and therefore the marriage consideration fails. Moreover, the execution of this settlement left Hunter in a state of utter insolvency, and was in itself an act of bankruptcy within the terms of the 70th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134).

Mr. Herbert Smith, for the defendants, Hunter and his wife, and the trustees of the settlement.—The consideration of marriage is sufficient to support an ante-nuptial settlement, notwithstanding the indebtedness of the settlor—Campion v. Cotton (17 Ves. 263); Ex parte M'Burnie's Trustees (1 De Gex, M. & G. 441; 21 L. J. Bk. 15). Even if the Court imputes fraud to the husband, the wife is a purchaser for value, and is not shewn to have participated in any fraudulent intent. In the absence of clear evidence to the contrary, the marriage will be presumed to have been honestly contracted, and the settlement must be upheld—Fraser v. Thompson (1 Giff. 49; 29 L. J. Ch. 402). That case was reversed on appeal (4 De Gex & J. 659), because it was then shewn that the settlor had committed acts of bankruptcy within the knowledge of the intended wife before the execution of the settlement. But there was no act of bankruptcy in the present case. At all events, the settlement, if voluntary as against creditors, will subsist for all other purposes—Ex parte Bell (1 Glyn & J. 283); Smith v. Cherrill (36 L. J. Ch. 738; L. R. 4 Eq. 390).

MALINS, V.C.—The principles are plain. No doubt a man indebted may upon his marriage make a settlement of his property, provided such settlement is made honestly and in good faith. But it is clearly established now that marriage cannot be made the means of committing fraud, although it is necessary to shew that the wife as connected with and party to the fraud to make the settlement invalid as against her. Of course, if there was an act of bankruptcy before the marriage, the property would not belong to the husband at all. But this case does not go to the length of shewing that any act of bankruptcy was committed before the marriage. The rule I intend to adhere to is that which is laid down, in Colombine v. Penhall, by Vice Chancellor Stuart (1 Sim. & Gif. 256): "Where there is evidence of an intent to defeat and delay creditors and to make the celebration of marriage part of a scheme to protect property against the rights of creditors, the consideration of marriage cannot support such a settlement."

Now, what are the facts I have to deal with here? Robert Hunter, the settlor, had been married three times; the third wife died in 1856; his present wife had lived with him during the life of his third wife as housekeeper, and returned to live with him again shortly after the third wife's death. We have her own admission that from the year 1860 she was living alone in the same house with him, therefore she was bound to get married without delay, if there was ever any intention of marriage. Then she states that they had agreed to marry some time before, but her illness prevented it. There is, however, no evidence that she was ill, and I believe it is a mere pretence. There was nothing to prevent their being married before if they had wished it, and I have not a shadow of doubt upon the evidence that they were cohabiting together all those years as man and wife, but there was no contemplation of marriage taking place till after the notice of trial was served upon the settlor.

Then with regard to the plaintiff, we find that she was a creditor of many years' standing; the interest of this money was of great consequence to her, and she frequently importuned Hunter to pay off the debt or keep down the interest, while he as often evaded payment, pretending, amongst other things, that the Statute of Limitations was a bar to her claim, though there can be no doubt that it was a perfectly valid debt. She brought her action, and notice of trial was given on the 12th of February. Under these circumstances, knowing that the verdict and the trial would go against him, Hunter allows his solicitor, who clearly had notice of all the facts, to prepare this instrument, by which, in consideration of the marriage, got up for the mere purpose of giving colour and pretended value to the settlement, and pending the notice of trial, all his property is put into settlement; the deed is executed on the 12th, and the marriage takes place on the 18th of February. There was throughout these proceedings but one object, namely, to commit fraud; and on the principle of Colombine v. Penhall, to which I have already adverted, the consideration of marriage fails, and the settlement cannot be supported. The fact is, that the doctrines of this Court upon this subject have been much modified in recent times; it is clearly settled, in my opinion, that marriage cannot be made the means of fraud, and if that consideration is merely got up for the purpose of defeating creditors, the intending wife being a party to the fraud, it will not be supported. In the present case, I am satisfied that the wife had knowledge of all the facts and was implicated in the transaction, and the Court would fail of justice if it allowed such an attempt at fraud to prevail. I must therefore declare that this settlement is fraudulent and void as against creditors. When the settlor has satisfied his creditors, then he may give the property away as he pleases. The decree will be with costs against R. Hunter.

Implied Easement—Way of Necessity—Acquiescence.

EASEMENTS AND PRESCRIPTION.—If on the purchase of land there are circumstances shewing a clear intention in the persons interested that there should be a right of way over it, the purchaser, having suffered this intention to be acted on, cannot afterwards dispute the right, although it was not reserved in the conveyance to him.

The defendant bought the lease of a house with a road leading through it under an archway. The adjoining land was laid out for building so as entirely to surround a central plot (intended to be used as mews) with houses, leaving the road under the archway the only means of access; but the building was then so little advanced that the plot could still be approached in other ways. The lease contained covenants by the lessee to complete the house according to a specified plan, which comprised the adjoining land and buildings; but the defendant declared that he had never seen the plan. No right of way was reserved in the lease or in the assignment to the defendant, but both contained maps in which the site of the arch was described as a gateway. The defendant did nothing for seven or eight months, and then blocked up the archway:—Held, that he could not dispute the right of way, and injunction granted accordingly.

The question in this case was whether the plaintiff was entitled to a right of way over the defendant's land. In March, 1867, the lease of the land in question, with an unfinished house (called No. 2, Erskine Road) standing upon it, was assigned to the defendant. The lease contained covenants by the original lessees to complete the house according to a plan and specification approved by the surveyor of the lessor, and not to alter it without the licence of the lessor.

The plan thus referred to extended to a larger plot of ground, of which the defendant's land formed part. In the centre of this plot were mews, surrounded by buildings on every side, and approached only by a road under an archway leading through the house No. 2, Erskine Road. The defendant denied that he had seen the plan before he bought the lease. It had, however, already been partially carried out. The result of the evidence on this point was considered by the Master of the Rolls to be as follows:

In Erskine Road the houses were built and the passage under the house No. 2 was made leading to the spot where the mews were begun; the buildings on one side of the mews were begun; those on the other side were not. Some of the houses in Ainger Road (which ran at right angles to Erskine Road) were begun, but there was still complete access to the mews across the fields from Ainger Road; and, in truth, lime, bricks and other building materials were still constantly carted over the fields. The foot-pavement, however, was interrupted at the archway; the kerbstone was rounded off on each side, and the entrance paved as is usual in entrances to mews.

Neither the lease nor the assignment contained any reservation of or allusion to a right of way, but on both of them a ground-plan of the house was drawn, on which the site of the arch was described as a gateway.

The defendant, seven or eight months after his purchase of the lease, blocked up the archway with the view of turning it into a shop. The plaintiff, who had since the date of the assignment to the defendant become interested in the remaining part of the plot of land comprised in the lessor's plan, under an agreement for a lease, filed the present bill to restrain the defendant from doing so.

Mr. Graham Hastings, for the plaintiff, argued that the defendant having bought, subject to a plan which made the way one of necessity, the right was reserved by implication. He cited Suffield v. Brown (33 L. J. Ch. 249); Morland v. Cook (37 L. J. Ch. 825; L. R. 6 Eq. 259); Pyer v. Carter (1 Hurls. & N. 916; 26 L. J. Ex. 258); Ewart v. Cochrane (4 Macq. 117); Dann v. Spurrier (7 Ves. 231).

Mr. Southgate and Mr. Wickins, for the defendant, contended that, the grant having been made without reservation, the grantor could not derogate from it; and that the way was not strictly one of necessity. The buildings were not raised on all the other sides of the mews at the time when the defendant purchased, and it was then possible that the plans might never be carried into effect. They cited Dodd v. Burchell (1 Hurls. & C. 113); Worthington v. Gimson (2 El. & El. 618); Plant v. James (5 B. & Ad. 791; 3 L. J. K.B. 64); Thomson v. Waterlow (37 L. J. Ch. 495; L. R. 6 Eq. 36); Langley v. Hammond (37 L. J. Ex. 118; L. R. 3 Ex. 161).

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS (Feb. 10), after stating the facts, said—I am of opinion that this is and was a way of necessity; that it was apparent that it was; that the defendant had notice that it was; and that it is not now in his power to dispute that it was. In the first place, he saw distinctly the archway; he bought the house subject to the archway. For what purpose did he suppose that the archway was made, unless as a mode of access? Moreover, the foot pavement was interrupted, the kerbstone was rounded off and the entrance to the mews paved. The mews themselves were then in course of erection, and one side had been, if not completed, at least sufficiently erected to shew the scope and plan of it, and the words "Erskine Mews" were written over the archway. In my opinion, if he claimed or intended to claim the right of stopping the passage, he was set on inquiry as to the mode in which the lessees were bound to perform, or were about to perform, the building contracts they had entered into. The slightest inspection of the plan would have shewn him that the way under the archway was to be the only way to the mews when the design was completed. Does the defendant do anything? Nothing at all. He sees the houses in Ainger Road gradually rising; he sees the other side of the mews erected; he sees the access at the extremity barred by a wall. It is not pretended that the plan was altered to injure him, and when all this is done he says, "This way may be a way of necessity now, but till the buildings were completed it was not. You might have driven across the fields; and therefore I had no notice." This is not language which a Court of equity will allow a person situated in the position of the defendant to use. It is obvious that unless he wilfully shut his eyes, he must have seen that the plan gradually proceeded on the principle that this way through the archway was the only mode of access to the mews. I agree with the observation of counsel that the case of Dann v. Spurrier and the other cases of that class apply. The slightest inquiry or the most casual observation would have shewn the defendant, if, indeed, he did not know all along, as I believe he did, what was intended. I am of opinion that the injunction against the defendant in the terms of the first paragraph of the prayer of the bill must be made perpetual, and that the costs must follow the event.

Legacy—Set-off—Non-Payment of Interest by Tenant for Life of Estates charged under Term of Years.

WILL.—Real estate was devised to trustees for a term of years to secure a capital sum and interest thereon in favour of M, and, subject thereto, to the use of F. for life. F. was let into possession by the trustees, but failed to keep down the interest upon the charge. M. bequeathed a legacy to F, which the executors retained as a set-off against the unpaid interest:—Held, that F. was entitled to the legacy, there being no debt as against him, and no right of set-off in respect of the arrears of interest.

This was a claim by the legal personal representatives of Francis Morley in respect of a legacy of 1,000*l.* bequeathed to him under the will of Mary Morley, the testatrix in the cause. The payment of the legacy was resisted by her executors on the ground that they had a right of retainer.

The facts, as shewn by the chief clerk's certificate were as follows: The grandfather of the testatrix, by his will, devised certain real estate to the use of trustees for a term of 500 years, and subject thereto to the use of Francis Morley for life, the trusts of the term being to raise (by mortgage, sale or otherwise) a sum of 9,000*l.*, with interest at 4*l.* per cent. from the death of the testator, and in the mean time to receive the rents and profits of the estate, and after keeping down the interest on the 9,000*l.*, to pay certain annuities and permit the residue of the rents and profits to be received by the person for the time being entitled to the reversion expectant on the term. Under the trusts thereinafter declared Mary Morley became entitled to a moiety of the 9,000*l.* and the interest thereon.

Upon the death of the testator, in 1827, Francis Morley being then an infant, the trustees of the term entered into possession, and received the rents and profits of the estate until 1832, in which year Francis Morley was let into possession, and remained in possession as tenant for life until his death, in 1854. While thus in actual possession he failed to pay the interest in full upon the 4,500*l.*, and at the death of Mary Morley, in 1851, there was due to her for arrears of interest a sum considerably exceeding 1,000*l.*, the amount of the legacy.

The question which now came on for argument upon the further consideration of the suit was, whether as between the two estates there was a right of set-off and retainer in respect of such unpaid interest.

Mr. Cotton and Mr. Joliffe, for the representatives of Francis Morley.—The legacy is payable irrespective of any such right of set-off as is here claimed. The fact of Francis having been allowed to receive the whole of the rents and remain in possession as tenant for life, placed him under no personal obligation to keep down the interest on the charge. There is no debt or legal liability as between him and Mary Morley's estate. The remedy, if any, is against the estate; and her executors must recover from us, if at all, through the remaindermen. It is like the case of a mortgagor who has been allowed by his mortgagee to receive the rents without paying the interest on the mortgage debt: the mortgagee has no claim against the back rents.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. North, for the executors of Mary Morley.—When Francis was let into possession by the trustees, either there was an agreement with them by which he was bound to pay this interest, or if no agreement, there was notice of the trust, and Francis being cognizant of the breach of trust, and having received the whole of the rents with such notice, is personally liable as for money had and received for Mary Morley's use. There was a positive personal liability, and the executor has a right to set off the debt against the legacy, upon the principle of Courtenay v. Williams (3 Hare, 539; on appeal, 15 L. J. Ch. 204). There can be no doubt that the charge affects the life interest as well as the remainder, and although it was open to the trustees to arrange with the tenant for life that he should be let into possession, it could only be upon the terms of his fulfilling the trust and doing what they ought to do—Dixon v. Peacock (3 Drew. 288); Makings v. Makings (1 De Gex, F. & J. 355).

Mr. Cotton (in reply).—Our contention is, that there was no debt, nor could any arrangement between the trustees and Francis constitute him a debtor as against the testatrix; therefore, the right of set-off cannot arise. The remaindermen are not before the Court, so that their rights, if any, against Francis cannot now be considered.

MALINS, V.C.—This is a claim by the representatives of Francis Morley against the estate of Mary Morley for a legacy of 1,000*l.* bequeathed to him by her will; the payment of the legacy is resisted on the ground that Francis having been allowed to remain for several years in actual possession, as tenant for life, of certain estates charged with the payment of interest upon a sum of 4,500*l.* due to the testatrix, failed to pay that interest, and so stands indebted to her estate.

The chief clerk, by his certificate, finds that some payments in respect of this interest were made by Francis from time to time while he was in possession, but that there was due to Mary Morley at the time of her death a sum far exceeding 1,000*l.*, which is the amount of the legacy claimed.

Now, if this constituted a debt against Francis Morley, it follows that his estate being actually indebted to the testatrix to an amount in excess of the legacy, there would be a right of set-off, and so the legacy would be annihilated.

It is true that, Mary Morley not having received the full amount of interest upon her moiety of the charge, there is still subsisting an incumbrance upon the estate to the extent of that unpaid interest as well as the principal sum; but has she any personal claim against Francis, or can it be contended that he received this money to her use? He was let into possession as tenant for life: but a tenant for life merely because he fails to keep down the interest upon a charge not created by himself cannot be sued either at law or in equity for the arrears. He may be stopped from receiving any more rents, but he incurs no personal liability which the incumbrancer can enforce against him. The debt, in fact, is a debt created by the original testator, and not by Francis Morley, and he is in nowise personally liable, though undoubtedly as between him and the remaindermen there may be a question of apportionment. The case is quite distinguishable from Courtenay v. Williams, because in that case there was an actual debt, but here as I have said, there was no debt, the obligation to keep down the interest being an imperfect obligation, and consequently there can be no retainer. As was suggested in the argument, the case is very like that of a mortgagee allowing his mortgagor to receive the rents of the mortgaged estate without paying the interest on the mortgage debt; in such a case the mortgagee cannot call upon the mortgagor to account for back rents, though he is entitled to have his principal and arrears of interest raised out of the estate.

The result will be, that this legacy must be paid over to Francis Morley's representatives, and there will be a declaration accordingly.

38 L. J. Ch. 554.

Companies' Act, 1862—Contributory—Infant Transferee—Signature by Father of Infant's Name to Transfer.

COMPANY.—A father purchased shares in the above company, and had the transfer made to his son, who was then an infant, and at sea. From the father's evidence it appeared that he, or another of his sons, also an infant, had signed the transfer in the name of his son. The company had since been ordered to be wound up, and on an application by the liquidator to take the son's name off the list of contributories, and to put thereon in its stead either the name of the father or those of the vendors, the latter were ordered by the Master of the Rolls, and on appeal by the Lords Justices, to be put on the list.

In the month of December, 1866, Messrs. John Hunter Richardson & Thomas Richardson instructed their brokers to sell fifty shares which the Messrs. Richardson then held in the above company. On the 29th of that month the brokers, in pursuance of the instructions, sold the shares to other brokers, who, in the ordinary course of business, returned the name of "Charles Maitland, of No. 92, St. Paul's Road, Camden Town," as the person to whom the shares were to be transferred. A transfer of the shares was accordingly executed to Charles Maitland, and was with the share certificates handed to the purchaser's brokers, who paid the purchase-money.

The company having been ordered to be wound up, the name of Charles Maitland was placed on the list of contributories. His father, John Dundas Maitland, then made an affidavit that at the date of the transfer of the shares Charles Maitland was an infant.

From the depositions of the purchaser's brokers it appeared that John Dundas Maitland had given instructions for the purchase of the shares, that he had paid the purchase-money, and that it was by his order that the name of Charles Maitland had been given as that of the purchaser.

John Dundas Maitland stated, on cross-examination, that at the date of the purchase of the shares Charles Maitland was at sea; that he, John Dundas Maitland, purchased the shares for Charles in accordance with instructions given to him by the latter before he went to sea, and that the shares were paid for out of money belonging to Charles; that he, John Dundas Maitland, believed that the signature Charles Maitland to the transfer of the shares was in the handwriting of Henry Maitland, another of his sons, and who at the date of the transfer, was about thirteen years of age; but John Dundas Maitland would not swear that he had not himself signed the name Charles Maitland to the transfer, and could not recollect whether or not he had signed his son's name to the transfer.

From the evidence of the attesting witness to the transfer it appeared that John Dundas Maitland had produced to him the transfer already signed, and asked him to attest the execution of it, and that the witness had done so, thinking that he was attesting the execution thereof by John Dundas Maitland.

The liquidator had taken out a summons to have the register of members rectified by striking out the name of Charles Maitland as the holder of fifty shares in the company, and entering thereon either the names of John Hunter Richardson and Thomas Richardson, or the name of John Dundas Maitland, as the holders or holder of the shares, and that the list of contributories of the company might be varied by the liquidator accordingly, and that the costs of the application and of Charles Maitland might be paid by the person or persons to be settled on the list.

Mr. Southgate and Mr. Bagshawe, for the liquidator.

Sir Richard Baggallay and Mr. Lawson, for Messrs. Richardson.—The name of John Dundas Maitland ought to be put on the register instead of that of Charles Maitland. The evidence shews that the father was the real purchaser, and that his object in putting the shares into the name of the son was to escape liability. The father must be taken to have signed the transfer, and having signed it, though using the name of his son instead of his own, he is as much bound as if he had signed it in his own name.—They referred to Smout v. Ilbery (10 Mee. & W. 1; 12 L. J. Ex. 357). The transaction really was a purchase of the shares by John Dundas Maitland, and a settlement of them by him upon Charles Maitland, and Messrs. Richardson ought not to be prejudiced by the transfer having been made to Charles Maitland direct.

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Ince, for John Dundas Maitland, were not called on.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS said—It is quite clear that I cannot put Mr. John Dundas Maitland on the list. I think it is clear upon the evidence that he has acted very improperly. It is, no doubt, very hard upon the transferor if he is not made aware that the transferee is an infant at the time he makes the transfer; but I am of opinion that I cannot put Mr. John Dundas Maitland on the list as the owner of these shares. Of course, it is entirely without prejudice to any proceedings which the Messrs. Richardson may take at law or in equity to make Mr. John Dundas Maitland answerable to them. Upon that I say nothing. I shall not make the Messrs. Richardson pay the costs. The official liquidator will have his costs, but those are all the costs that I shall give.

Messrs. Richardson appealed, and the appeal was heard, on the 22nd of May, before the Lords Justices.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. Lawson, for the appellants, urged that the only person appearing in the transaction was the father, J. D. Maitland. He had given the order and he had furnished the money. It might be said, on the other side, that he had acted by the authority of his son Charles; but Charles was, at the time, a minor, and was therefore incompetent to give such authority. In Curtis's case (37 L. J. Ch. 629; L. R. 6 Eq. 455), which was also the case of an infant, the infant had executed the transfers; but in the present case that was impossible, Charles Maitland being, at the time, away from England at sea.

Mr. Southgate and Mr. Bagshawe referred to Curtis's case. They argued that, whether it were J. D. Maitland's intention to make a present of the shares to his son or to keep them himself, the effect of what he had done was, in any case, to make himself liable to be put on the list of contributories.

Mr. Jessell and Mr. Ince, for J. D. Maitland, relied on the evidence both of him and of his brokers in proof that throughout the transaction Charles Maitland had been referred to as the real purchaser. They cited Ex parte Budd (3 De Gex, F. & J. 297; 31 L. J. Ch. 4).

Sir R. Baggallay, in reply.

SELWYN, L.J. agreed in the view taken by the Master of the Rolls. It appeared that there had been no mistake in the name inserted in the transfer-deed. The evidence shewed that J. D. Maitland, the father, had told his brokers that he was buying for his son Charles, and by his authority; and it then became incumbent on the brokers to inquire into the circumstances of the transferee. It was admitted that, the transferee being an infant, the transfer could not bind him or take away the liability of the vendors, the Messrs. Richardson. Under these circumstances, his Lordship was of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed; and, according to the general rule, to which, indeed, he himself attached great importance, viz., that costs should follow the result, that it must be dismissed with costs.

GIFFARD, L.J. concurred. He was of opinion that the infant's name was intended to be the one inserted in the transfer, and that the father's intention and agreement was to purchase for him, and not for himself.

Suit to Set Aside Agreement—Jurisdiction—Grant—Description—"Warren of Conies."

MISTAKE.—The Court has jurisdiction to set aside an agreement on the ground of mistake, but the mistake must be plain and palpable, and it must be possible to replace the parties in that which was substantially their original position.

GAME.—The word "warren" may pass an estate in the soil, provided the context of the instrument in which it is used shews that to be the intention, but its primary signification does not mean an estate in the soil. Co. Lit. 5 b (b) explained.

A person having a right of free warren generally may grant a limited right by the grant of "a warren of conies."

The Duchy of Cornwall in 1799 granted to a person under whom the plaintiff claimed, certain lands, "and all that warren of conies, with all and singular the rights, members and appurtenances whatsoever in B, and that lodge or house thereupon built, commonly called B. Lodge; and all that warren of conies in R, both which said warrens of conies are known by the name of B. Warren, and to extend themselves in and over the wastes or east moors of B, F, S, and A, in the county of Lincoln." The duchy was seised in fee of the soil of the wastes, and had also a right of free warren in gross in them:—Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls) that by the words "warren of conies," taken with the context, no estate in the soil passed, but only the right or franchise of a "warren of conies" and whatever was fairly incident to or necessary for the exercise of the right of preserving and making profit out of the conies.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Master of the Rolls dismissing the plaintiff's bill.

The bill sought to rectify or set aside an agreement for exchange on the ground of mistake.

The principal question was, whether, under a grant from the Duchy of Cornwall, made in 1799, to one Thomas Pindar, under whom the plaintiff claimed, the soil in Bromby Common passed or only a right of "warren of conies" therein. The words of the grant, so far as they are material, were: "All that piece or parcel of woodland situate in Bromby, in the county of Lincoln, commonly called Prince's Woods, containing by admeasurement 23 a. 1 r. 11 p., or thereabouts. And all that close or parcel of pasture land situate at the east end of the said woods, and commonly called 'wood and close,' containing by admeasurement 4 a. 3 r. 24 p., or thereabouts, and all that warren of conies, with all and singular the rights, members and appurtenances whatsoever in Bromby aforesaid, and that lodge or house thereupon built, commonly called Bromby Lodge, and all that warren of conies, with all and singular the rights, members and appurtenances whatsoever in Redbourne, in the said county of Lincoln, both of which said warrens of conies are now commonly called or known by the name of Bromby Warren, and do extend themselves in and over the wastes or east moors of Bromby, Frodingham, Scunthorpe and Ashby, in the said county of Lincoln, which said several premises are parcel of the lordship and soke of Kirton-in-Lindsey, in the said county of Lincoln, and parcel of the possessions of the duchy of Cornwall, and were last demised, together with the fishery of the river Trent, by his present Majesty King George the Third, by letters patent under his Exchequer seal, bearing date the 15th day of August, in the year 1777, unto Robert Pindar, of Bromby Hall, in the said county of Lincoln, clerk, since deceased, for a reversionary term of nineteen years, to commence from the 13th of July, 1788, under the several yearly rents of 20*s.* for the said woodlands, and 3*l.* 7*s.* 4½*d.* for the said coney warren; and also all houses, edifices, structures, timber-trees and other trees, mines, quarries, waters, watercourses, roads, ways, easements, profits, commodities, privileges, advantages, emoluments and hereditaments whatsoever in or upon the said woods and lands and the said warren or warrens of conies growing or arising or to the same in anywise belonging or appertaining, at or for the price or sum of 800*l.* of lawful money of Great Britain, to be paid by the said Thomas Pindar within forty days from the date of this certificate of contract into the Bank of England and carried to the account of the Duchy of Cornwall, and from and immediately after the payment of the said sum in manner aforesaid, and the enrolment of this certificate, and the receipt for the said purchase-money in the office of the auditor of the duchy of Cornwall, and thenceforth for ever, the said Thomas Pindar and his heirs, successors or assigns, shall be adjudged, deemed and taken to be in the actual seisin and possession of the said woodland and pasture ground, warrens and premises so by him purchased, and shall hold and enjoy the same peaceably and quietly, in as full and ample manner to all intents and purposes as his said Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, his heirs or successors, Dukes of Cornwall, might or could have held and enjoyed the same, by force and virtue of an act of parliament passed in the 38th year of the reign of his Majesty King George the Third intituled an Act for making perpetual, subject to redemption and purchase in the manner therein stated, the several sums of money now charged in Great Britain as a land-tax for one year from the 25th day of March, 1798."

Mr. Jessel and Mr. F. Walford, for the appellant.—The duchy was seised of the soil, and had also a right of free warren according to the charter set out in The Prince's case (Co. Rep. vol. 4. pt. 8. 14 a). The words " warren of conies " denote a place, and must pass the soil. This is plain if you take the context, " all that lodge built thereupon ": a house cannot be built on a franchise. Besides, this is the usual meaning of the word warren. Co. Lit. 5 b (b); Sheppard's Touchstone, pp. 89, 96; Jacob's Law Dictionary, tit. " Warren "; Termes de la Ley, tit. " Warren "; Rice v. Wiseman (3 Bulst. 82). They also referred to Legh v. Heald (1 B. & Ad. 622; 9 L. J. K.B. 98); Marshall v. Ullswater Steam Navigation Company (3 Best & S. 732; 32 L. J. Q.B. 139); Cooper v. Phibbs (L. R. 2 H.L. 149).

Sir R. Palmer, Mr. Mellish, Mr. Speed and Mr. Jeune, for the respondent. —This grant is to be construed as if it were a grant from the Crown—The Attorney General to the Prince of Wales v. St. Aubyn (Wightw. 167); and in every grant from the Crown, every intendment is to be taken against the grantee and in favour of the Crown—Feather v. the Queen (6 Best & S. 257, 283; 35 L. J. Q.B. 200); The case of Alton Woods (Co. Rep. vol. 1. pt. 1. 27 a.). Therefore the strict signification of the term " warren of conies " is not to be extended; and prima facie that term is descriptive of a right, not of a situs. The right to warren and the soil are separate hereditaments, and one is not appurtenant to the other. The right of warren does not pass with the grant of the land, nor does the land pass by a grant of " warren "—Viner's Abridgment, tit " Warren "; 4 Co. Inst. pp. 298, 314. " Warren " never means both soil and franchise at once, and a man may build a lodge on his warren for preservation of the game when the warren is only a franchise—Co. Rep. vol. 6. pt. 12 (22); Davies's case (3 Mod. 246). They also referred to Bingham v. Bingham (1 Ves. sen. 127); Morris v. Dimes (1 Ad. & E. 654; 3 L. J. Mr. Walford, in reply.

GIFFARD, L.J. (May 29).—The judgment I am about to deliver is the judgment of the Court. Earl Beauchamp, the present appellant and sixth earl, claims through Henry, the fifth earl. He has appealed from a decree of the Master of the Rolls dismissing, first, the original bill in this suit, which was filed by the fifth earl, and, secondly, the supplemental bill which he himself filed. Both bills were dismissed with costs. The questions in the suit arise in this way.—

In October, 1864, Henry, the fifth earl, and the defendant agreed to exchange certain lands and hereditaments, with the rights and privileges belonging thereto. These lands and hereditaments were severally specified in two schedules appended to the agreement. The agreement itself consisted of six articles, and the earl was to pay, by way of equality of exchange, 3,400*l.* to the defendant. The provisions of the agreement are set forth in the 5th paragraph of the bill. The first schedule contained a description of the lands and hereditaments to be given in exchange by the earl. They were as follow: First, 162½ acres, in the parishes of Frodingham, Bottesford and Ashby; secondly, freehold common rights on the East Common of Bromby; thirdly, all the right or stray of rabbits or right of warren in the said East Common, with the appurtenances. The second schedule contained a description of the lands and hereditaments, rights and privileges to be given in exchange by the defendant. They were 55 acres 2 roods and 29 perches, lying in Bromby; secondly, all the freehold common rights or other rights, interests or property in and upon the West Common of Bromby; thirdly, all the freehold moorland in Bromby Moors, as set out by boundaries, containing 106 acres, or thereabouts; fourthly, a tithe rent-charge, payable out of the estate of the earl to the defendant; fifthly, a fee farm-rent of 7*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, payable out of the estate of the earl to the defendant; sixthly, the right and privilege of the exclusive use for twelve years of the warping-sluice to the defendant; seventhly, all the right and interest of the defendant, as lord of the manor of Bromby, in all that portion of the East Common of Bromby which lies to the west side of the public carriage-road, amounting to 115 acres, or, if less, to be made up to that amount. The agreement was duly executed, and possession given accordingly, since which time acts of ownership have been exercised by the parties on the property so exchanged. There have been no conveyances. In 1865 the late earl and the defendant promoted the inclosure of the East and West Common of Bromby. In November of that year the late earl sent in his claim to the Inclosure Commissioners, and in December, 1865, with a view to substantiate that and another claim, search was made amongst the earl's deeds and muniments of title at Madresfield, the family seat, when on considering a deed of grant from the Duchy of Cornwall it appeared, as the plaintiff alleges and insists, that the East Common of Bromby, and the mines and minerals thereunder, and under certain lands in Frodingham and Scunthorpe, were, by a grant of the Duchy of Cornwall, dated the 27th of March, 1799, conveyed to Thomas Pindar, his heirs and assigns, for ever. It is not disputed that all the property belonging to Thomas Pindar in this district passed from him to the Earls Beauchamp, and were possessed by the late earl, and that they are the property of the present earl. The defendant denies that the soil of the East Common of Bromby, and the mines and minerals thereunder, or under the lands of Frodingham and Scunthorpe, were conveyed by the grant of the 27th of March, 1799, to Thomas Pindar. On the contrary, he alleges that they were conveyed by a grant of the manor of Kirton from the duchy of Cornwall to John Julius Angerstein, on the 9th of July, 1799, and that Bromby, Frodingham, and Scunthorpe are part of the manor of Kirton. The defendant claims through Mr. Angerstein.

It is plain that all parties acted on the assumption that the soil in the East Common of Bromby, and the mines and minerals under the lands in Frodingham and Scunthorpe, belonged to the defendant, and did not pass by the grant of March, 1799. This the appellant alleges (as the fifth earl did before him) to have been a common mistake. He avers that the mines and minerals are of very great value; that, in substance, he gets by the exchange that which was really his without it; and therefore he asks the Court either to rectify the agreement, or to nullify the transaction and set it aside.

It needs no argument to prove that the Court has jurisdiction to set aside an agreement on the ground of mistake, but, as a general rule, the mistake must be plain and palpable—one as to the existence of which opinions can scarcely differ; and it must be possible to replace the parties in that which was substantially their original position.

In the present case the rights of the parties have been assumed to be such as formed the foundation of the exchange during a period of sixty years preceding the present dispute. In 1801 an inclosure act, the act of 41 Geo. 3. c. 74, was passed. Under that an act an allotment was made to Thomas Pindar for his right of warren, and to Mr. Angerstein for his right of soil in certain commons of the manor of Kirton. Again, in 1831, another inclosure act was passed—no doubt was entertained as to the relative rights and positions of the defendant and the then Earl Beauchamp, the defendant being treated and considered as entitled to the soil, the earl to the right of warren as distinguished from the soil: the several transactions under both acts are detailed in the 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th and 13th paragraphs of the answer to the original bill. Having regard to these transactions, as well as to those which are shewn to have taken place, as mentioned in other paragraphs of the same answer, it is difficult to see any just or sufficient grounds for a suit of this description. It is clear, on the plaintiff's evidence, that the existence of valuable minerals under the land in question was known to the fifth earl and his advisers before the date of the agreement for exchange; it is as reasonably certain as anything can be that the grant of March, 1799, was never supposed, either by grantor or grantee, or by anyone, until some sixty years after its date, to have had the effect now sought to be attributed to it; and unless that effect is plain almost to demonstration, and the true construction of the instrument so certain, and the rights of the parties under it so indisputable, as not to be open to serious controversy, we should not hesitate in coming to the conclusion that the suit was rightly dismissed. These considerations lead to a review of the arguments adduced on behalf of the appellant as substantiating that construction of the grant on which he has been advised to rely. They must be summarized so far as is necessary thus: First, The Prince's case, in vol. 4. of Coke's Reports, part 8, 14 a, was referred to. The charter constituting the grant of the duchy is there set forth, and the following passage, being the grant of free warren, was read, viz., from p. 10: "We have moreover, for us and our heirs, granted, and by this our charter we have confirmed to the aforesaid duke, that the said duke, and the heirs of him, eldest sons, dukes of the same place for ever, have free warren in all the lordships, manors, castles, lands and other places aforesaid, so as the said lands be not within the bounds of our forests, and that none enter into them, to hunt in them or to take anything which to warren appertaineth, without the licence and will of the said duke, or other dukes of the same place, upon pain of forfeiture of 10*l.*" Next, the following passage from Coke upon Littleton, lib. 1. c. 15 b, was cited: "So it is of a forest, parke, chase, vivarye, and warren in a man's owne grounde, by the grant of any of them not onely the priviledge but the land itselfe passes, for they are compound." It was stated that this passage was not known, or at all events not quoted, in the Court below. Sheppard's Touchstone, and other works of authority, were also referred to, as recognizing and repeating the law as laid down in Coke upon Littleton, and the case of Rice v. Wiseman was cited, and it was said that, inasmuch as the soil belonged to the duchy, it followed on these principles that it passed under the term "warren," and furthermore, that this view was fortified by the context of the grant, and especially by the words, "all and singular the rights, members and appurtenances whatsoever in Bromby aforesaid, and that lodge or house thereupon built," and the words "commonly called or known by the name of Bromby Warren"; and a series of leases was referred to, commencing in the time of Henry the Eighth, and ending with the lease of 1777 mentioned in the grant. It was urged, in addition to these arguments, that the 38 Geo. 3. c. 60, under the authority of which the grant was made by the duchy, did not authorize the sale of such a thing as a right of warren as distinct from the soil, but only the sale of a "tenement," not of a "hereditament"; that the authority given by the act must be taken to have been followed, and therefore that the grant on the occasion of the sale must be taken to be a grant of the soil with its incidents. It may be well to deal with these authorities and arguments, omitting only those founded on the context of the grant, before going to the exact terms of the grant itself. They can be, and in fact have been, completely answered.

First of all, the charter referred to as granting the free warren, as well as the leases, established that there was a right of free warren in gross belonging to the duchy of Cornwall, and extending over Bromby and other places. There is no ground in law for saying that a person having a right of free warren generally may not grant a limited right by the grant of a "warren of conies"; nor, because the term "warren of conies" is used in the leases and in the grant of 1799, and the expression so used differs from the grant in the charter, is an intention to pass all the estate in the soil to be inferred. The intention must be found in the instrument itself. "Warren of conies" is not so extensive as "free warren." The term itself was obviously taken from the leases, particularly that of 1777, and probably originated in the fact of the "conies" being in that locality the only beasts, or, at all events, the only beasts of warren of any value. The terms of the charter, therefore, do not advance the appellant's case.

With respect to the passage from Coke upon Littleton, Mr. Preston, in his edition of Sheppard's Touchstone, adds to the passage very significantly this observation,—" generally without any qualification or context." The passage uses the term " warren " generally. The primary signification of that word when speaking of " a right of warren," or of " free warren," or when speaking of " a warren of conies," most assuredly does not mean an estate in the soil. A grant of land or of a manor, according to the authorities, does not pass a right of free warren. A number of Exchequer decrees and proceedings have been quoted, shewing the use of the term " warren " in connexion with terms of locality. From these it is manifest that the use of the word " warren," and more especially of the words " warren of conies," does not necessarily, or usually, or according to any primary acceptation, mean an estate in the soil. To warren of every description there must be a local boundary; and it is impossible, in our opinion, to attribute any other weight or meaning to the passage than that " warren " may be so used as to mean to pass, and may pass, an estate in the soil, provided the context of the instrument in which it is so used shews that to be the intention. Then the case of Rice v. Wiseman appears from the reports to be this—[His Lordship read the report verbatim from 3 Bulst. 82.] The action, as is plain from the report of the case, did not involve any question of the right to the soil, and Lord Coke is reported as plainly admitting that the demise or grant of a warren in a particular locality, " as in his park," does not pass the soil.

There then remains the question said to arise on the act of Geo. 3. It is plain that the act confers a power to sell the two things combined, " land " and " right of warren,"—the greater must necessarily include the power to sell the less; that is, the warren or part of the warren. The estate and interest of the duchy in the soil was the manorial estate and interest in the wastes or commons, the tenants possessing rights as to the surface; and if the terms of the grant, according to their fair construction, do not convey the soil, they can have no artificial or technical meaning, because of the extent or nature of the power conferred by the act. Moreover, a right of warren is a tenement, as shewn by the authorities quoted by the Master of the Rolls.

The leases do not support the appellant's case to any greater degree than they do that of the respondent. They are, to say the least of them, but of doubtful import, and this being so, the question resolves itself into this, viz., what is the true construction, intent and meaning of the terms and expressions used in the grant? Those terms and expressions, so far as they are material, are these—" All that piece or parcel of woodland situate in Bromby, in the county of Lincoln, commonly called Prince's Woods, containing by admeasurement 23 acres 1 rood 11 perches or thereabouts." Here there is a plain description of soil. Then, " and all that close or parcel of pasture land situate at the east end of the said woods, and commonly called " wood and close," containing by admeasurement 4 acres 3 roods and 24 perches or thereabouts." Here, again, there is a plain description of soil. Then, " and all that warren of conies, with all and singular the rights, members and appurtenances whatsoever in Bromby aforesaid," this being a warren of conies with a locality; and then, " that lodge or house thereupon built, commonly called Bromby Lodge;" and then all that warren of conies, with all and singular the rights, members and appurtenances whatsoever in Redbourne, in the said county of Lincoln," again a warren of conies with a locality. And then, " both which said warrens," &c. —[His Lordship read to the end of the grant as set out above.]

The demise of 1777 referred to in the grant contains a description similar in terms to that which I have read from the grant, and it contains this reservation or exception, " Excepting nevertheless and always reserving to us, our heirs and successors, all timber trees, and all fair saplings, oaks apt to become timber, and also sufficient stabbles in every acre of the said woodland according to the form of the statute in that case made and provided, and also all mines and quarries of and in the said premises, which said premises are parcel of the lordship and soke of Kirton, or in Lindsey aforesaid, and parcel of the possessions of the Duchy of Cornwall;" and the rent reserved is as follows: "Under the several yearly rents following, that is to say, for and out of the woodland, the sum of 20*s.*; for the coney warren, the sum of 3*l.* 7*s.* 4½*d.*; and for the fishery, the sum of 10*s.*;" and there is a covenant to keep the coney warren stocked and stored with a sufficient number of conies, and a provision for the lease to become void in the event, amongst other things, of default being made in payment of the rents, or any of them and a proviso for re-entry and resumption of the premises. The lease follows the description in former leases. Two only have been produced in which the warren of conies was alone leased without lands being in terms leased with it. In those there was no reservation of mines and minerals. The first observation that occurs is, that there is no grant of moors or wastes; the next, that where land is intended to be granted, the grant and description are unmistakable and explicit; the next, that there is not a grant of "the warren" simpliciter, but of all that warren of conies with a fixed locality, that is, as regards the first, in "Bromby aforesaid," as regards the second in Redbourne. Both are further stated to be commonly called, or known as Bromby Warren, and to extend over certain "wastes or east moors." There is not, as has been before said, any grant of the wastes or east moors. The grant of a warren of conies is essentially a grant of the conies and the right to take and kill the conies. A grant of a warren in a particular locality, or "as in a parke," Lord Coke himself admits does not pass the soil, and here there is plainly nothing more. That the warrens are "commonly called Bromby Warren," and are situate in particular places, and extend over particular wastes or moors, in no way extends the meaning of the words "warren of conies" to an estate in the soil, and cannot either in technical legal language, or according to any rule or mode of construction, technical or untechnical, be held to have any such effect. The reservation of mines and minerals in the lease applies to the land plainly and actually demised. The rent is reserved out of the land, but for the warren, and the addition of "that house or lodge thereupon built, commonly called Bromby Lodge," seeing that a lodge or house is incident to a warren, and always has been, and always has been leased and dealt with in connexion with the right of warren in question—that "thereupon" may either mean in "Bromby," or built there for the purposes of the warren, or connected with or incident to the warren—seeing this, the addition is wholly insufficient to shew that an estate in the wastes or east moors was intended to pass. In fine, nothing of the kind was intended, but "warren of conies," and "warren of conies" only, and whatever is fairly incident to or necessary for the exercise of the right of preserving and making profit out of conies.

There was yet another ground urged on which it was said that the appellant ought to succeed, viz., that the manor of Bromby was his, and that he had proved his title to it in the cause, as claiming through Thomas Pindar. It is plain, however, that it is part of the manor or soke of Kirton; that during the whole time Courts have been held in Bromby for the whole manor or soke of Kirton, and as plain that he shewed no title to the wastes or moors of Bromby, or any act or right in any way excluding the rights of the lord of the superior manor. We do not think it necessary to go through the details to which the Master of the Rolls referred in his judgment as decisive on this part of the case.

On all these grounds, therefore, we are of opinion that the appellant's case has wholly failed; that the real mistake has been the supposition that his rights have been mistaken; that the bills were properly dismissed with costs in the Court below, and that the appeal must likewise be dismissed, with costs.

Company—Winding-up—Shareholder Agent—Termination of Engagement —Salary and Compensation—Calls to be Debited in Accounts—Set-off.

COMPANY.—C. went to Australia as the agent of a company under an agreement by which he was to act as their agent for five years, at a fixed yearly salary, and was also to receive a commission on remittances. He was required to take fifty shares in the company, and to pay up a portion of their value; and it was agreed that the balance which might become due on account of calls should be placed to his debit in his accounts. After he had carried on business as such agent for little more than a year the company was wound up under supervision. For three quarters of a year more he was employed by the liquidators in the winding-up, and was then discharged:—Held, that C. was entitled to his salary for five years, and that, having regard to the fact that the liquidators were indebted to him for his services rendered in the winding-up, in a sum nearly as large as the amount due from him in respect of calls upon his shares, they would not be allowed to enforce against him any claim for such calls until the amount due from them to him had been ascertained.

In this case two adjourned summonses and a motion came on to be heard together. The first summons was on behalf of the liquidators of the above-named company, that R. C. Clark might be ordered to pay to the liquidators 1,000*l.* in respect of a call of 20*l.* upon fifty shares held by him. The second summons was taken out by Clark to oblige the liquidators to come to a settlement with him in respect of his several claims against the company, having regard to a certain arrangement which had been made between him and Alexander Martin, as the company's attorney, and for a direction to prevent the liquidators from enforcing against him the payment of any call due to them until such settlement had been come to. The notion was on behalf of the liquidators to restrain Clark from prosecuting against them certain proceedings in the Supreme Court at Melbourne, Australia.

In September, 1865, Clark was appointed agent of the company at Melbourne. As part of the arrangement between them the company required him to take fifty shares in the company of 100*l.* each, as a guarantee for the faithful discharge of his duties as agent. By an agreement in writing made between Clark and the company, dated the 30th of September, 1865, it was agreed that Clark should proceed to Melbourne, with his wife and family, and be employed there as such agent for five years, at a salary of 750*l.* per annum. He was also to be allowed a commission on all remittances for the company's shipments. He was to conduct his business there as if an independent merchant, but the company were to have a share of his profits. The agreement (clause 8.) further provided, that Clark "having applied for and taken fifty shares of 100*l.* each in the said company, upon which 10*l.* per share is to be paid up at once, and having already paid 2*l.* per share, part of such 10*l.* per share, the company will, on their part, place 8*l.* per share, the balance of such 10*l.* per share on the said fifty shares, to the debit of the said R. C. Clark, as well as all other sums that may become due from the said R. C. Clark from time to time on account of calls to be made on the said shares;" and Clark thereby agreed to give an equitable mortgage to the company of certain property in Ceylon as a security for the payment of 8*l.* per share, and such other sums as might become due from him to the company. This mortgage was subsequently released upon Clark having arranged, in pursuance of an agreement made by him with the managing director and secretary of the company, for the payment of a sum of 2,400*l.* by the trustees of his marriage settlement in respect of the fifty shares.

Clark arrived at Melbourne in December, 1865, and thenceforth commenced his duties as the company's agent under the agreement.

In March, 1867, an order was made for continuing under supervision the winding-up of the company, which had been commenced as a voluntary winding-up. The liquidators of the company continued to employ Clark till January, 1868, when they put an end to his services by Mr. Martin, their attorney in Australia. Thereupon Clark commenced proceedings in the Supreme Court at Melbourne, to enforce his claims against the company for salary, commission, &c. In February, 1868, certain "Heads of Settlement" were arranged for the settlement of the differences between Clark and the company, and were reduced into writing and confirmed, and signed by Martin on the company's behalf. By the terms of this arrangement 1,000*l.* was to be paid to Clark to enable him to proceed to England, and a further sum of 3,000*l.* was to be deposited in the Victoria Bank, Melbourne, in the joint names of the liquidators, Messrs. Morrison, of Melbourne, and Clark, to await the result of the proceedings which Clark undertook to prosecute at Melbourne without delay, in case he should fail to settle with the company within six months after his arrival in England. Clark arrived in England in April, 1868. He had been placed on the list of contributories to the company in respect of the fifty shares. He now claimed to be entitled to set off against the calls his claims against the company. His claims amounted altogether to about 5,986*l.*, made up of 2,187*l.* 10*s.* for two years' and three quarters' salary to December, 1870, at 750*l.* per annum; 348*l.* 10*s.* commission upon goods consigned by the company to Martin and others; 2,570*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* estimated commission for the remainder of his engagement; and of a further sum on account of expenses of himself and family in respect of his voyage to and from Melbourne, and costs of legal proceedings at Melbourne. The company disputed their liability to pay most of these items.

Mr. Druce and Mr. C. Hall, for the liquidators, in support of the motion for an injunction, relied upon the 87th section of the Companies' Act, 1862, by which actions and suits are to be stayed after an order for winding-up.

They referred to Beauchamp v. the Marquis of Huntley (Jac. 546); Graham v. Maxwell (1 Mac. & G. 71; 18 L. J. Ch. 225); The Carron Iron Company v. Maclaren (5 H.L. C. 416; 24 L. J. Ch. 620). In support of the liquidator's summons, and in opposition to Clark's summons, they argued that the arrangement made with him under the heads of the settlement was void, and he was not entitled, under the 8th clause of the agreement of the 30th of September, 1865, which was void and illegal, to set off his claims against the call—Grissell's case (35 L. J. Ch. 752; L. R. 1 Ch. 528); In re Duckworth (L. R. 2 Ch. 578).

Mr. Kay and Mr. Higgins, for Clark, contended that there was an express provision for a set-off of such a claim as this against calls under the 101st section of the Companies' Act, 1862. Grissell's case was different. Here there had been an express agreement that Clark should take a certain number of shares, and that the company should debit against him all other sums which should become due from him. Then, again, as regards Clark's discharge: in a case like this, where the business of a company did not at once come to an end upon the company being wound up, the winding-up order was not notice of discharge to the company's servants, but there must be an express notice according to the terms of the contract between the servant and the company—In re the English Joint-Stock Bank; Ex parte Harding (L. R. 3 Eq. 341); Yelland's case (L. R. 4 Eq. 350). Clark was entitled to six months' notice of dismissal, and to his salary for the whole term of five years, for which he was engaged, and by his agreement he was not bound to pay the calls upon his shares till the five years of his service had expired.

Mr. Druce replied. He cited Habershon's case (L. R. 5 Eq. 286).

JAMES, V.C., said he thought Mr. Clark was entitled at present to be relieved from the payment of 1,000*l*. It was not necessary in this case to consider Grissell's case. He would not express an opinion as to how far a bargain like that contained in the 30th of September, 1865, giving security on the Ceylon estate, and which seemed to imply that there might be a set-off, was good, but having regard to the fact that the liquidators had themselves continued Mr. Clark in his situation as their agent, and that the company was indebted to him in a sum which could not be far, if at all, short of 1,000*l*. for services in the winding-up, and to which he was entitled out of the first assets of the company and not merely as a creditor of the company, he thought it would be monstrous if Mr. Clark were now compelled to pay 1,000*l*. to the company. Therefore, he thought that the liquidators ought not to enforce their claim against Mr. Clark till it had been ascertained what was due from them to him. He thought, also, that he could not allow the company, which was now in liquidation, to say that the agreement made with Mr. Clark in Australia was ultra vires either of the liquidators or of their attorney in Australia. Apparently, according to the law of Australia, Mr. Clark was entitled to maintain the proceedings which he had instituted there, and if not, the proper course would have been to have taken steps in Australia to restrain those proceedings, for neither Mr. Clark himself nor the property for the attachment of which those proceedings had been taken were within the jurisdiction of this Court. That being so, the agreement come to between Martin and Clark appeared to be a very proper one, though it required the sanction of the Court, and he should have no hesitation in sanctioning the arrangement by which 1,000*l*. was to be paid to Clark to enable him to proceed home, and 3,000*l*. was to be put in medio to abide the result of the proceedings. The company had had the benefit of that agreement, having had all the property beyond such 4,000*l*. put into their hands, and having also the 3,000*l*. secured as he had mentioned. That being so, unless he could see his way to rescind the whole agreement and to place the parties in exactly the same position in which they were when the proceedings in Australia were commenced, he must hold that both parties must act according to it. Under it, Clark had a lien to the extent of 3,000*l*., and to that extent he had a security for anything which might be due to him under the arrangement. It would probably be unnecessary to determine whether he was to come in in priority to or to be paid pari passu with the other creditors. He should order the 3,000*l*. to be transferred to this country, and carried to a separate account, to be called the account of the money deposited under the agreement. Further proceedings in Melbourne to be stayed. The costs to be paid out of the estate.

to pay more than the balance (if any) which shall be found due from him on setting off, against the calls, what on an inquiry shall be found to be the value of the property transferred by him.

This was a summons, by the official liquidator of the company, to put George Pell on the list of contributories in respect of 1,350 shares, which stood against his name in the memorandum of association.

Pell's case was, that by an agreement he had sold the goodwill and stock-in-trade to the company, and that in payment of the purchase-money the company had agreed to issue to Pell 1,350 shares, of 20*l.* each, which should be credited in the books of the company as fully paid-up, and that such agreement had been expressly adopted by the articles of association of the company.

Pell had transferred the goodwill and stock-in-trade, and the shares had been placed against his name, but he had not been credited in the books of the company with any payment on account of the shares.

Mr. Roxburgh, for the official liquidator, contended that, on the authority of Miggotti's case (36 L. J. Ch. 531; L. R. 4 Eq. 238); Baron de Beville's case (ante, 18; L. R. 7 Eq. 11); and In re the China Steam Ship and Labuan Company; Drummond's case,[1] since Pell's name appeared on the memorandum simply for 1,350 shares, he was liable to be placed on the list.

Mr. Westlake, for Pell, contended that he had given more than the value for the shares in the property transferred by him; besides, the public had notice of the arrangement, which appeared fully on the articles of association.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I think that Mr. Pell must be put on the list of contributories, but I do not say that he will have to pay anything. It is proper to allow him in account what shall be found due to him in respect of the property transferred by him, and there must be an inquiry for this purpose. All he will have to pay will be the balance, if any, which will be due from him after deducting the value of the property from the amount of the calls.

Winding-up—Proof against Two Estates—Interest subsequent to Proof.

COMPANY.—When a company in liquidation is insolvent no interest is payable on its interest-bearing debts after the date of the winding-up order as against other then existing debts; and a creditor, who has received 20*s. in the pound on the amount then due, wholly or partly in payments by a surety, is to be excluded from participation in further dividends.*

The Warrant Finance Company were the holders of certain bills indorsed by the Joint-Stock Discount Company, which was now in liquidation. Corporation (which was also in liquidation), and had received from them dividends to the extent of 4*s*. 6*d*. in the pound.

This was an application, on the part of the official liquidator of the Joint-Stock Discount Company, that the Warrant Finance Company might be excluded from participation in any further dividend.

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Locock Webb, for the official liquidator.—The Warrant Finance Company has been paid in full, except as to interest subsequent to the date of the winding-up order, and to this they are not entitled—In re the Humber Ironworks Company; Ex parte the Warrant Finance Company (17 W. R. 780); Cockerell v. Dickens (3 Moo. P.C. 98).

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. Langley, for the Warrant Finance Company.—The rule established by the Lords Justices in the case of The Humber Ironworks Company (ubi supra) applies only to a proof by an unsecured creditor against a single estate. In this case we have a double proof. Kellock's case (3 Ch. Ap. 769) does not decide what 20*s*. in the pound means. We are entitled to be paid 20*s*. in the pound on the whole claim, i. e., the amount of the bills and interest up to the present time, and we ought to receive dividends pari passu with the other creditors until we have been paid—Hickie & Co.'s case (36 L. J. Ch. 809; L. R. 4 Eq. 226); Ex parte Reed (3 Deac. & C. 481); Bower v. Morris (Cr. & Ph. 35; 10 L. J. Ch. 357).

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, without calling for a reply, said—I think this case is governed by the decision of the Lords Justices in In re the Humber Ironworks Company. I need not enter into those niceties which arise in cases of double recourse and double proof. The Lords Justices have laid down the rule that, until the estate is solvent, the interest stops at the time when the winding-up order was made. If so, the Warrant Finance Company cannot receive more money for interest after that time. If the estate ultimately pays the debts in full the Warrant Finance Company is entitled to claim the subsequent interest, but the question does not arise in an estate which is solvent. The case is governed by the decision of the Lords Justices. You say that is Judge-made law: no doubt of it, it is necessarily Judge-made law. They lay down this rule, the tree must lie where it falls. When it falls there is due to you a certain amount You have received that in full. You are not entitled to more until the other creditors are in the same position, and have been paid all their proof, as you have been.

The order will be, that the Warrant Finance Company be excluded from further dividends until all the debts proved against the Joint-Stock Discount Company have been paid in full.

Mortgage—Acceptance of Amount secured—Right to Legal Estate and Title-Deeds.

MORTGAGE.—Mortgagees by accepting the amount of their principal, interest and costs, admit that the person who tenders it is entitled to redeem, and are bound to convey to him the legal estate, and to deliver up the title-deeds.

The plaintiff had contracted with the mortgagors of property at Maidenhead for the purchase of it, and at the time of the present suit had accepted the title subject to certain requisitions which had not yet been complied with. Pending the contract the mortgagees transferred their security to the defendant, who forthwith gave notice to the mortgagors of his intention to exercise his power of sale if his principal, interest and costs were not paid within a fortnight. When the plaintiff was informed of this he tendered to the defendant the full amount he claimed. The defendant accepted it, and gave a receipt for it, but he refused to give up the title-deeds, or to convey the legal estate to the plaintiff, on the ground that he had notice of the claim of a Mr. Colman to be interested in the property. Mr. Colman alleged that the plaintiff had contracted for the purchase of the property, not on his own behalf only, but as agent for himself and Mr. Colman in a joint purchase. The object of the present bill was to compel the defendant to give up to the plaintiff the title-deeds and convey to him the legal estate.

Mr. Southgate and Mr. Villiers, for the plaintiff, cited Wicks v. Scrivens (1 Jo. & H. 215).

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Nalder, for the defendant, argued that the plaintiff, not having accepted the title, had no right to call for the legal estate, even supposing Mr. Colman's claim to fail; that the defendant was bound to reconvey to the persons interested in the equity of redemption according to the terms of the mortgage; and that he had not admitted the title of the plaintiff by accepting the money, since he could not refuse to accept it from anyone claiming the equity of redemption without losing subsequent interest in case the claim turned out valid.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS said—When a mortgagee refuses to accept his principal, interest and costs from the person who tenders the amount, he does it at the risk of losing subsequent interest, in case the person tendering the money should prove his title to redeem. But if he accepts the money it does not lie in his mouth to say that the person from whom he takes it was not entitled to redeem. He cannot raise the question which he might have raised before. When he receives the money he admits that the person who pays it is entitled to redeem, and therefore also entitled to a conveyance of the legal estate and to the possession of the title-deeds. Then, as I asked Mr. Jessel in the course of the argument, who is damnified? He is not, because he has received everything he is entitled to, nay more, all that he claims to be entitled to. The mortgagors are not injured because they have only to substitute A. for B. They are entitled to have the same account and equity of redemption against A. as they before had against B.

As an ordinary rule, a mortgagee called on to receive his redemption money is entitled to six months' notice, and he has time to ascertain whether the person who has given him notice to redeem has the right to do so. If he threatens to sell the property, unless he is redeemed, he is entitled to inquire of anyone who tenders the money, whether he is the mortgagor or the agent of the mortgagor. If he does not inquire he acts at his own risk. Still he is quite safe if he takes the money and conveys the property. He has nothing more to do with it. Nobody can make him liable for anything. The property is transferred to another, who is liable to a suit for redemption by the mortgagor.

The defendant, therefore, is bound to give up the deeds, and to convey all his estate in the property to the plaintiff, and he must pay the costs of the suit.

tions which were never made good, and received a dividend. In 1848 he applied to have his shares cancelled, on the ground of these misrepresentations; and in 1849 the directors, in consideration of 40*l., resolved to cancel them. This resolution was never communicated to any meeting of the shareholders, but they were aware that money had been received generally on account of cancelled shares. In* 1869 the official liquidator of the company (which was then being wound up) sought to enforce a call against him:—Held, that his name was wrongly placed on the list of contributories.

This was an application to remove the name of Mr. Dixon from the list of contributories.

Mr. Dixon was, in 1846, requested by Mr. Wilkie, the manager of the company for Scotland, to allow his name to appear as a director, and he consented, as he alleged, to take the necessary number of shares on Mr. Wilkie's undertaking that he should not be responsible as an ordinary shareholder until an act of incorporation had been obtained limiting the responsibility of the shareholders. Mr. Wilkie took ten shares in the name of Mr. Dixon, and paid the deposit on them, and Mr. Dixon's name was entered on the list of shareholders. In 1846 he received a dividend, and he signed a proxy authorizing the manager to act for him at a meeting of the company to be held on the 13th of May in that year. In that proxy he was described as the holder of ten shares.

On the other hand, he never signed the deed of settlement and never paid any calls. Two calls were made in the year 1848, but he refused to pay them. He did not come into the arrangement known as the Chippenham compromise,[1] but he applied to have his shares cancelled, on the ground that the condition on which he had consented to become a shareholder, viz., the limitation of the shareholders' liability by an act of incorporation, had never been fulfilled. The directors agreed to cancel his shares in consideration of a sum of 40*l.*, and on the 17th of April, 1849, they passed a resolution to that effect.

This resolution was never submitted to any meeting of the shareholders, but in the balance-sheet presented to the general annual meeting held on the 23rd of November, 1849, one of the items was a sum received on account of "shares cancelled." The 40*l.* paid by Mr. Dixon formed part of this sum.

The only clause of the deed of settlement under which the directors could claim power to make such a compromise was the 164th, worded as follows:

"That it shall be lawful for the board of directors to pay or discharge any debts or claims owing by or made against the company upon any evidence they shall think proper, and to enter into or make any compromise or composition with respect to any claims made against or owing to the company, and to accept any security, real or personal, for any debt or debts owing to or made by the company, as the board shall think proper; and in case any question or dispute shall arise between the company and any other person or persons, body or bodies politic or corporate, either to refer the same to arbitration, or to settle it in such manner as the board of directors shall think proper."

The company was wound up in the year 1861.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. G. N. Colt, for Mr. Dixon, argued that the case closely resembled Lord Belhaven's case (3 De Gex, J. & S. 41; 34 L. J. Ch. 503), or Fox's case (37 L. J. Ch. 257; L. R. 5 Eq. 118) that there was a fair question as to the liability of Mr. Dixon as a shareholder, which the directors had power to compromise; and that if not, the Court would not permit him to be made a contributory after so great a lapse of time. On this head they cited Prendergast v. Turton (You. & C. C.C. 98; 11 L. J. Ch. 22: affirmed, 13 L. J. Ch. 268); Clegg v. Edmondson (8 De Gex, M. & G. 787; 26 L. J. Ch. 673).

Mr. Southgate and Mr. Bush, for the official liquidator, replied, that Lord

Belhaven's case (ubi supra) materially differed from the present in the publicity given to the compromise; that the compromise with Mr. Dixon was ultra vires, and therefore Mr. Dixon remained a shareholder, and that the case was not distinguishable in principle from Houldsworth v. Evans (37 L. J. Ch. 800; 3 E. & I. Ap. 263).

Sir R. Baggallay, in reply, cited Brotherhood's case (31 Beav. 365; 31 L. J. Ch. 861).

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS said that his opinions on these cases were well known, and that he could not with propriety now recede from the opinions he had expressed in the House of Lords. The decisions of the House of Lords seemed to him to be irreconcilable, and he must determine the present case as he would have done if none of those decisions had been given.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS (July 26) said that the case was not free from difficulty, but he thought that Mr. Dixon's name ought not to be on the list of contributories. In his opinion the compromise was not an absolutely void transaction, only voidable; and after so many years it could not be set aside.

Apportionment — Tenant for Life and Remaindermen — Principal and Interest—Bond to Trustees—Insufficiency of Obligor's Estate.

APPORTIONMENT. ESTATE.—C. gave to the trustees of his marriage settlement a bond to secure the payment, three months after his death, of a sum which was settled on trust for his widow for life, with remainder to his children. C. died, and his estate was insufficient to pay even the principal due on the bond, in addition to which there was a large amount for interest due thereon:—Held, that there must be a calculation what sum, received and invested when the principal debt secured by bond had become due, would, together with the interest thereon, have equalled the amount recovered from C.'s estate at the time of such last-mentioned amount being paid, and an apportionment must be made between the tenant for life and remaindermen on that basis.

In re Grabowski's Settlement (37 L. J. Ch. 926) not followed.

SPECIAL CASE. G. H. R. Cox, in contemplation of his marriage, in 1859, gave a bond to the trustees of his marriage settlement to secure to them the payment, within three months after his death, of a sum of 6,000*l.* and interest at 5*l.* per cent. from that date.

By his marriage settlement the same trustees were to invest the said sum of 6,000*l.* upon receipt thereof, and were to pay the annual produce of the investments to the wife of G. H. R. Cox, if she should survive him, for her life, with remainder, in the events which happened, to the children of the marriage.

G. H. R. Cox died intestate in July, 1862, and letters of administration to his estate and effects were granted to his widow. A suit was shortly afterwards instituted, by a simple contract creditor, for the administration of his estate, and a decree made in that suit in July, 1863.

Upon taking the accounts under the decree, the chief clerk found that the trustees of the said settlement were the only specialty creditors of the intestate, and that there was due to them on the bond the principal sum of 6,000*l.* and 1,625*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.* arrears of interest up to the 31st of January, 1868, and that the only assets of the intestate amounted to about 5,700*l.* Under these circumstances the questions arose, first, whether the 5,700*l.* recoverable by the trustees of the settlement ought to be apportioned as between principal and interest; and, secondly, if so, upon what principle such apportionment was to be carried out. The object of this special case was to have these questions determined.

Mr. Phear, for the plaintiffs, argued that there could be no apportionment, but the whole of the 5,700*l.* must be treated as principal. In re Grabowski's Settlement (37 L. J. Ch. 926; L. R. 6 Eq. 12) was on all fours with this case.

[JAMES, V.C., said it was clear there must be an apportionment; the only question was, as to the principle upon which it was to be made. There must have been some slip in In re Grabowski's Settlement.]

Mr. Speed, for the defendants, cited Turner v. Newport (2 Phil. 14). The notion of the tenant for life being entitled to interest at 4*l.* per cent. only, which had prevailed in that case, had no application here; for here, by the settlement, the rate of interest was named at 5*l.* per cent. The widow was entitled to the actual proceeds of the testator's estate since the time when the bond-debt became payable.

JAMES, V.C., said the true principle was, that neither the tenant for life nor the remaindermen ought to suffer any loss or receive any benefit from the delay in the administration of the estate of the deceased obligor, except so far as this was inseparable from the fact of the obligor's having made default in payment of the debt. The principal debt ought to have been paid three months after the death of the intestate obligor. The amount received would then have been invested, say at 4*l.* per cent., and the tenant for life would have been entitled to the interim income of such investments.

The proper principle in this case was, to calculate back what sum paid at three months from the death of the obligor, and then invested at interest at 4*l.* per cent., would, together with the amount of such interest, have now produced the amount of the dividend recoverable from the obligor's estate. That sum would represent the capital, and the rest would go as interest to the tenant for life. The costs must come out of the capital.

KIRKMANN v. LEWIS.

38 L. J. Ch. 570; 21 L. T. 191; 17 W. R. 907.

Will—Mortmain—Bequest void for Uncertainty of Amount.

CHARITY.—Bequest of residuary personal estate to be applied in the construction of a well and in the erection of a public pump and tank in any suitable place in the parish of L.:—Held, to be void under the Statutes of Mortmain (as involving the purchase of land).

Bequest to a charity of surplus which should be left after carrying out the above illegal bequest:—Held, to be unascertainable in amount, and therefore void.

This was the further consideration of a suit for the administration of the estate of a Mr. Kirkmann, whose will contained a bequest by which the testator directed his residuary personal estate to be applied in the construction of a well and in the erection of a public pump and a tank in any suitable place in the parish of Llangorse, after which the surplus, if any, was to be paid to the rector, to be expended by him for the benefit of a school in the parish.

The question was whether this was to any and what extent a good charitable bequest.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. Bagshawe, for the plaintiffs the executors.

Mr. Wickens, for the Attorney General, contended that this was, at any rate, a good charitable bequest to the extent of the surplus. The cost of sinking a well was ascertainable, since persons with local knowledge could always be found who would contract for a fixed price to sink a well in a particular locality until water was reached. Such persons could therefore accurately fix what the cost of sinking a well would be; and an accurate estimate of the cost of erecting a tank and pump could also be made. Supposing, therefore, that the gift of money to sink a well and to build a tank was void, yet its amount, being ascertainable, could be deducted from the amount of the residuary personal estate, and the surplus be thus ascertained; and of this surplus there was a valid bequest to the school. He referred to Philpott v. St. George's Hospital (2 H.L. C. 338; 27 L. J. Ch. 74); Fisk v. the Attorney General (L. R. 4 Eq. 521).

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Bury, contra, contended that the surplus could not possibly be ascertained unless the void bequest was first carried into effect. The gift of surplus was therefore void for uncertainty. They cited Chapman v. Brown (6 Ves. 404); Fowler v. Fowler (33 Beav. 616; 35 L. J. Ch. 574).

Mr. Southgate, Mr. Kingdon, Mr. Edwin Cutler and Mr. Sladen, for other parties.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The gift to make a well and tank is void under the Statutes of Mortmain, as involving the purchase of land on which to do the work. I think, also, that the cost of making a well cannot be ascertained without actually sinking it. The amount of the surplus is therefore unascertainable, and the bequest of it is void for uncertainty. I must therefore declare the whole bequest of residue void.

Practice—Partition Act, 1868—Service of Decree—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. s. 42. r. 8.—Consolidated Orders, XXXV. r. 18.

PARTITION.—The Court will not allow a sale, which has been decreed under the Partition Act, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 40, to be proceeded with until all persons interested in the suit have been served with notice of the decree, but will allow such service to be effected by advertisement upon persons out of the jurisdiction, and who cannot be found, with liberty for the plaintiffs to apply as to proceeding with the sale in case the absent parties do not come in after advertisement.

Adjourned summons. Edward Tann, by his will, gave the rents and profits of certain leaseholds to be divided equally amongst all his grandchildren. The testator, in other gifts contained in his will, proceeded to enumerate his grandchildren as the children of his various named sons and daughters, but he omitted from this list the name of one son, Edward Tann, who had emigrated to California and was believed to have died there, leaving children of whom nothing certain was known, but who were believed to have outlived the testator.

This was a suit by some against others of the grandchildren of the testator for a sale or partition, and one question raised in the suit was, whether the children of Edward Tann would be entitled. This question was still pending, but on the 30th of January, 1869, a decree was made under the Partition Act

(31 & 32 Vict. c. 40.) for a sale instead of partition, and it was referred to chambers to settle the parties to be served with the decree.

The present summons had been taken out in chambers by the plaintiffs, asking that leave might be given to serve notice of the decree and of the order to be made on the summons upon the children of Edward Tann by advertisement in certain specified newspapers, and that in the meantime the sale directed by the decree might be proceeded with.

Mr. Higgins, in support of the application, referred to The Partition Act, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 40. ss. 3, 4, 9; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. s. 42. r. 8; Consolidated Orders, XXXV. r. 18.

Mr. Stirling, for the defendants.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I cannot allow you to sell until these persons have been served with notice of the decree, but I will allow you to serve them with such notice by advertisement. When they have been so served, if they do not come in you may apply as to going on with the sale. It had better be referred to chambers to settle in what papers, in what form, and how often the advertisements shall appear.

Company—Winding-up—Proof—Secured Creditor—Claim—Date of Claim.

COMPANY.—Company B. addressed to F. a letter of guarantee, agreeing that, if F. would accept certain bills, company B. would provide F. with funds to meet the bills at least seven days before maturity. Two days before the bills matured, but after company B. had been ordered to be wound up, and after advertisement for claims had been made, F. sent a notary, who presented the original letter of guarantee to the official liquidator, and demanded payment:—Held, that this did not amount to the sending in of particulars of claim under rule 20. of the General Order, 1862:—Held, consequently, that F, who, after this, but before making any further claim, realized certain securities which he held for the bills, was not entitled to prove for the whole amount of the bills, but only for the balance.

This was an application by Messrs. Forwood, who now represented the firm of Leach, Harrison & Forwood, to be allowed to prove against the estate of Barned's Bank, now in course of compulsory liquidation, for two sums of 9,000*l.* and 6,000*l.* This claim was founded on two letters of guarantee, the first of which, dated the 27th of March, 1866, was as follows:

"Messrs. Leach, Harrison & Forwood.

"Gentlemen,—In consideration of your accepting the drafts of Messrs. T. M. Mackay & Co., at three months' date for 9,000*l.* against the ship "Naval Reserve" and her freight, and on your agreeing to renew such drafts for a further period of three months, we agree to provide you with funds to meet such drafts at least seven days before maturity; it being understood that if we are called upon by Messrs. James Baines & Co. to pay you the amount of the drafts, you transfer to us your said security."

The guarantee for 6,000*l.* was for bills drawn against another ship, called the "Golden Empire," and was similar to the above, and was dated the 4th of April, 1866.

Barned's Bank stopped payment on the 18th of April, 1866, and was ordered to be wound up on the 27th of April, 1866; and the usual advertisements were issued calling on creditors to send in their claims by the 22nd of July following.

The bills for 9,000*l.* matured on the 27th of June, and those for 6,000*l.* on the 6th of August, 1866.

On the 25th of June, 1866, Mr. Lowndes, a notary public, employed by Messrs. Leach, Harrison & Co., sent by a clerk the letter of guarantee dated the 27th of April, 1866, to the offices of the official liquidators of Barned's Bank and demanded payment, when Mr. Lowndes's clerk was informed by a clerk of the liquidators that payment could not be made.

A similar application with a similar result was made on the 1st of August with regard to the guarantee for 6,000*l.*

In September, 1866, Messrs. Leach, Harrison & Co. realized their securities by selling the ships, the "Naval Reserve" producing 8,314*l.* 3*s.*, and the "Golden Empire" 3,005*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.*

On the 18th of March, 1868, Messrs. Leach, Harrison & Co. sent to the official liquidators a formal claim for 2,994*l.* 15*s.*, as the balance due on the guarantee for the 6,000*l.*, dated the 4th of April, 1866.

Messrs. Forwood now asked to be allowed to prove for the whole of the two sums of 9,000*l.* and 6,000*l.*

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Hemming, for the applicants, contended that on the authority of Kellock's case (L. R. 3 Ch. 769), and in accordance with rule 20. of General Order of the 11th of November, 1862, made in pursuance of the Companies Act, 1862, Messrs. Forwood were entitled to prove for the amount due at the date of their claim, without reference to securities realized between the sending in of the claim and the adjudication thereon; and that in the present case the presentation by the notary of the actual letters of guarantee was a sufficient sending in of particulars of claim.

Mr. Southgate and Mr. Kekewich, for the official liquidator, contended that no proper claim was sent in till the 18th of March, 1868.

Mr. Jessel, in reply.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The sole question is, whether this is such a claim as to bring the case within the authority of Kellock's case. First, can it be said that the presentation of this letter of guarantee, the original document on which the claim is based, was the sending in of a claim? Of course the holders of such a document would only shew it; they would not part with it; or, at any rate, if trusting to the honour of a respectable person, they left it in the hands of the liquidator or his clerk, they would not be parting with dominion over it, and would have the right to bring an action for it if it were detained.

Can it be said that, to shew, or even to leave, under such circumstances, a document like this would be equivalent to sending in particulars of claim? Then, looking at the document itself, no doubt it is a document from which any person might have reasonably inferred that a claim might possibly be made, but still, how could the official liquidator know from this document that there was a claim? For all that he could know, the bills might be paid by some person other than the acceptors, who held the bank's guarantee; and the guarantee might have been produced merely in the interest of such other persons.

Rule 20. of the General Order of 1862 is as follows: "For the purpose of ascertaining the debts and claims due from the company, and of requiring the creditors to come in and prove their debts or claims, an advertisement shall be issued at such time as the Judge shall direct; and such advertisement shall fix a time for the creditors to send their names and addresses, and the particulars of their debts or claims, and the names and addresses of their solicitors (if any) to the official liquidator, and appoint a day for adjudicating thereon."

No names of any solicitors have been given, no name and address of any person making the claim, but only the name of the person who, on the face of the instrument, might be the director. I hold a claim of this kind to be no compliance with the order, and I think that Lord Justice Wood, in Kellock's case, so understood. I hold, therefore, that no particulars of claim were sent in until after the realization of the securities, and therefore that Messrs. Forwood are only entitled to prove for the balance, and not for the whole amount. The summons must be dismissed. The official liquidator to have his costs out of the estate. No order as to the costs of applicants.

Company—Winding-up—Proof for Secured Debt—Claim—Date of Claim.

COMPANY.—In order to entitle a secured creditor of a company to prove in a winding-up under the Companies Act, 1862, for his whole debt without regard to the value of his security, the creditor must not only have carried in a claim for the whole debt before realizing his security, but must also at the date of such claim have been such creditor in respect of an actual debt, and not a mere liability of the company.

Therefore, where C, being the drawer of certain bills of exchange, drawn against a cargo of cotton, and accepted but not paid by company B, and being also the drawer of certain other like bills, which company B. had agreed by a letter of credit to accept but did not accept, after company B. had been ordered to be wound up, but before the cotton was sold, and while the bills were in the hands of third parties, gave notice to the official liquidator that he, C, should be a claimant in respect of the bills, but through ignorance of his rights stated in such notice that the proceeds of the sale of the cotton would be applied in reduction of the amount, and afterwards took up the bills and realized the cotton, and was admitted to proof for and received dividends upon the balance of his debt, and afterwards, becoming aware of his rights, applied for leave to enlarge his claim by the amount of the proceeds of the cotton and to receive dividends thereon:—Held, that the claim of C. having been made for the balance only, and also at a time when he was not holder of the bills, but only liable thereon, was not a sufficient claim before realization of the security to bring his case within Kellock's case (L. R. 3 Ch. 769), and to entitle him to prove for the whole debt without regard to the security afterwards realized.

This was a summons by Messrs. Coupland Brothers, of Liverpool, and also of Bombay, for leave to increase their claim against Barned's Bank under the winding-up by the sum of 39,035*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*, under the following circumstances. On the 17th of November, 1865, at the request of Messrs. Daunt, of Liverpool, Barned's Bank gave to Messrs. Coupland a letter of credit authorizing them to draw on the bank bills at six months, to the amount of 23,150*l.*, against bills of lading for cotton, the bills of lading to be given up to the bank on their acceptance of the bills of exchange. Accordingly, Messrs. Coupland drew two bills, amounting to 23,150*l.* 0*s.* 5*d.* in all, which were accepted by the bank against two parcels of cotton of 500 bales each.

On the 2nd of February, 1866, at the request of Mr. Wilson, of Liverpool, the Bank gave Messrs. Coupland another letter of credit, authorizing them to draw on the bank to an amount not exceeding 50,000*l.*, by bills of exchange at six months, to be covered by shipping documents, such as for cotton, &c., on receipt of which documents the bank engaged to honour such drafts.

Against this letter of credit Messrs. Coupland's Bombay house drew four bills, amounting in the whole to 33,635*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.*, and negotiated the same in India. Before the bills for 23,150*l.* arrived at maturity, and before the bills for 33,635*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.* could be presented to Barned's Bank for acceptance, the bank suspended payment, viz., in April, 1866, and was ordered to be wound up.

By an order dated the 8th of May, 1866, the 22nd of June, 1866, was the day fixed by which creditors were to send in their claims, and on the 8th of June, 1866, Messrs. Coupland sent to the official liquidator these particulars of claim in the following letter: "We beg to intimate to you that we shall be claimants on behalf of our house in Bombay (Coupland & Co.) on Messrs. J. Barned & Co. (Limited), for drafts accepted by them for 11,698*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.* and 11,451*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.*, for which bills of lading will be given up to us for 1,000 bales of cotton, per Helen Scott, and the proceeds when sold will be applied in reduction of the amount: and also for drafts drawn on them under letter of credit for [the letter here enumerates the bills, amounting to 33,635*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.*] which were protested for non-acceptance; the proceeds of the following parcels of cotton when sold will be applied in reduction of this amount [the letter then set out particulars of cotton, amounting to 1,545 bales].

In July and August, 1866, the 1,000 bales of cotton, per the Helen Scott, were sold and realized 13,953*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* In October, November and December, 1866, the 1,545 bales were sold, realizing 25,082*l.* 1*s.*

The claim was adjusted on the 23rd of April, 1867, when Messrs. Coupland, who had taken up all the bills claimed, and were allowed to prove for 17,779*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*, being the total balance due to them on both sets of bills, after deducting 39,035*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*, the total produce of the sale of the cotton, received three dividends on such claim, of 3*s.*, 1*s.* and 1*s.* in the pound respectively.

Messrs. Coupland now put in an affidavit, stating that at the time they made the claim, and until after the receipt of the last dividend, they were ignorant that, inasmuch as their securities were unrealized at the date fixed for sending in their claim, they were then entitled to prove for the whole debt and not merely for the balance, and they now claimed to be allowed to increase their proof by 39,035*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*, and also to receive out of moneys now in or hereafter to come into the hands of the official liquidators, payment in respect of the three dividends already declared.

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Westlake, for Messrs. Coupland, contended that notice of a claim upon these bills having been sent to the official liquidator in June, 1866, before the security was realized, the right of Messrs. Coupland to prove for the whole amount was not prejudiced by the fact that in ignorance of their rights they offered to allow, and afterwards allowed, credit for the cotton, or by the fact that they were not holders of the bills at the date of the claim being sent in.—They referred to Kellock's case (L. R. 3 Ch. 769).

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. Kekewich, for the official liquidator of Barned's Bank, resisted the claim.—They argued that no claim to prove for the whole amount could be considered to have been made before the cotton was sold, inasmuch as Messrs. Coupland had expressly claimed only a balance, and also that at the date of the alleged claim Messrs. Coupland were unable to make it, not having then taken up the bills.

Mr. Jessel, in reply.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—This is a case of great peculiarity, and distinct from the numerous other cases which have followed Kellock's case. Here the claimants, before the cotton was sold, only made a claim for the amount of the bills less what the cotton should produce; at this time, moreover, they had not yet taken up the bills. I think therefore that the official liquidator rightly allowed only 17,749*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* The summons will be dismissed. The costs of the official liquidator will come out of the estate.

ROSS v. TATHAM.

38 L. J. Ch. 577; 17 W. R. 960.

Executors, liability of—Breach of Covenant by Testator—Exoneration of Executors by Order of the Court—Lord St. Leonards' Act, 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35. s. 27.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—On a petition by residuary legatees for payment out of Court of their legacy the executors applied to have part of the funds set apart to indemnify them against a breach of covenant committed by the testator as lessee. No action had been taken by the lessor on the breach, nor had he made any claim under a decree made in a suit for the administration of testator's estate:—Held, that under the circumstances, the lessor had lost all remedy against the executors, who therefore required no indemnification against the breach of covenant.

Testator, who died in 1864, by his will, gave the residue of his personal estate to the defendants on trust for his widow and his only child, a daughter, as therein declared, and he appointed his said trustees executors.

A suit was instituted for the administration of the testator's estate, and the chief clerk by his certificate found that the testator's residuary personal estate amounted to upwards of 30,000*l.*, and that it was under certain liabilities, of which the following only need be mentioned:

The testator held a piece of ground on a building lease for ninety-nine years from 1860, at a rent of 35*l.*, which lease contained, besides the usual covenants to pay rent, &c., a covenant to build within twelve months on the said piece of land a warehouse of the size and height therein stated at a cost of 1,800*l.* at the least, and to repair and insure the same and yield it up in good repair at the end of the term. The testator had commenced building under the covenant, but the suit of Weatherby v. Ross was instituted to restrain him from further building, on the ground of its interference with ancient lights, and in 1865, after his death, an injunction was granted, the building was stopped, and a breach of the building covenant thus committed; but no action had been taken by the lessor in respect thereof.

The defendants, as executors and trustees of the will, subsequently sold the testator's leasehold premises, with the approval of the Court, and the purchasers thereof covenanted to indemnify the testator's estate against the liabilities in respect of the said leasehold premises.

By an order made in the administration suit the testator's widow was declared entitled to one moiety of his residuary estate, and his daughter to another moiety on her attaining twenty-one.

The daughter married before attaining twenty-one, and a settlement of her moiety was made. In 1869 she became of age, and the trustees of her marriage settlement now petitioned for the payment out of Court of the moiety to which she was entitled. The respondents, the executors and trustees of the will, claimed to be entitled to retain part of the moiety in Court to indemnify them in respect of the above-mentioned breaches of covenant.

Mr. Owen, for the petitioners.

Mr. Wickens, for the trustees and executors of the testator's will.—It is doubtful whether the present case comes within the 27th section of Lord St. Leonards' Act (22 & 23 Vict c. 35), which applies only to ordinary and usual covenants, not to every covenant contained in the deed, otherwise the special provision in the same section in respect of a covenant to pay an ascertained sum would have been superfluous. Moreover, the covenant must have passed unbroken to the executors to admit the operation of this section. In the present case the covenant was broken in the lifetime of the testator. But further, this is a continuing covenant, and the damages for the breach must be unliquidated.

Digitized by Google

They cannot, therefore, be considered to be a liability due and "claimed" by the lessor so as to come within the first part of the section. If, therefore, the money had been out of Court the executors must have set apart a sufficient fund in order to claim the benefit of the second part of the section; the money being in Court, the Court will direct the executors to do as the act provides. The executors could not plead the act in defence to an action on the covenant until they set apart a fund. The act, therefore, alone will not protect the executors, nor will the order of the Court upon this petition protect them.

Mr. Osborne (Amicus Curiæ) referred to Thomas v. Griffith (2 De Gex, F. & J. 555; 30 L. J. Ch. 465) where the executor was held to be exonerated; and see also In re Green (2 De Gex, F. & J. 121).

Mr. Owen cited Bennett v. Lytton (2 Jo. & H. 155); and Williams v. Headland (4 Giff. 505; 34 L. J. Ch. 20), to the same effect.

Mr. Romer, for the widow of the testator, supported the view of the executors, on the ground that she had a life interest in the other moiety of the residue which was to remain in Court, and would be the only fund for the lessor to go against for damages, unless a fund was set apart to meet them.

Mr. R. Nalder, for the plaintiff, supported the petition.

MALINS, V.C. reviewed the facts of the case, and observed that the breach of covenant took place in 1862, and the lessor was therefore then entitled to recover damages for it. The testator died in 1864; a decree was made for the administration of his estate, and the usual advertisements for creditors were issued. Now, it was clear that upon these advertisements every creditor was bound to bring in his claim within the period provided by the law, and that if he did not he lost his remedy against the executor. It was true he did not lose it against the testator's estate, but he was thrown upon the assets, and must follow them as best he could. Assuming, therefore, that a claim could be made in the present case, the period for bringing it in had expired, and it could not be sustained against the executors, who would therefore require no indemnity. The rule was one of the greatest convenience; for if the executor was not at liberty to distribute the assets now, there was no reason why he should do so twenty or forty years hence, or at any time before the determination of the lease. As to Mr. Wickens's argument that the covenant was continuous, and that therefore there was a continuing breach, the cases of Williams v. Headland and Bennett v. Lytton shewed that the executors would in any case be amply protected by the decree of the Court. His Honour based his decision on the law as laid down in those cases quite independently of the section in Lord St. Leonards' Act, which had been cited.

The plaintiffs in this suit were the two eldest and infant children of John Crook, by their father, as their next friend; and the defendants were the executors of John Hill, the testator in the suit, and Robert Crook, the third child of John Crook.

The question in the suit was, whether the plaintiffs and the defendant Robert Crook were intended by the testator's will to take as "children of my daughter Mary Crook."

The bill stated the facts of the case, so far as they are material to this report, as follows:

John Crook had formerly been married to Sarah Ann, one of the daughters of the testator. Sarah Ann died in 1851. In 1854 John Crook, with the full knowledge of the testator, went through the ceremony of a marriage with Mary, another daughter of the testator. That union was always looked upon, and treated by the testator, as an existing marriage. Two children of Mary Crook were born after that marriage, and during the lifetime of the testator, viz., the plaintiff Alice Sarah Crook on the 4th of November, 1854, and the plaintiff Ernest William Crook on the 21st of July, 1858. The testator was in the habit of constant and affectionate intercourse with his daughter Mary Crook and John Crook, and always recognized and treated John Crook as his son-in-law and the plaintiffs as his grandchildren.

The testator by his will, dated the 9th of March, 1859, bequeathed three leasehold messuages to trustees upon trust for his widow for her life, and after her decease upon the following trust:

"Upon trust during such part of my term, estate and interest therein as my daughter Mary, the wife of the said John Crook, shall happen to live, to pay the net rents, issues and profits of the said hereditaments and premises unto her my said daughter Mary Crook, or unto such person or persons as she shall from time to time, after the same shall have accrued due, by writing under her hand, notwithstanding coverture, appoint as her agent or agents to receive the same, for her sole, separate and exclusive use and benefit, independently of her present or any after-taken husband, and without being liable to the debts, control or engagements of any such husband, the receipts in writing of her my said daughter, notwithstanding coverture, and of her agents or agent appointed as aforesaid being alone sufficient discharges for the same; to the intent that she shall not have power to dispose of such rents, issues and profits, or any part thereof, by way of anticipation, but that the same shall be in the nature of an inalienable personal provision, and shall be subject to the proviso for cesser hereinafter in that behalf contained. And, subject as aforesaid, I direct and declare that from and after the decease of my said daughter Mary Crook, or such cesser as in that behalf herein mentioned, the said hereditaments shall go, remain and be upon such trusts, for the benefit of all and every or such one or more, exclusively of the other or others of the children or child of my said daughter Mary Crook, upon such conditions, with such restrictions, and generally in such manner as she, my said daughter Mary Crook, shall by her last will and testament in writing, or any codicil or codicils thereto in writing, direct, limit or appoint; and in default of any such direction, limitation or appointment, and so far as no such direction, limitation or appointment shall extend upon trust for the child, if only one, or all the children, if more than one, of my said daughter Mary Crook, who, being a son or sons, shall either before or after the decease of my said daughter Mary Crook attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters, shall either before or after the decease of my said daughter Mary Crook attain that age or be married under that age, to take, if more than one, in equal shares as tenants in common." The will then contained (inter alia) the proviso for the cesser of the life interest of Mary Crook in the event of her anticipating, incumbering or parting with it; or its becoming vested (as therein mentioned) in any person other than Mary Crook; and a declaration that it should then "devolve on the person or persons entitled thereto next in order of succession under this my will, as if my said daughter Mary Crook were then dead; but without prejudice to the powers hereinbefore given to her my said daughter in favour of her children in manner hereinbefore mentioned." The will then contained a gift over of the property in favour or for the benefit of the testator's daughter Emma Hills, and her child or children, as therein mentioned. The testator directed the residue of his estate to be converted, and one moiety of it to be held " upon such trusts, intents and purposes, and subject to such powers and provisoes in favour or for the benefit of my daughter Mary Crook for her life, and of her child and children after her decease as shall correspond with and be similar to the trusts, intents and purposes, powers and provisoes for cesser, and otherwise, which are herein substantially expressed and declared of and concerning my leasehold messuages or tenements hereinbefore devised to or in favour or for the benefit of my said daughter Mary Crook for her life, and of her child and children after her decease." The will contained other bequests and directions, to which it is not now necessary to refer; and the testator thereby appointed the defendants William Hill and William Samuel Simmons and his daughter Emma Hill executors and executrix thereof.

The testator died on the 22nd of March, 1859.

At the date of the testator's will, Mary Crook was, and for about six months had been, enceinte with another child. The testator was well aware that Mary Crook was enceinte with such child. That child was born on the 27th of June, 1859, and was the defendant Robert Crook. Mary Crook had another child, named Edward Crook, begotten and born after the date of the testator's will, but she never had any other children than those above mentioned.

The testator's widow died on the 19th of February, 1868.

Sarah Crook died on the 2nd of March, 1868, having by her will, expressed to be made in exercise of the aforesaid power contained in that of the testator, appointed the property bequeathed to her by him among her four children equally. The residue of her property she bequeathed to John Crook, whom she nominated her executor.

The bill in the suit prayed a declaration that the infant plaintiffs, and if the Court should be of such opinion the defendant Robert Crook, were intended by the testator's will to take as " children of his daughter Mary Crook," and that the testator's personal estate might be administered and the trusts of his will performed, having regard to such declaration.

The defendants, the executors of the testator's will, by arrangement in order to have the question of construction decided, demurred to the bill for want of equity. The defendant Robert Crook was also by arrangement allowed to be heard by counsel.

Mr. Greene and Mr. Archibald Smith, for the executors.—No illegitimate children can take under a bequest made to them by the words " child or children " simpliciter; and the children of a marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife, are in the eye of the law illegitimate.—(They were then stopped by the Court.)

Mr. Fooks, for the plaintiffs.—The question is whether they are sufficiently described in the will. It is true that they are not named in it, but the testator knew them well and also the position of their parents. He speaks in the will of John Crook as his son-in-law, and his daughter Mary as Mary Crook, the wife of John Crook, and he speaks of " her children." It is true also that he does not say her " present " children, but that is not necessary; for if on the face of the will you can discern a plain intention that illegitimate children are to take as if they were legitimate they will do so. I submit that there is such an evident intention in this will, and that the plaintiffs are therefore entitled—Wilkinson v. Adam (1 Ves. & B. 422); Holt v. Sindrey (38 L. J. Ch. 126; L. R. 7 Eq. Ca. 170); Clifton v. Goodbun (L. R. 6 Eq. 278).

Mr. F. H. Colt, with Mr. Fooks.—The authorities upon this subject refer to the cases of illegitimate children of men. With respect to them the law does not recognize their status, independently of reputation at the date of the will which purports to confer the benefit on them. It is otherwise in the case of the illegitimate children of women; because, with regard to them, the maternity is ascertained, and the only objection to their taking is the ordinary presumption that the testator intends legitimate children alone to take. Here the testator distinctly recognizes the marriage as a valid existing union, and the words are therefore equivalent to a gift to present and future children. It is impossible to suppose that he did not contemplate these children of his daughter Mary Crook. He cannot, under the circumstances, be presumed to have only contemplated future legitimate children of his daughter. Such a presumption is contrary to the whole scope of the will. In Savage v. Robertson (L. R. 7 Eq. 176), the words "her two youngest daughters" were much relied upon by the Court; and that case shews that the Court will not look at bare possibilities. Holt v. Sindrey, ubi supra, was no doubt a different case from this—in respect of the words "begotten and to be begotten." But the words used in this will naturally denote the existing children of Mary Crook. Beachcroft v. Beachcroft (1 Madd. 430, 443, 444), which was followed in Dover v. Alexander (2 Hare, 275; 12 L. J. Ch. 175), and Dilley v. Matthews (13 W. R. 676), are clear authorities in favour of the plaintiffs; particularly the judgment in Beachcroft v. Beachcroft, every word of which supports our contention. However much that case may have been commented on in subsequent ones, it has never been overruled; nor has there been any case which has decided that even if future legitimate children may have been intended, present illegitimate ones cannot take concurrently with them.

[STUART, V.C.—If you are right in saying that this testator meant "illegitimate" children, must he not of necessity have intended such as had at the date of the will acquired the reputation of children?]

If so, the plaintiffs had then virtually acquired that reputation. Owen v. Bryant (2 De Gex, M. & G. 697; 21 L. J. Ch. 860) was a case of a gift to a class of children, some of which were legitimate and the others were not. Here, however, we have no concurrent legitimate children.

[STUART, V.C.—If the bequest is to children as a mere class, it must mean children not illegitimate.]

But the bequest here is equivalent to one to the "present and future children" of Mary Crook, under which words it is plain that present illegitimate children might take concurrently with future legitimate children. The words of description in this will are quite sufficient for the purpose; and in Wilkinson v. Adam, ubi supra, Lord Eldon distinctly affirmed that the Court never would reject words of description in such cases as these. Evans v. Massey (8 Price, 22, 23), is a direct authority in support of the proposition that if there is sufficient certainty in describing the objects of the testator's bounty to preclude the necessity of having recourse to proof aliunde, a bequest to "natural children" is a good bequest. Holt v. Sindrey, ubi supra, and Savage v. Robertson, ubi supra, do but carry out the doctrines laid down in Wilkinson v. Adam, ubi supra. In Pratt v. Matthew (22 Beav. 328; 25 L. J. Ch. 409; on appeal, 25 L. J. Ch. 686), and many other cases it has been the constant remark of the Judges, that although the intention of a testator to benefit particular objects has been clear, the arbitrary rules of law have alone forbidden the Court to give effect to that evident intention. In this case, however, there is in reality no rule of law against the right of the plaintiffs, but only a legal presumption of intention to give to legitimate children only, which is rebutted by the words of the will, and the intention of the testator to benefit the existing children is abundantly clear.

Mr. J. H. Palmer, for the defendant Robert Crook.—Holt v. Sindrey, ubi supra, is in favour of this defendant. So, also, is the case of Barnett v. Tugwell (31 Beav. 232; 31 L. J. Ch. 629). I am not contending for the child begotten and born after the date of the will, but for that one of whose existence and origin the testator was well aware when he made his will; and whom, when he speaks of "the children" of his daughter Mary Crook, it is quite impossible to say he did not contemplate.

STUART, V.C.—I have more than once had occasion to say that I consider the case of Beachcroft v. Beachcroft and the principle upon which it was decided, and also the case of Fraser v. Pigott (1 You. Ex. Rep. 354) to be inconsistent with the other authorities upon this subject. Sir Thomas Plumer, in his judgment in the case of Beachcroft v. Beachcroft, proceeded upon this principle: You must suppose that when a testator makes a gift by his will to children as a class, when he is sitting down to make his will, and is intending a bounty to the children of a certain individual, he must have in his mind some present person to fill that character. Sir Thomas Plumer's words (at p. 443, ubi supra) are these: "The general presumption is, that a man sitting down to make his will designs a benefit to some existing object; he seldom looks only to the future." No doubt Lord Lyndhurst seems to have satisfied his mind that that was a proper principle. But when you find that a number of Judges have —and Lord Eldon repeatedly has—disapproved of that principle, and decided cases in a manner wholly inconsistent with it, it is impossible to say that any Judge would now act safely in adopting the principle or following the authority of Beachcroft v. Beachcroft and Fraser v. Pigott to the disregard of those other decisions. What Lord Eldon's opinion was cannot be shewn in any way more strongly than by reading two lines of his judgment in Harris v. Lloyd (Turn. & R. 310). That was a case in which by a will the testator gave 5,000*l.* in trust for "all and every the child and children of his son Edward Harris, if more than one, to be equally divided between them, share and share alike, the shares of the sons to be vested at twenty-one," and so on. It was in evidence in that case that there were children of Edward Harris whom the testator treated as his grandchildren, but that Edward Harris had never been married to anybody. There was a woman with whom he cohabited who was the mother of his children. Lord Eldon (at p. 313) says this: "I have not the least doubt that this testator meant illegitimate children; but I am clearly of opinion that there is not enough upon the face of the will to authorize me to carry that intention into effect." There can be nothing stronger than that. The present case is not like the case of Holt v. Sindrey, where the fact of the illegitimacy was wholly unknown to the testator. In that case the testator had every reason to believe, and probably both the husband and the wife believed, that their marriage was a lawful one. In that case I was of opinion that there were sufficient words of description upon the face of the will, and I therefore felt myself authorized in holding that the children of that marriage (although it was not a lawful marriage) were described in the will and were entitled to take.

But here the case is exactly the converse. This testator knew everything. It is not suggested that there was any fact unknown to him. The marriage was not a legal marriage. The children were not lawful children. If his daughter had married another person and had had children born in lawful wedlock, clearly those children would have been entitled, and that too under the very same description which I am now called upon to say means "illegitimate" children. That would be to my mind contrary both to principle and to authority. I cannot, therefore, adopt that view. The demurrer must be allowed.

COMPANY.—A shareholder transferred 150 shares to the manager and a director "on behalf of the company," on the understanding that the value of them at par should be credited to him as payment in full on other 50 shares, of which he retained possession. The company had now power to hold its own shares:—Held, that the transaction being ultra vires, he could not thus divest himself of his liability without notice to and the knowledge of all the individual shareholders; and that he was still a contributory for the whole number of 200 shares.

Affidavits filed while a case stands over part heard will not be admitted in evidence if objected to.

In the year 1867, Mr. Cross was the holder of 200 shares of 10*l.* each in the above company, in respect of which he had paid 353*l.* In August of that year he transferred 150 of these shares, as recorded in the following board minute of the company, dated the 28th and 29th of August, 1867: "The committee registered the following transfers: viz., 50 shares, B. C. Cross to Thos. Heywood, on behalf of the company; 50 shares, B. C. Cross to W. P. Clift, on behalf of the company; 50 shares, B. C. Cross to Thos. Heywood, on behalf of the company; and it was resolved that Messrs. Heywood and Clift be authorized, as transferees, to hold the shares respectively transferred in the name of the company, and that they be hereby indemnified from any personal liability attached to the same, such shares to be counted as unappropriated and open for re-allotment." Heywood was the manager, and Clift was a director of the company. The company had no power to hold shares of their own.

The company was wound up upon petition in June, 1868, and Mr. Cross's name was retained by the chief clerk on the list of contributories for the whole number of 200 shares originally held by him. The summons was adjourned into Court on the application of Mr. Cross. According to an affidavit filed by Cross, the above transfers were made under the following circumstances. The company owed their bankers a sum of 1,500*l.*, for which some of the directors were personally liable; the bank holding their private security as well as the company's bond for the debt. Cross being applied to to assist the company in its difficulties, consented to do so on the following terms: viz. that the directors should individually purchase 150 of his shares at par (i. e., at 30*s.*) and apply the purchase-money, 225*l.*, to paying up in full his remaining 50 shares; and Cross, on his side, should relieve the directors of their personal liability to the bank. These conditions were accepted, and Cross executed three transfers of 50 shares each to Heywood, Clift, and Broddigan (another director). Broddigan, however, objected to take the 50 shares transferred to him, and they were accordingly also transferred to Heywood, and the transfers were registered as above recorded. Cross denied that he was aware that the transfers had been registered with the words "on behalf of the company," or that he ever intended that the shares should be so transferred, or should be held by the transferees otherwise than as their own individual property; and he contended that the transaction was bona fide, and that he was no longer a contributory in respect of these 150 shares.

The official liquidator contended that, the transfers having been made to officers of the company, and the money previously paid by Cross in respect of the 150 shares not having been transferred to the credit of the transferees in their share account, but having been applied to make the 50 shares remaining in Cross's name fully paid, the transaction was not bona fide, but was simply intended to relieve Cross of all liability in respect of his shares in the company. In support of this view an affidavit of the secretary to the company was filed, shewing that Cross had been regularly informed from time to time as to the negotiations for the transfer of his shares.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. N. Higgins, for the official liquidator, cited Brotherhood's case (31 Beav. 365; 31 L. J. Ch. 861); Spackman's case (37 L. J. Ch. 752; L. R. 3 H.L. 171); Stanhope's case (35 L. J. Ch. 296; L. R. 1 Ch. Ap. 161); Ex parte Morgan (1 M'N. & G. 225; 18 L. J. Ch. 265); Richmond's case (4 Kay & J. 305); Musgrave's case (37 L. J. Ch. 161; L. R. 5 Eq. 193); Eyre's case (31 Beav. 177; 31 L. J. Ch. 640),—contending that the transaction was ultra vires of the directors, as the company could not hold its own shares. It was not a bona fide transaction, but a collusion between Cross and the directors without the knowledge of the other shareholders, who were damnified by the diminution of his liability.

Mr. Cole and Mr. Bush, for Cross, cited—Reeve's case (10 W. R. 817); Orpen's case (11 W. R. 741; 32 L. J. Ch. 633 (see 33 L. J. Ch. 67)); Hollwey's case (1 De Gex & Sm. 777); Grady's case (1 De Gex, J. & S. 488; 32 L. J. Ch. 326),—insisting that the directors were personally liable on these shares; and the official liquidator could not require Cross also to be liable. The entry in the minute-book, representing that the transferees held the shares on behalf of the company, was made without Cross's knowledge and could not affect him. The case was really one to be decided on the facts.

MALINS, V.C. discussed the evidence and came to the conclusion that Cross's original intention had been, as set out in his affidavit, to transfer his share to the transferees named individually; but that, the proposed transferees having objected to undertake any personal responsibility, the transfers had been made to them on behalf of the company with his knowledge and assent, as sworn in the secretary's affidavit. His contract, as originally proposed, had doubtless been that he should be relieved of his shares by the directors individually; but that proposition had not been acceded to, and, according to the final and only contract made and recorded in the minute of the 29th of August, the transferees had taken his shares on behalf of the company.—His Honour then proceeded to say:

If this be the correct view of the facts, the law is perfectly clear. The cases cited have no longer any application. This is a company which has no power of buying these shares; therefore, directly it is shewn that the real transaction was that the directors or managers took these, there is an end of the question; because it is admitted that, qua company, they had no right to buy. Mr. Cole particularly relied on Orpen's case. I need not go through The Cattle Insurance Company and other cases, from Morgan's case downwards. Spackman's case is only a final embodiment of all those decisions, and all concur in this, that wherever there is a contrivance between the company and the shareholder, by which the company takes upon itself the responsibility of the shares without the knowledge of all the individual shareholders, that will not bind the shareholders; but they will be entitled to look to the shareholder whose shares are so attempted to be got rid of as one of the contributories, liable to meet the common liabilities of the company. Then, with regard to Reeve's case, that has no application to this. Orpen's case, which is rather relied upon, is a case in which the only ingredient existing here was wanting. Orpen's case is one in which Orpen agreed to transfer his shares to one of the managers of the company. When the transfer was produced, it was stated to be on behalf of the company. There was great doubt whether these words formed part of the transaction. Kindersley, V.C. had a jury before him to try whether these words formed part of the original transfer; and they found they did not. The consequence was, that it was a simple transfer. Whether the money was paid to Orpen or not did not matter; he assigned simply to Charlton as an individual; I think that is no authority against this.

The result, therefore, to which I have arrived is this, that this was a transaction to attempt to diminish Mr. Cross's liability by throwing the liability on the company; that is ineffectual, because the company are not authorized to purchase shares. Therefore, I am very sorry (because I think Mr. Cross has been unfairly treated by the company) that I am unable, for these reasons, to do anything else than say he must be put on the list for the 200 shares.

Mr. Glasse asked for costs, and referred to the words of Vice Chancellor Giffard in Gower's case (L. R. 6 Eq. 82): "I think it right that, where a contributory raises a costly contest of this kind, he should, except under very special circumstances, pay the costs."

Digitized by Google

MALINS, V.C.—If you press for the costs, I do not see any grounds for refusing them.

This adjourned summons being opened and part heard on the 10th of July, stood over till the 17th. On the 16th, Cross filed a further affidavit, to which the other side then filed affidavits in reply. Malins, V.C. said, as a general rule, he would not allow evidence to be filed after a case had commenced; but that in this case, as it had been replied to, he would admit it.

twenty-one should leave issue, then to the use of such only remaining or only child, his or her heirs and assigns; and in case there should be no child of the marriage, or if all such should die under twenty-one and without any of them leaving issue, to the use of the heirs and administrators (according to the tenure and quality of the same property) of the said Elizabeth Ann Brookman as if she had died sole and unmarried. Then followed a proviso for the cesser of the husband's interest in case of bankruptcy (which event happened), in which case the trustees were directed to pay the rents and profits of the said trust estates to the wife for her separate use during the joint lives of the husband and wife; and in case she should be dead at the time of such bankruptcy, or should afterwards die leaving the husband surviving, then the trustees were to hold the said trust estates upon the same trusts as if the husband were dead; and it was further declared and agreed that the last will and testament of Thomas Brookman and the settlement on the marriage aforesaid should be penned in the most full, clear, explicit and liberal manner to effect the intention of the parties thereto, and should contain all usual powers, provisoes, covenants, &c. It was also provided that in case Elizabeth Ann Brookman died in the lifetime of Thomas Brookman without issue surviving her at the time of her decease the above covenant as to a child's share should cease, it being agreed that Violett, the husband, should have no claim or title to it; and there was a covenant that all property acquired by the wife during the coverture should be settled upon the trusts thereinbefore declared of the property settled by Thomas Brookman.

Thomas Brookman died in 1849, having by his will, dated the 23rd of January, 1840, devised a farm at Stock, in Somersetshire, to James Brookman in fee, subject to the payment of the sum of 149*l*. 7*s*. 6*d*. to trustees therein named, which he bequeathed to them upon the trusts thereinafter declared; and he devised a house and lands at Uphill to Fanny Brookman in fee, subject to the payment of a sum of 267*l*. 16*s*. 3*d*. to the same trustees, which he bequeathed to them upon the same trusts thereinafter declared. And after reciting the said marriage articles, and that he was desirous of specifically performing the said covenant or agreement according to the true intent and meaning of the said settlement, he, the said testator, in part satisfaction and performance thereof, gave to the same trustees, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, according to the respective natures and tenures of the same, all that freehold and leasehold property therein described upon the trusts thereinafter declared; and after bequeathing his residuary personal estate in manner therein mentioned, he directed the said trustees to stand possessed of one equal fourth part of his residuary personal estate, together with the said two sums of 149*l*. 7*s*. 6*d*. and 267*l*. 16*s*. 3*d*. so charged and made payable to them as aforesaid upon the trusts thereinafter declared; and he declared that the freehold hereditaments devised as aforesaid to the said trustees should from and after his decease be to the use of the said Violett and his assigns until death or bankruptcy, and after such bankruptcy, in case the said Elizabeth Ann, his wife, should be living, upon trust for her separate use during the joint lives of herself and her husband without power of anticipation; and after the decease of Violett, in case the said Elizabeth Ann, his wife, should then be living, to the use of her and her assigns for her life without impeachment of waste, with divers remainders over for the benefit of all and every or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or child of the said marriage as the husband and wife should jointly or as the survivor should appoint, and in default of appointment, to the use of all and every the children of the marriage, as tenants in common, with benefit of survivorship in case of any child dying under twenty-one without leaving issue; and in case all such children but one should die without issue, or if there should be but one, then as to the entirety of such freehold hereditaments to the use of such remaining or only child in fee; and in case every child of the marriage should die under twenty-one without leaving issue, then to the use of the heirs and assigns of his daughter, the said Elizabeth Ann Violett, as if she had continued sole and unmarried; with remainder to the testator's right heirs in case the said Elizabeth Ann died in his lifetime and without leaving issue surviving her; with a declaration of trust with respect to the leasehold and personal property and the two specific sums of money thereby bequeathed similar, as near as might be, to those declared of the freehold hereditaments, but so as not to vest in any tenant in remainder who should not attain twenty-one; and if no person should acquire a vested interest in the said leasehold premises and personal property and sums of money aforesaid, then in trust for the next-of-kin of his said daughter Elizabeth Ann Violett, according to the statute; and the testator declared that the two several sums of 149*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* and 267*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, when added to the value of the said freehold and leasehold premises by him devised and bequeathed as aforesaid to the said trustees, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, upon the trusts thereinbefore declared concerning the same, in his estimation made the same of the entire value and amount of "one child's share or equal part" of all his real and personal estate, lands, tenements and hereditaments, according to the true intent of the aforesaid covenant.

There were three children only of the marriage, all of whom died in the lifetime of the testator. One of them only, a son named William, attained twenty-one years, but he died a bachelor.

Violett, the husband, became insolvent in 1850, and thereby ceased to take any interest in the trust property. In 1855 he joined with his wife in conveying and assigning all the trust property devised and bequeathed to the said trustees by Thomas Brookman, "or otherwise subject to the trusts of the settlement of 1823," to Lanatt Smith, upon certain trusts for the benefit of Elizabeth Ann Violett for her life, and after her death as she should by deed or will appoint. Lanatt Smith died in 1860.

Elizabeth Ann Violett died on the 24th of June, 1868, having by her will, dated in 1860, and made in pursuance of the above power, directed that all her estate and interest under the above deed of 1855 should be conveyed and assigned to George Smith, the respondent to this petition, upon certain trusts for sale, &c.; and she gave and bequeathed all the residue of her estate to the said G. Smith absolutely, and appointed him her executor.

The respondent, George Smith, had also become, through various mesne assignments, the sole surviving trustee of the will of Thomas Brookman, and in that character he paid into Court, on the 6th of November, 1868, the sum of 777*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.*, which was admitted to be the amount of the one-fourth share given in trust for Elizabeth Ann Violett by the said will of Thomas Brookman, including the sums charged on the properties devised to James and Fanny Brookman.

The petitioners, James and Fanny Brookman, were the next-of-kin of Elizabeth Ann Violett, if she had died sole and unmarried. And they now presented this petition praying that the sum of 777*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.*, paid into Court as aforesaid, might be transferred to them, on the ground that under the will of Thomas Brookman and in the events that had happened they were entitled thereto.

The respondent, George Smith, on the other hand, claimed the fund as sole and residuary legatee of Mrs. Violett, contending that, under the settlement of 1823 and in the events that had happened, she had power to dispose of the trust estate by will.

Mr. Hardy and Mr. Everitt, for the petitioners.—We say that Mrs. Violett had no power of appointment, and that the appointment to the respondent, George Smith, is good for nothing; and we claim under the gift over in the testator's will. William, the only child of Elizabeth Ann Violett who attained twenty-one, died in the lifetime of the testator, and consequently could not take under his will; his interest never vested. All the children of the marriage pre-deceased the testator, who therefore ceased to be bound by the covenant in their favour. The testator's covenant to give by will gave no specific lien to any of the cestuis que trust; had he disposed of all his property by deed in his lifetime, their only remedy would have been by action on the covenant. The proviso in the articles for the avoidance of the covenant, in case Mrs. Violett died in the testator's lifetime without leaving issue surviving, shews that no child was intended to take who did not survive his mother. If the contest is between the articles and the will, the will, as the last of the two, must prevail—Remnant v. Hood (27 Beav. 74). They also cited Jones v. How (7 Hare, 267; 19 L. J. Ch. 324); Eyre v. Monro (3 Kay & J. 305; 26 L. J. Ch. 757); Kay v. Crook (3 Sm. & Gif. 407); Jones v. Martin (5 Ves. 265 n.).

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Jason Smith, for the assignees in bankruptcy of Mr. Violett, the husband.—We demand to be heard, although we have not been served with the petition. We also say the appointment to George Smith is bad, but we say the share vested under the articles in the deceased son William, who attained twenty-one, and we claim as assignees of the husband, who took the share of his deceased son William as his next-of-kin. There is a covenant by the husband to settle after-acquired property (which clearly means property other than that coming under the testator's covenant) on the same trusts as those previously declared. A settlement under that covenant must have given the deceased son William a vested interest; and the testator's covenant must receive the same construction. Jones v. Howe (ubi supra) does not come near the present case. M'Ghie v. M'Ghie (2 Madd. 368), which might be cited against us, is defective in the marginal note. But Barkworth v. Young (4 Drew. 1; 26 L. J. Ch. 153) is to the point. There a demurrer to a bill for the performance of a covenant similar to this was overruled, because the testator might have fulfilled his covenant by dying intestate. If this had been a settlement of real estate upon certain trusts, followed by a covenant by the testator to leave one quarter of the real estate of which he should die possessed on the same trusts, could the testator have left it on different trusts? Or if the husband and wife had exercised their joint power of appointment as provided by the articles in favour of a child, and that child died in the lifetime of the testator, could the subsequent death of the child deprive him of his vested interest under the appointment?—Graham v. Wickham (1 De Gex, J. & S. 474; 32 L. J. Ch. 639).

Mr. Speed, for the respondent, George Smith.

Mr. Hardy, in reply.—If the claim of the father succeeds, it will be directly in the teeth of the articles, which declare that he shall take no interest. The articles only impose on the testator the obligation of devising a certain portion of his property in substantial accordance with certain declared trusts.

[MALINS, V.C.—I go with you to this extent,—that the testator was not bound to do it otherwise than by will.]

Then we must look at all the provisions in the articles as if they were in the will, and none can take who could not take under the will. The marriage articles are a good present settlement as to the after-acquired property; as to the child's share they are entirely executory. Barkworth v. Young (ubi supra) is not material, but it recognizes the principle of Jones v. How (ubi supra), and is conclusive that a will, though made under the obligation of marriage articles, is to be construed as a pure will under the Wills Act.

MALINS, V.C. (after referring to the marriage articles and the will, and discussing the circumstances of the case, proceeded as follows:)—Upon the view I take of the case it is perfectly unnecessary to enter into the question of what the operation of the will is, because I am of opinion that the rights of these parties do not depend upon the will, but upon the marriage articles.

It has been argued, and the case of Jones v. How was relied upon to shew that, inasmuch as these marriage articles are a contract to provide for the husband and wife and the issue of the marriage, no person can take anything by virtue of these articles who did not survive the testator, because no person can take under the will of a man unless he be in existence at the time of the death of the testator, with the single exception that is made by the 33rd section of the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26). There is no doubt that view is correct: if the contract be to make a will in favour of particular objects, and these objects do not exist at the death of the testator, the contract falls to the ground, and has no operation. In Jones v. How the question was simply this: the testator by a contract made on the marriage of his daughter covenanted to leave to his daughter absolutely, not to her and her children, "one equal eighth part, or such other part as shall be an equal share with all and each of his children and child of all estates, moneys, real and personal estate, of which he should die possessed." The daughter died in the testator's lifetime; by will, therefore, she was of course incapable of taking anything; had the testator made a will, and had the Wills Act not been in operation, there would have been simply an intestacy.

The case being sent by Sir J. Wigram, according to the unfortunate practice of the day, for the opinion of a Court of law, a question was submitted to the Court of Common Pleas, whether on the events which had happened there was any subsisting contract on the part of the testator, the contract being that he would leave an equal share to her as well as the other children, and the answer of the Court of law was, that there was no breach of contract, inasmuch as he had only contracted to leave by will; and there being no person to take under the will, the contract had no operation.—[His Honour then read and commented on the judgment of Wigram, V.C. as reported (7 Hare, pp. 274-6), and referred more especially to the doubt expressed by him whether the testator might not by will have done for his daughter (dying in his lifetime without issue) that which the Wills Act would have done for her if she had left issue living at her death, and proceeded:]—Now, what ought to have been the decision there? There was a contract by a man for valuable consideration that he would by his will leave to his daughter an equal provision with his other children. If he had performed that covenant, which he ought to have been compelled to do, or his estate left to bear the consequence, what would have been the result? You would have found in that will a bequest to the daughter of one-fourth of his property; if she had left children, the 33rd section of the Wills Act would have come into operation, which would have made the bequest to the daughter take effect; and what would have been the consequence? The property would have vested in her; if the husband had survived her he would have taken it, and have provided for his family; and if he had died in her lifetime, her children as next-of-kin would have taken it; or, if the covenantor had died intestate, her children as her representatives would have taken her share under the intestacy, and the object would have been secured; instead of which, by the narrow construction put upon it by a Court of law and acquiesced in by Sir J. Wigram, the whole object was defeated and came to an end. I entirely dissent from that case, which I should myself have decided in a directly contrary manner, and I decline to follow it in the present instance.

Now, what is the object of the covenant in this case? The covenantor's daughter being about to marry, and he being of course ignorant what his circumstances would be at the time of his death, he did not think fit to bind himself to give her any particular sum. Had he done so, had he covenanted that his executors should after his death pay 10,000*l*., to be settled on the husband for life, the wife for life, remainder to the children attaining twenty-one, nobody could have said that a grandchild was not an object of the trust; the children would have taken a vested interest at birth, and the moment the son William attained twenty-one he would have taken an indefeasible vested interest in that 10,000*l*., which he could have sold or settled, or otherwise dealt with. But here, instead of binding himself to a particular sum, he says, "You shall have the same as my other children have; but if neither you nor any of your children are living at my death, it is unnecessary to provide for them." His contract is this: "If Elizabeth Ann Brookman survive Thomas Brookman," which she did, "or dying leave any child or children, or issue of child or children," which she did not; that is not necessary,—"then the said Thomas Brookman will by his last will and testament give, devise and otherwise well and effectually settle and assure," not to her or her children, not to persons incapable of taking, but "to trustees to be named by him, a child's share or equal part with his other children," to be held in trust for the husband till his bankruptcy (which occurred), then to the daughter for her life, with remainder to the child or children as they shall appoint, and in default to all the children, with a proviso that if any die under twenty-one it shall go over to those who attain twenty-one, and if all die under twenty-one over to other parties, i.e., the next-of-kin of the daughter. The son William attained the age of twenty-one, the period for final and absolute vesting fixed by this settlement; he was clearly an object of its provisions; how, then, am I to hold that he is not to take under it, because he happens to die during the life of the testator, and because the amount of the provision was to remain in uncertainty until after the death of the testator? No one doubts, and the authorities are clear, that the testator had full power to alienate all his property up to his death, and that the covenant only bound such property as he might choose to leave.

Besides the case of Jones v. How, that of Barkworth v. Young, before Kindersley, V.C., was relied upon; but the judgment in that case scarcely amounted to a decision, being on demurrer, and even so far as it goes it contains an intimation of Sir Richard Kindersley's opinion that a provision of this kind to make a settlement by will does not come to an end by the death of all the children.

Mr. Hardy relied also upon the clause in the articles providing that if the wife should die in the lifetime of the husband without issue surviving at the time of her decease, then the covenant should cease, "it being understood that the said husband should have no claim or title to such child's part or share." The answer to that is, it has no operation because the event did not occur. True, the consequence of its having vested is, that the father takes by the devolution of the property; but I cannot hold that the father can be excluded from taking that which was the absolute property of the son when he attained his majority. The proviso as to after-acquired property goes far to carry out the same view. If I acceded to Mr. Hardy's argument, the consequence would be that if the wife acquired property during the coverture, this contract having, in the events which have happened, come to an end, there would be no settlement of that property whatever; for if there is no settlement of the father's property, neither is there any of the husband's. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the rights of the parties do not depend on the will, but that the interest in the "child's share" vested finally and absolutely in the only son, William, on his attaining twenty-one, by the marriage articles. The consequence is, that it will go in the usual course of law to his father on his producing letters of administration. The petition must be amended pro forma by making the assignee in bankruptcy of the father a respondent.

Will—Conversion—Tenant for Life and Remainderman — Capital and Income.

ESTATE.—A testator directed his trustees to allow his estate to remain invested as it might be at his decease, if they should think fit, and, subject to such direction, to convert it and pay the income to his widow for her life, remainder over. The trustees proceeded to realize his estate as soon as possible after his death, but in the interval certain ships in which he was interested as partner earned freight, and dividends were paid on certain shares held by the testator in partnership; on the sale of these ships and shares a considerable profit was also realized:—Held, that the tenant for life was not entitled to the freight or dividends or to the profits on the sales as income, but that they formed part of the capital, and that she was entitled to interest thereon from the death of the testator.

Testator, at the time of his death, in 1860, was in partnership with a Mr. Fenwick as shipowners and merchants. The firm were part owners of various ships, and also held shares in a colliery and an assurance company. By his will, made in 1860, he gave to trustees, of whom his wife was one, all his estate, upon trust, if they should think fit, to continue such part of his estate as might at the time of his decease be invested in any mine, ship, mortgage or other investment or security, and subject to such discretion, to get in and convert into money all other his estate, and (after payment of legacies, &c. therein mentioned) to invest the residue as therein directed, and from time to time, with the consent of his wife during her life, and after her decease, with the consent of Elizabeth Ann Rowland, thereinafter mentioned, to vary the securities, and to pay the income to his wife or permit her to receive the dividends, interest and annual produce to arise from the stocks, funds and securities on which his estate might from time to time be invested, for her life, and after her decease, to pay the same to Elizabeth Ann Rowland for her life as therein directed; and after the decease of Elizabeth Ann Rowland, over.

This bill having been filed for the administration of the estate, the Chief Clerk by his certificate found that the share of the testator in the said partnership had been realized within eighteen months after his death, and had produced a gross sum of 28,777*l.*, and he included in that gross sum the profits which had been made by the sale of the ships and shares beyond the amount originally paid in respect of them, and also the sum of 3,030*l.* which had been earned as freight by the ships belonging to the partnership in the interval between the death of the testator and the realization of his partnership assets, and also a sum of 330*l.* which had accrued as dividends upon the colliery and other shares of the partnership in the same interval. He also found that the course of dealing in the partnership had been to open an account in the partnership books with respect to each venture, debiting it with the original cost, with losses and with interest, and crediting it with the sums received or earned in the venture, and only on the sale of the property the subject of the venture to balance the books and carry to the debit or credit of each partner the profit or loss made, and to consider such profit or loss as made on the day of closing the account; this course of dealing had been adopted in making up the accounts for the purpose of realizing the share of the testator. He also found that the trustees had paid interest at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. on the said gross sum of 28,777*l.* to the widow of the testator, the first tenant for life.

The cause now came on for further consideration. The question was whether the Chief Clerk was right in adding the aforesaid sums of 3,030*l.* freight and 330*l.* dividends, to the capital of the testator's estate, allowing the widow interest only thereon, or whether the widow was entitled to the corpus of these sums as being "annual produce arising from the securities on which the estate was invested."

Mr. Cotton and Mr. Hall, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. C. Russell, for those in remainder, cited Brown v. Gellatly (L. R. 2 Ch. 751); Mousley v. Carr (4 Beav. 49; 10 L. J. Ch. 260).

Mr. J. Pearson and Mr. Cracknall, for the widow.—In the cases cited against us, the sales are expressly directed to be made for the benefit of the estate; here the testator distinctly says that his widow shall have the benefit of continuing the investments as he leaves them at his death. They cited Green v. Britten (1 De Gex, J. & S. 649); Johnston v. Moore (27 L. J. Ch.

453); Ibbotson v. Elam (L. R. 1 Eq. 188); In re Maxwell's Trusts (1 Hem. & M. 610; 32 L. J. Ch. 833).

MALINS, V.C.—I think the case is concluded by authority; but independently of authority, I think the account has been taken in a manner very favourable to the widow. The testator being engaged in trade principally as a shipowner, and knowing therefore how desirable it was that there should be no immediate direction to convert his property, as he might die at a time when the markets were low, directs his trustees, "if they should think fit, to continue such part of his estate as might at the time of his decease be invested in any mine, ship, mortgage or other investment or security of whatever kind, and subject to such discretion to convert it," &c. (quoting the words as above.)—Now, it has been contended that the widow is entitled to the produce actually made by the ships and mines of which the testator was the owner, or in which he was interested at his death.—[His Honour then referred to the facts as found by the chief clerk, and proceeded]—The principle upon which the life estate of the widow has been settled has been to treat all the money as capital, including the profits, and upon that capital to give her 5*l.* per cent. from the death of the testator. She is not satisfied with that, but asks for the profits actually made. I was at first considerably impressed with that view of the case, because it certainly does appear that when a man says, "I direct that my property may be continued as I leave it, and my wife, who is tenant for life, is to have the profits of the investment," that she is entitled to the profits produced from the state of the investment as it existed at the time of his death; but further consideration has led me to conclude that that is not a correct view of the matter, especially in this case, where there was no continuance of the trading, and the property was realized as soon as circumstances would permit. It was clearly the most beneficial thing for the widow that she should take the capital as it stood at the death of the testator, including any accretions by the sale, and thus secure her income whatever happened. The opposite view of the case might have deprived her of any income; for if the ships had traded badly, she might have had no income, or actually have lost money, whereas now she is secured an income at 5*l.* per cent. on the value of the ships, &c. But the case is concluded by authority. There is the case of Mousley v. Carr, where Lord Brougham reversed the decision of Sir J. Leach, and held that the widow was not entitled to any increase on the testator's capital. Mr. Pearson seemed to admit that if in this case the testator had said "to carry on for the benefit of my wife and those in remainder," it would have been governed by Mousley v. Carr. But the trustees are empowered to continue the investments generally, and not for any period in particular, thus plainly shewing that they were to do it for the benefit of the tenant for life and those in remainder as well. The words are, in fact, implied in the plainest terms, for the trustees are to do so "as long as they think fit"; thus they may do it during the life of the wife or after her death; in other words, do it for the benefit of the tenant for life and those in remainder; and Mousley v. Carr applies. In Brown v. Gellatly Lord Cairns began by shewing that Green v. Britten had no application, because in that case there was an absolute prohibition against converting the ships for seven years, and the tenant for life was therefore entitled to the profits made during that time; but, he said, in the case then before him there was no indication of an intention that the ships should remain unconverted for any specific time; and he went on to say, "in giving to his executors a power to sail the ships for the purpose of making a profit, the testator does not give it as a power to be exercised for the benefit of the tenant for life as against the remainderman, but for the benefit of the estate generally." I must follow the principle of these cases, and must take my law from them, if they are inconsistent (as I do not think they are) with Johnson v. Moore and Ibbotson v. Elam, cited against them; and the consequence is, in adjusting the rights of the tenant for life, and those in remainder, it must be on the principle of ascertaining the value of the property at the death of the testator, and giving the tenant for life 5*l.* per cent. interest from that date. In this case strictly 4*l.* per cent. only would have been allowed; but 5*l.* per cent. has been given in chambers, and has not been objected to, and will therefore stand.

Declare, that the widow is not entitled to receive for her own benefit the proportion of profit arisen since the death of the testator to his estate from the sale, freight or earnings of the ships, or from the sale of or the dividends on the shares; and declare, that the moneys arising from the sale of the ships and shares, and the sums accruing from the freight, earnings and dividends of the same respectively formed part of the capital of the testator's estate.

Pleading—Patent Suit—Infringement—Averment of Novelty in Bill.

PATENT.—In a suit to restrain the infringement of a patent, it is not necessary that the plaintiff's bill should contain any averment of the novelty of the invention.

This was a motion for a decree in a suit to restrain the defendant from using a patented invention to which the plaintiffs claimed to be exclusively entitled, for an account of profits, and for damages.

The bill stated the grant of letters patent, dated the 6th of February, 1867, to C. E. Brooman, giving to him, his executors, administrators and assigns, the exclusive right of making and using "an invention for 'a new method of manufacturing pearls or beads,' communicated to the said C. E. Brooman from abroad." The bill contained no further or other allegation of the novelty of the invention. The plaintiffs were the assignees of Brooman and their licensees.

Mr. Amphlett, Mr. Theodore Aston and Mr. Dundas Gardiner, in answer to an objection raised by the defendant's counsel, that the bill contained no averment of the novelty of the invention, argued that such an averment was unnecessary. The letters patent in themselves in terms stated that the invention was a new one.

[The VICE CHANCELLOR said that, even assuming those terms to be true, they did not shew that the invention had not been before communicated to a hundred persons in this country. He did not recollect ever having seen a bill in a case like this, which did not contain an averment of the novelty of the invention.]

Mr. Tripp, for the defendant, argued that without such an averment the pleadings were defective. The letters patent did not in themselves decide the novelty of the invention. Under the old practice, the question of novelty was frequently determined upon an issue sent to a Court of common law, and such an issue could have been directed only upon the statements in the pleadings—Walburn v. Ingilby (1 Myl. & K. 61).

JAMES, V.C. (without calling for a reply) said, the plaintiffs had given evidence of the novelty of the invention, which satisfied him that it was an entirely new invention introduced from France, and never before seen or known in this country. It was also an invention of great commercial success, and the extent to which it had been used by the plaintiffs was proof of its great public utility. Mr. Tripp had relied upon the insufficiency of the pleadings, and had urged that the absence of any averment of the novelty of the invention was fatal to the plaintiff's bill. But the objection that the invention was not a novel one was an objection which the defendant ought to raise by his answer, in which it was open to him positively to deny the novelty of the invention. He had doubted at first whether the averment of the novelty of the invention was not necessary to support a bill for the infringement of a patent; but on looking at a short form of a declaration at law for damages for the infringement of a patent, he found that it did not contain any allegation of the novelty of the invention, and accordingly he thought the bill sufficient without it; but, even if he had thought otherwise, he would not have allowed the defendant to have taken advantage of a mere technical objection of that sort, but should have directed the hearing to stand over until the defect had been remedied. He was, however, of opinion that the bill was sufficient, and that the plaintiff was entitled to a perpetual injunction.

Demurrer—Misrepresentation—Fraud—Concurrent Jurisdiction.

FRAUD AND MISREPRESENTATION.—B. induced R. to advance to him a sum of money, representing to him that it was to be advanced for the benefit of two persons, both of whom he stated to be men of good means, and parties to a bill of exchange held by him; and B. gave to R. a memorandum that he held the bill upon trust as to half of the proceeds for R. The bill of exchange being dishonoured at maturity, he filed a bill against B. to recover the money he had advanced. Upon demurrer by B. stating the above facts, and alleging all the representations to be false:—Held, that the allegations of fraud gave jurisdiction to a Court of equity notwithstanding the concurrent jurisdiction at law.

Demurrer. The allegations in the bill were as follows:

The defendant George Bolton having been for some time intimate with the plaintiff, James Ramshire, in the latter part of 1868 induced him to advance a sum of 237*l.* 10*s.*, by discounting a bill of exchange, to which two persons named Lawley and Ripley were principal parties, although it did not appear clearly which of the two drew upon the other. The defendant assured the plaintiff of the solvency of both of these parties, and particularly that Lawley had recently had a large sum left to him by the will of a person named in a newspaper produced by the defendant to the plaintiff. On the faith of these representations the plaintiff advanced the sum of 237*l.* 10*s.*, and received from the defendant a memorandum to the following effect:

"I acknowledge to hold in my possession an acceptance of F. Lawley, one-half of which belongs to Mr. James Ramshire (the plaintiff) and the other half to myself.

(Signed) "George Bolton."

The bill of exchange was dishonoured at maturity, and the bill prayed for a declaration that the defendant was personally liable to repay the money so advanced, and for an order accordingly. The bill charged that "the defendant was in fact well aware before and at the time of the plaintiff's paying to him the said sum of 237*l.* 10*s.* that the bill would not be met, and that the said Lawley and Ripley were at the time without available means to meet the bill of exchange," and that "at the time the defendant induced the plaintiff to advance the money on the representation that it was intended to be advanced to Ripley and Lawley, the defendant never intended so to advance it to them, and in fact never did so."

The bill then went on to charge that the defendant was specially cognizant of heavy liabilities of both Ripley and Lawley, and that his representations that they were men of property were untrue; that the whole transaction was a scheme of the defendant to enable Ripley and Lawley to pay off debts due from them to the defendant; that the whole or a considerable part of the sum advanced was retained by the defendant for his own use; and that the bill of exchange, if there really was any such bill, was held by the defendant without any consideration, and was to his knowledge worthless and void, and not enforceable against the drawer or acceptor thereof.

The defendant demurred for want of equity.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Cotterell, for the demurrer.—This is a mere money demand, for which the remedy is at law.

Mr. Everitt, for the plaintiff.—We charge fraud, which gives this Court jurisdiction—Colt v. Woollaston (2 P. Wms. 154); Blair v. Bromley (2 Phil. 354; 10 L. J. Ch. 495), and other cases, referred to in the Vice Chancellor's judgment.

Mr. Glasse, in reply.

MALINS, V.C. [after stating the circumstances as admitted by the demurrer, and concluding therefrom that there was a sufficient allegation of fraud] said: The bill alleges a case which unquestionably entitles the plaintiff to recover this money from the defendant. I was for some time of opinion that the case should go to a jury; and no doubt the distinction is very fine as to what cases can be settled in this Court and what in a Court of law. If a man says when he borrows money that he can pay it at a future time, when he knows he cannot, that cannot be settled in this Court; but if he says "the money will be secured by such and such a good security," knowing the man giving the security to be insolvent and the security void, that is a fraud which entitles a party to maintain a suit in this Court. In Pasley v. Freeman (3 Term Rep. 51) A. induced B. to advance money to C, knowing that C. ought not to be trusted, and the Court of Queen's Bench held that on that statement B. was entitled to recover the money. But is he entitled to recover in a Court of equity. In Colt v. Woollaston the Master of the Rolls says, "It is no objection that the parties have their remedy at law, and may bring an action for moneys had and received for the plaintiff's own use; for in cases of fraud the Court of equity has a concurrent jurisdiction with the common law, matter of fraud being the great subject of relief here." In Burrowes v. Lock (10 Ves. 470), which was a case of misrepresentation, an objection was taken that the remedy was at law, but Sir W. Grant, following Lord Eldon in Evans v. Bicknell (6 Ves. 173), held that cases of misrepresentation were more fit for equity than for law, and at least that there was a concurrent jurisdiction. Can anything be more gross than the misrepresentation stated here? The plaintiff is told that two persons are solvent and that there was a consideration for the transaction, when the defendant who made the statement knew that they were not solvent and that there was no consideration. If these statements be proved to be true, it is clear that the defendant must have a decree against him, and that this is a case which is cognizable in this Court. Cridland v. Lord de Mauley (1 De Gex & Sm. 459; 17 L. J. Ch. 190) is precisely to the same point. Blair v. Bromley seems to go on another ground. St. Aubyn v. Smart (L. R. 5 Eq. 183; 3 Ch. 646) is entirely on all-fours with this case, and was confirmed on appeal. Slim v. Croucher (1 De Gex, F. & J. 518; 29 L. J. Ch. 273) was a case of innocent mistake, in which the plaintiff filed a bill on the ground of misrepresentation, and Stuart, V.C. made a decree in his favour, which was confirmed on appeal. That was precisely the same as this case, except that that was an innocent misrepresentation, while here there is a wilful and gross mis-statement; that is to say, the defendant has obtained money from the plaintiff by false representations. No doubt if a man obtains money by false pretences he may be criminally prosecuted, but that does not prevent the plaintiff from having his remedy in this Court. The bill therefore rests upon the ordinary and firmly-established jurisdiction of this Court; where money is obtained by false representation, that is fraud, a ground upon which the jurisdiction of this Court and the Courts of law are concurrent.

The demurrer must be overruled with costs, the defendant to have a month to answer.

Will—Survivorship.

WILL.—Where there is an absolute gift in a will to a class, "with benefit of survivorship in case any should die without issue," and a gift of the parent's share to children in case the parent should die leaving children, that survivorship is to be referred to the death of the testator. Therefore, where a testator left his estate upon trust for his four children with those words attached to the gift:—Held, that all four children, having survived the testator, took absolutely.

The testator, Richard Bowers, who died in 1856, by his will devised and bequeathed all his residuary real and personal estate to William Bowers, Henry Bowers and John Haigh, on trust to get in his personal estate and then to divide the whole amongst his four children, William, Henry and Richard Bowers and Elizabeth Haigh, share and share alike, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, with benefit of survivorship in case any of them should die without issue, and in case any of his said children should die leaving any child or children, then he directed that the share, whether original or accruing, of him, her or them so dying should go, belong and be divided between such children in equal shares, if more than one, and if only one then the whole to such one and only child; and he appointed his trustees executors of his will.

All the testator's four children survived him and were living at the filing of this bill. Three of them, Richard, William and Elizabeth, had issue living; Henry was married, but had never had a child.

This bill was filed for the administration of the testator's estate, the question being whether the four children of the testator having survived him took absolute interests in their shares, or life estates only, with remainder to their children, if any, and in default of children, to the survivors or survivor of themselves.

Mr. Shapter and Mr. Vincent, for the plaintiff, supported the first view.

Mr. J. Pearson, for grandchildren, referred to Farthing v. Allen (2 Madd. 310); 2 Jarman on Wills, 730, in favour of the second construction.

Mr. Whitworth, in the same interest, cited Woodburne v. Woodburne (3 De Gex & Sm. 643; 19 L. J. Ch. 88); Gosling v. Townshend (17 Beav. 245).

Mr. Brodrick, for an executor.

Mr. Hardy and Mr. Humphrey, for the trustees.

MALINS, V.C. said, if the gift in the will had stopped before the mention of survivorship, the gift would have been unquestionably absolute: did the succeeding words divest it of that character? That would be their effect if the expression " die without issue " meant " die at any time without issue." But this could not be the intention of the testator; his only object in using those words was to prevent a lapse in the case of a child dying in his own lifetime without issue. If therefore the words were read in that sense, the will would be clear and consistent. The contrary decision in Farthing v. Allen was irrational, and opposed to the current of modern decisions. He should follow Gee v. the Mayor of Manchester (17 Q.B. Rep. 737; 21 L. J. Q.B. 242); Woodburne v. Woodburne; Home v. Pillans (2 Myl. & K. 15; 4 L. J. Ch. 2); and Ware v. Watson (7 De Gex, M. & G. 248), which was the leading case on the subject, and hold that where there was an absolute gift to a class, followed by "benefit of survivorship in case of any of them should die without issue," that survivorship was to be understood to refer to surviving the testator, and was a mere provision against lapse, which would cease to operate at the death of the testator. In the present case, therefore, all the four children, having survived the testator, had become indefeasibly and absolutely entitled to their shares.

Partition Suit—Plaintiffs' Title (a legal one) disputed by the Defendants—Jurisdiction—Evidence—Tithe Commutation Acts—Decree.

PARTITION.—A bill in equity for a partition ought not to be made the means of trying a title, which should be properly tried at law. But, although a plaintiff on such a bill must prove his title to that part of the property which he seeks to have divided, there is no rule that a bill for a partition cannot be maintained, if the defendant denies the title of the plaintiff, and that title is purely a legal one. If, in such a case, the partition of the property is the primary object of the bill, and the establishment of the plaintiffs' title is incidental only to that relief, the Court will make a decree for a partition, and with costs where the right to a decree is resisted.

EVIDENCE.—Principles on which the written statements of third parties (since deceased) are admissible as evidence, discussed.

The proceedings (properly authenticated) of the Commissioners acting under the Tithe Commutation Acts, are public evidence of the matters therein stated, and to be received as such.

Slade v. Barlow, 38 L. J. Ch. 369; L. R. 7 Eq. Ca. 296, and Bolton v. Bolton, L. R. 7 Eq. Ca. 298, observed upon.

The plaintiffs in this suit were Walter Peter Giffard, Walter Thomas Courtenay Giffard, William Reginald Herbert and Charlotte Josephine, his wife, and James Wyley and George Holyoake. The defendants were Richard Williams and Catherine Margaret, his wife, Robert Davies and John Craddock.

The bill in the suit stated that the estate known as Plas Ucha, situate in the township of Nerquis, in the parish of Mold, in the county of Flint, was about the beginning of the last century owned by a Mr. Roberts, whose daughter Helena married Peter Giffard, of Chillington, in the county of Stafford, the ancestor in title of the plaintiffs. Through that marriage the estate passed to Peter Giffard, and from him by divers acts in the law to Elizabeth Giffard, and on her decease to Thomas William Giffard, late of Chillington, aforesaid, as tenant in fee simple.

Thomas William Giffard, by his will, dated the 18th of July, 1855, devised all his freeholds of inheritance to the plaintiffs James Wyley and George Holyoake for the term of 1,000 years from his death, upon the trusts therein declared concerning the same, and subject thereto to the use of his first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons successively in tail general, with remainder to the use of his brother the plaintiff Walter Peter Giffard for his life, with remainder to the use of the plaintiff Walter Thomas Courtenay Giffard (then the only son of the plaintiff Walter Peter Giffard) for his life, with divers remainders over (which failed), with remainder to the plaintiff Charlotte Josephine Herbert, the eldest daughter of the testator, and the wife of the plaintiff William Reginald Herbert, as tenant in tail.

Thomas William Giffard died on the 21st of January, 1861. He left no son. Walter Peter Giffard was the tenant for life under the will of the estates therein comprised, including the Plas Ucha estate, and Charlotte Josephine Herbert was entitled to the first vested estate of inheritance under the will. The Plas Ucha estate had always since it had been in the family of the Giffards included one undivided moiety of a field, called Gwergloed Vadock, or Wereglodd Fudog.

The plaintiffs, by their bill, shewed, in support of their claim to the moiety of the field, that the tenant of the field had always (at least since 1738) paid rent for one moiety of it to the owner for the time being of the Plas Ucha estate, and that the tenants, or some person representing them, had always attended the rent-days of those owners; that in 1771 the Plas Ucha estate was parcelled out into farms, and that upon that parcelling out one moiety of Wereglodd Fudog was assigned as a separate holding to Edward Williams, at the rent of 1*l.* 10*s.* a year; that the owners of the Plas Ucha estate had from time to time repaired the fences of the field, and done other acts of ownership in relation thereto, and that a commutation and apportionment of the tithes took place in 1838, in which apportionment and the plan annexed thereto, one moiety of Wereglodd Fudog was stated to be the property of the said Elizabeth Giffard, and that Miss Elizabeth Henrietta Jones, who was then the owner of the neighbouring estate of Tyntwyll, and entitled as the owner of the other moiety of the field, raised no objection to that description.

The bill further stated that the other undivided moiety of the field had for many years past constituted part of the Tyntwyll estate, of which the defendant Catherine Margaret Williams, the wife of the defendant Richard Williams, was the owner in fee simple. The ancestors in title of the plaintiffs generally let their moiety of the field to the owners for the time being of the Tyntwyll estate, who in their turn let the entirety of the field as part of the farm of Tyntwyll and Tydryn, which letting was alleged by the plaintiffs to be, as to one moiety of the field, a sub-letting.

It had recently been discovered that valuable veins and mines of coal and iron existed under the surface of the Wereglodd Fudog field, and the defendants Richard Williams and his wife had in consequence and for the first time insisted that the defendant Catherine Margaret Williams was the absolute owner of the field, subject only to a rentcharge of 2*l.* a year, payable out of the whole of the Tyntwyll estate, and vested in the plaintiffs as the owners of the Plas Ucha estate.

The defendants Richard Williams and his wife had assumed to demise the entirety of the field to the defendant Robert Davies as tenant thereof from year to year.

Since the 25th of March, 1861, the defendant Richard Williams had excluded the plaintiffs from the receipt of any part of the rents of the field, and had received the rents for the entirety of it.

The bill further stated that the defendants alleged that the plaintiffs were entitled to a divided moiety of the field, and not to an undivided moiety. The plaintiffs, however, shewed that the ancestors in title of the defendant Catherine Williams, the wife of the defendant Richard Williams, were from time to time tenants under the ancestors in title of the plaintiffs of the moiety of the field, and that if such moiety was a divided one, such tenants confused the boundaries of the estates, and the boundaries thereof could not now be ascertained without the aid of this Court.

There were no visible boundaries dividing the field, and no boundaries were known to the persons who had been longest acquainted with the field.

The bill then prayed a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to an undivided moiety of the field called Wereglodd Fudog; that a partition might be made of the field; but that if the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were entitled to a divided moiety of the field, the boundaries of such moiety might be ascertained and defined, for an account, and payment of all rents received by the defendants Richard Williams and his wife, or either of them, in respect of the field (which relief, however, was ultimately waived); that the rights of the several parties in the field might be ascertained and declared, and that the defendants or one of them might pay the costs of the suit.

The defendants, by their answer (or by so much of it as is material to this report), denied that the Plas Ucha estate ever included the field in question or any part of it. They said they believed that neither the tenant of the field nor any other person had ever paid rent for any part of the field to the owner of the Plas Ucha estate, or to any other person than the owners of the Tyntwyll estate or farm. The defendants Richard Williams and his wife became entitled to that estate in 1846, and since that date the tenant of the field for the time being had regularly paid rent to them for the whole of it. In 1832 the Rev. Robert Jones, the then tenant for life of the Tyntwyll estate or farm, and who was the predecessor in title of the defendants Richard Williams and his wife, brought an action of ejectment against Robert Roberts, the then occupier and tenant under the said Robert Jones of the Tyntwyll farm, and recovered possession of the Tyntwyll estate or farm, including the entirety of the Wereglodd Fudog field, since which time the owners of the Tyntwyll estate or farm had been in the undisturbed possession of the rents and profits of the whole of the field.

They further stated that they had never seen or heard of any such tithe commutation or apportionment as the plaintiffs alleged to have been made in 1838; and that at that time Miss Elizabeth Henrietta Jones, the owner in tail of the Tyntwyll estate or farm, and as such entitled to the whole of the field in question, lived at a considerable distance from the estate, and was never informed and knew nothing of the alleged commutation and apportionment. They admitted that in 1848 they cut some timber on the field, but they insisted that they had a right to do so. They further said that in 1863, the plaintiff Walter Peter Giffard had brought an action against them to try the right to the rent of a divided moiety of the field, but had afterwards abandoned that action. They stated (paragraph 9. of their answer) that some of their former tenants, and of those of their predecessors in title, were employed by them and their predecessors to make certain payments in respect of charges on their estates, and that amongst other payments directed by them and their said predecessors in title to be made, such tenants as aforesaid had for fifty years and upwards made certain payments to the plaintiffs or their ancestors in title on account of a certain annual sum or rentcharge of 40*s*. which (as the defendants believed) was payable out of or charged upon the whole of their property at Nerquis (and not out of or upon the said field in particular) to or in favour of the plaintiffs or their ancestors by way of equality of exchange, on the occasion of certain exchanges of land effected many years ago between their predecessors in title and the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs; but they said that such payments were not made in respect of rent or otherwise in respect of the Wereglodd Fudog field, but by way of rentcharge or quit-rent on the whole of their Nerquis estates, and were in the receipts given for the same expressed to be so made.

Mr. Fry and Mr. Cozens Hardy, for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Osborne Morgan, for the principal defendants.—We take two preliminary objections to the bill. A great part of the plaintiffs' case rests on alleged payments of rent by the ancestors of the defendants to the predecessors of the plaintiffs. Those payments are attempted to be proved by the production of the rent-rolls of the Nerquis estate or farm, and entries made in certain books belonging to the plaintiffs themselves. There are also some other receipts which they rely upon. We say, first, that the bulk of that evidence is inadmissable. The entries in the books were made by third parties now dead, but it is not proved that they were made by such parties either in the due course of their business or against their own interest—Price v. Lord Torrington (1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 290); Outram v. Morewood (5 Term Rep. 121). With respect to the other receipts, we also produce some which rebut the proof intended to be established by those of the plaintiffs.

[STUART, V.C.—I think I had better hear Mr. Fry. You can reserve the objections and argue them when you open the defendants' case.]

Mr. Fry.—The plaintiffs, the owners in fee of a moiety of this field, commence their title to it with a deed dated the 17th of December, 1672, in which the field is mentioned by its present name of Wereglodd Fudog or Fadog. —[He then stated the title, and the facts of the case, ut supra.]—No doubt much of the plaintiffs' evidence is of the nature alluded to, but the receipts objected to are proved to have been given by agents of the plaintiffs' predecessors in title who were authorized by them to receive the money. So also the entries in the books are shewn to have been in the handwriting of their agents, and are found among the papers of such agents. Among other documents there is (in one of the books produced) a column of "observations," proved to be in the handwriting of the solicitor and agent (since deceased) of a predecessor in title of the plaintiffs. Those observations related to "the rental of the Flintshire estate from Michaelmas to Lady Day, 1818," and there occurs in them the words "Rob. Roberts has ½ of Wereglodd Fudog." Robert Roberts was a predecessor in title of the plaintiffs. The rent-rolls of the Nerquis estate, or at all events most of them, are proved to be in the handwriting of former "stewards" of that property. It is impossible, therefore, for the defendants to object to such evidence as that. The plaintiffs' title is, no doubt, a legal one, but this case is different from that of The Mayor of Basingstoke v. Lord Bolton (1 Drew. 270; 22 L. J. Ch. 305). That was a case of heriots and reliefs, and the Court allowed a demurrer to the bill. But even there the demurrer was allowed without costs, and with liberty to amend the bill.

[STUART, V.C.—I think, Mr. Fry, you have now stated enough to shew that your clients have a prima facie case; and it is for Mr. Morgan to make out that of the defendants.]

Mr. O. Morgan.—We say then, first, the plaintiffs' evidence which has been referred to is, for the reasons given, inadmissible. It really amounts to no more than an affirmation of some one, produced by the plaintiffs themselves, that the estate which the defendants claim belongs to the plaintiffs, but it is no proof that the property does belong to them—1 Starkie on Evidence, edit. 1842, p. 32. Secondly, we further say that this Court has no jurisdiction to entertain this suit. The Bill is one for a partition simpliciter, but under the cloak and colour of which the plaintiffs seek the decision of this Court upon their title. That title is a purely legal one, and is absolutely and in toto denied by the defendants. Slade v. Barlow (38 L. J. Ch. 369; L. R. 7 Eq. 296) shews that a suit of this nature will not be allowed. Sir John Rolt's Act, the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 42. s. 4, expressly exempts this class of cases, viz., ejectment bills. The proper course for the Court to adopt in this case is to follow Bolton v. Bolton (L. R. 7 Eq. 298), cited in Slade v. Barlow (ubi supra), and the practice laid down in Potter v. Waller (2 De Gex & Sm. 418), and not to order the bill to be taken off the file, but to retain it for a year, with liberty to the plaintiffs to bring such action at law as they may be advised; all the authorities, from those of The Bishop of Ely v. Kenrick (Bunb. 322) and Baring v. Nash (1 Ves. & B. 551) to the present day, shew that a partition suit in this Court cannot be made the vehicle of trying a disputed legal title. Thirdly, as to the merits of the case: they strengthen the objections to it, founded on the want of jurisdiction in the Court. The plaintiffs are in possession of the rent of this field and the defendants of the land. The bill does not ask that the rent may be raised. If it had done so we should have paid the money into Court. But we say there is on the merits a substantial legal question to be tried, and one which ought only to be settled by a jury in a Court of law.

[STUART, V.C.—If the partition sought by the plaintiffs in this suit were a mere pretext, your view might perhaps be correct; but the discovery of the minerals under this field increases the value of the property and makes the partition of it a matter of extreme importance to those interested in it.]

Mr. O. Morgan.—We say that the partition which the plaintiffs seek is a mere sham. Of what value is the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs? It consists of the following particulars: A. Their title-deeds. B. The rent-rolls and entries in the plaintiffs' own books. C. The tithe commutation maps. D. A statement that half the field is tithe free. E. Some alleged repairs of the fences of the field by the plaintiffs, or their predecessors in title.—A. First, as to their title-deeds. In a very early one, dated so long ago as 1730, the field in question is described as "a messuage or tenement," which is clearly insufficient; and there is in fact no proof of a house having ever been situated on the field. Then between 1730 and 1843 there is no description of the field at all, and the subsequent descriptions are irreconcilable with each other and the original ones. B. Even if the rent-rolls and entries are admissible, they are inconsistent with the recitals and descriptions of the field in the plaintiffs' title-deeds, and there is no attempt made to reconcile those discrepancies. Moreover, there is nothing in any of the plaintiffs' evidence to shew the correct acreage or the tithings of the field. The plaintiffs have not proved, and cannot prove, by whom this rentcharge (for such it is) is payable; and it is for them to shew who is their own tenant. The result of the ejectment of 1832, and the abandonment of the other action in 1863, are facts which make strongly in the defendants' favour. C. The tithe commutation maps are not admissible as evidence unless the requirements of the Tithe Commutation Acts have been strictly observed—6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 71. ss. 60, 61, 63, and 64; 7 Will. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 69. s. 2. Here those requirements are not shewn to have been followed out. Moreover, it is sworn in the answer of the defendants that their predecessor in title lived at a distance from the field, and knew nothing of the commutation or the apportionment. She was not privy to or bound by it; neither, therefore, are the defendants, who also now live twenty miles from the field. D. Then it is said that half the field is tithe free. But if the documents last mentioned are inadmissible, there is nothing but reputation in support of that assertion, and reputation is not sufficient to establish a private matter such as this or a form modus. Even if it did tend to support it, there is enough in the defendants' case to rebut such proofs. E. The plaintiffs claim to have repaired the fences of this field, but the title-deeds of the defendants shew that they have always dealt with, and sometimes conveyed the entirety of it; and as, in 1848, they cut down some timber on this field, so at other times they have uninterruptedly exercised various acts of ownership over the whole of it.

Mr. Williams (of the common law bar) with Mr. Morgan.—A partition suit must be based on the assumption that no litigation affects the property sought to be divided, and that the title of the plaintiffs is undisputed. We now deny their title; and it is in evidence that there was an action of ejectment brought in 1832, by the tenant for life of the Tyntwyll estate, in which he recovered the whole of the field now in question. The plaintiffs' evidence is more consistent with a title to a divided than to an undivided moiety of his field. As to the entries, to be admissible as evidence they must be shewn to have been made contemporaneously with the events of which they speak and by a person whose duty it is to make them. That is not shewn in this case—Price v. Torrington (ubi supra); Poole v. Dicas (1 Bing. N.C. 649; 1 Sc. 600; 4 L. J. STUART, V.C.—I will not trouble you, Mr. Fry, to reply.

The principal question in this case is that of jurisdiction. It was said that the Court ought not to entertain this suit because there is a dispute as to the title; and two recent decisions have been referred to which are, no doubt, cases of importance. They are authorities, however, which it is plain from the arguments in the present case may be very easily misunderstood.

In the case of Bolton v. Bolton the main purpose of the suit was, not a partition, but the establishment of the plaintiffs' title upon the construction of a will. It was the case of a bill filed by a person out of the possession of the property, and the object of the suit was to recover the possession. That being so, it appears that a bill in equity for a partition ought not to be made a means of trying a title, which should properly be tried at law.

In the same way, in the case of Slade v. Barlow, which came before James, V.C., he took exactly that view. He treated that case as I did that of Bolton v. Bolton, and as the Lords Justices treated it, as a case in which, under colour of a bill for a partition, what was sought was to establish a title to the property, of which the plaintiff was out of the possession.

In the present case the circumstances of the property are peculiar. In this, as in all other cases, the plaintiffs on a bill for a partition must prove their title to the undivided part of that property which they seek to have divided. There is no such rule, so far as I am aware, as that a bill for a partition cannot be maintained if a defendant denies the plaintiff's title and the title is purely a legal one. I never heard such a rule laid down anywhere. No doubt the title must be proved, but even where a plaintiff has come for a partition, and has not at once succeeded in proving his title, this Court has given him an opportunity of producing further evidence of it without sending him to a Court of law. In the case of Baring v. Nash, Sir Thomas Plumer, at the end of a judgment of great research, and with which he took extreme pains, says, "Where the legal title is under suspicious circumstances a Court of equity may well pause in directing partition; but if the title is clear a partition is a matter of right; and it is expressly stated in Parker v. Gerard (1 Amb. 236) that there is no instance of not succeeding in such a bill, but where there is not proof of title in the plaintiff; and in the case of Cartwright v. Pultney (2 Atkyns, 380) the Court gave leave and time for the plaintiff to make out his title." Of course if a title cannot be made out the right to the partition must fail entirely.

The question, therefore, in the present case is this: the bill in the suit is one, primarily, for a partition. The great object of the suit is the partition, and the reason for wishing to effect that object is the increased value of the property in consequence of the discovery of some minerals below the land. That being so, the prime object of the suit being the partition of the property, and the establishment of the title to it being only incidental to the partition, the question which the Court has to consider is, whether these plaintiffs have established their title to an undivided moiety of this small close of land?

The circumstances of the case are, as I have said, extremely peculiar. The plaintiffs have gone very far back in proving their title. Upon a review of the whole of their evidence as contrasted with that of the defendants, who deny the title of the plaintiffs, it seems to me, certainly, that the plaintiffs have proved their title very clearly indeed.

To begin with their deeds. The first is a deed dated so long ago as 1672. The close of land in question is, by its proper name, included in the conveyance; and was conveyed to that family through whom the plaintiffs derive their title. The next deed is a deed of 1730. In that deed the close of land is again very clearly mentioned. But it is mentioned with this peculiarity: being mere land, it is, nevertheless, spoken of as "All that other messuage or tenement commonly called or known by the name of Gwergloed Vadock, now or late in the tenure, possession or occupation of Robert Williams, at or under the yearly rent of 1*l.* 10*s.*" It has been fairly enough argued that there is no messuage upon this close of land; and that the words "messuage or tenement" are not a proper description of a close of land containing four acres. But, looking at all the other circumstances of the case, I have not the slightest doubt that the parcel there described is the identical close of land now in question. It is to be observed that, although the description contains the word "messuage" there is also the word "tenement." That word clearly is, I think, enough to signify the land, without any messuage at all upon it. Moreover, this estate passed in the beginning of the eighteenth century, about 130 years ago, by marriage to the family of the Giffards. A member of that family, Peter Giffard, through whom the plaintiffs claim, married an heiress of the name of Roberts, who was entitled to this land. The title is, therefore, traced down. The property remained in the family; and they not being obliged to mortgage the land, no other title-deed occurs until a comparatively recent period. But the clear and important evidence in this case in favour of the plaintiffs is, the proof of the payment of rent for this land to the family of the Giffards; and the fact that those claiming under them, as to one undivided moiety of this close of land, held it as tenants in common with the owner of the neighbouring estate.

As to the whole of that evidence, however, the plaintiffs' case is met by a denial on the part of the defendants, that the rent-rolls or rentals are evidence at all. Some cases were then cited which really have nothing to do with the question, beyond this, that in Outram v. Morewood (ubi supra), a case before the Court of Queen's Bench, in which entries by a third party—entries made, not in the discharge of any duty, but simply by a third party—were not admitted to the legititmate evidence. In that case a distinction was taken between entries by a third person deceased and entries by a steward. In Starkie on Evidence (ubi supra), which is, perhaps, the best text-book on the subject of "the law of evidence," I find, on looking at his statement and summary of the case of Outram v. Morewood, that he says this: "In Outram v. Morewood, Lord Kenyon said that, although a general right might be proved by traditionary evidence, a particular fact could not. There the question was, whether Cow Close had been part of the estate of Sir J. Zouch, out of which certain rents and coals had been reserved; and the Court held that the fact could not be proved by entries made by a third person, deceased, in his books of receipts of rents from his tenant; such entries being considered as no more than a declaration of the fact by such third person, which was different from entries by a steward, who thereby charged himself with the receipt of money."

It has been said, although, I think, with no very great force, that such entries, not being against the interest of the person making them, are inadmissible. The fact of the entries being against the interest of the person who makes them is said to be the circumstance that gives them credibility and establishes them as evidence. But I think that is not entirely an accurate view of the matter. I quite assent, however, as other Judges have assented, to the statement of Mr. Starkie, at p. 347 of the same volume. He there says this: "It may, however, be observed that the consideration that the entry was made in the course of discharging a professional or official duty, or even in the ordinary course of business in which the party was engaged, seems both in reason and upon the authorities, to afford a much safer warrant for giving credit to such evidence than is supplied by the consideration that the entry or declaration might, possibly, have been used to the prejudice of the party," &c. Lord Hardwick, in Manning v. Lechmere (1 Atkyns, 453), speaking of what is evidence, says, "Where there are old rentals, and bailiffs have admitted money received by them, those rentals are evidence of the payment, because no other can be had."

Therefore, in my opinion, all the objections to the reception of these rentals as evidence in this case are entirely unfounded.

I should not have noticed the authorities upon that part of this case if it had not been that so much stress was laid and the case so strongly pressed upon them by Mr. Morgan. I think, however, that he has, to say the least, been obliged, for the purpose of his argument, to employ them in a way in which they cannot legitimately be used.

Then, looking at these rentals themselves, they extend over the greater part of a century and a half, and leave to my mind not the slightest doubt that the rent—the payment of which they purport to shew—was paid to the owners of the Plas Ucha estate in respect of this particular close of land. That alone would be enough to establish clearly, to my satisfaction, the claim of the plaintiffs. But when I look at the case set up by the defendants, that of the plaintiffs is, I think, greatly strengthened. The defendants cannot deny that rent has been paid, and they cannot deny that rent has been paid by tenants. In their answer (ubi supra), they affect to say that the rent—which, according to the entries, has been paid for more than a century and a half, and was probably paid before that—was paid in respect of rent due for equality upon the occasion of certain exchanges. That is deliberately and distinctly stated in their answer. They there say—[His Honour then read paragraph 9. of the answer (ut supra) down to the words "certain exchanges of land effected many years ago between our predecessors in title and the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs," and continued]—Now, the defendants' case upon that completely broke down; indeed, I think that statement was not even mentioned by Mr. Morgan in his argument. But it is impossible to get over it, and it is equally impossible to get over the further statement in the same paragraph of the answer. That statement is to this effect—[His Honour read the remainder of the paragraph (ut supra), and continued]—That is—"expressed to be made as a quit rent, or in respect of equality upon the occasion of exchanges." Three receipts were produced—from the custody of the defendants—but they totally contradict their case. Those receipts are ordinary receipts for rent, such as are given to a tenant upon a proper payment, by the proper hand to receive the rent. It seems to me unnecessary to go minutely through the other parts of the case, but they also strengthen that of the plaintiffs. It must be observed, however, that in the year 1838, which is now thirty-one years ago, and more than thirty years before the bill in this suit was filed, the Tithe Commissioners, in discharge of their duties, apportioned the tithe-rentcharge on this estate. The statute makes the entries by the Commissioners in their proceedings, when properly verified, evidence of the matters therein stated. In the document produced, and authenticated by the Tithe Commissioners, one undivided moiety of this very close of land is stated as part of the property in respect of which they discharged their duty. That was, however, attempted to be got rid of in this way: it was said, in effect, that the predecessor of the defendants, the persons who oppose the title of the plaintiffs, lived a great way from the property in question; that the defendants themselves now live twenty miles from it, and that they or their predecessor did not hear of the commutation, and probably had no notice of it. But the act of parliament requires these things to be done, not in a corner, but upon notice in all the most public places; so that it is impossible to treat this document otherwise than as a public one, and as public evidence that at that time the owner of the undivided moiety of this field was aware of the facts. That being so, it appears to me that the plaintiffs have established their title; and that, they having established a title against a case, which though deliberately set up by the defendants' answer, has failed, this case does not come within the ordinary rule as to the costs of a partition suit. Mr. Fry, do you ask for costs?

Mr. Fry.—Yes, I do.

STUART, V.C.—Well the case is one in which the title of the plaintiffs has been disputed upon grounds which, in my opinion, have entirely failed. I think therefore that the plaintiffs must have the declaration which they pray by their bill, viz., that they are entitled to an undivided moiety of the field called Wereglodd Fudog; and there must be a decree that a partition shall be made of the field, with costs.

Husband and Wife—Agreement to Live Apart; for the Execution of a Separation Deed; and for securing an Annuity to the Wife—Specific Performance—Decree.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—On the 5th of July, 1865, a husband and his father-in-law, on behalf of his daughter, the wife, entered into a contract, by which it was agreed that the husband and wife should live apart, and that the husband should, when required, execute a deed of separation with all usual and proper clauses, and should secure a sum of 40l. a year to the wife for her maintenance and that of their child. The wife was not named a party to, but she signed, the contract. The husband and wife separated. The wife was for some time afterwards maintained by her father, and he supported her child. The husband paid the annuity regularly till October, 1867. The father-in-law, in pursuance of the contract, prepared a separation deed, by which the annuity was to be secured by a charge on some landed property of the husband, and he was to covenant for the payment of the annuity for a term of ninety-nine years, if his wife should so long live. The proposed deed, however, contained no covenant by the father-in-law to indemnify the husband against his wife's debts. The husband refused to execute the deed. The father-in-law and the wife then instituted a suit for the specific performance of the agreement of the 5th of July, 1865:—Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to have a proper separation deed executed by the husband; that he was bound to secure the annuity, though not by a charge on his landed property; and that he must pay the costs of the suit.

The plaintiffs in this suit were Mr. Joseph Gibbs and Alice Harding, his daughter, the wife of the defendant Mr. Thomas Archer Harding, by her father as next friend. The defendants were Mr. Harding and Victoria Maria, his infant daughter.

The bill in the suit stated that on the 1st of March, 1857, Mr. Harding married Alice Gibbs. No settlement was executed on the marriage. There were issue of the marriage four children, three of whom died prior to 1865, and the fourth, Victoria Maria Harding, was now residing with Mr. Gibbs. Differences arose between Mr. and Mrs. Harding, in consequence of which it was agreed between them and Mr. Gibbs that Mr. and Mrs. Harding should thenceforth live separate and apart. The following agreement was accordingly entered into between the plaintiff Joseph Gibbs and the defendant Thomas Archer Harding, and signed by them and Mrs. Harding: "Memorandum of agreement, made this 5th day of July, 1865, between Thomas Archer Harding, of the one part, and Joseph Gibbs, of the other part. Whereas, differences having arisen between the said Thomas Archer Harding and Alice his wife, the daughter of the said Joseph Gibbs, it hath been agreed between the said Thomas Archer Harding and the said Joseph Gibbs, on behalf of his said daughter, that the said Thomas Archer Harding and his said wife should live apart, and the said Thomas Archer Harding doth hereby agree with the said Joseph Gibbs, when thereunto required, to execute and sign a deed of separation, to be prepared by Messrs. Bradford & Foote, to contain all usual and proper clauses, and also to secure the sum of 40*l.* a year, to commence from this date, and to be paid by equal quarterly payments by the said Thomas Archer Harding, for the maintenance of his wife and child; but if the said wife should now be in the family-way and have another child within eight months from this time, then the sum of 40*l.* shall be increased to 50*l.*, to be paid in like manner as the 40*l.*

provided for so long as such child shall live, and the cost of the deed of separation and of this agreement shall be paid in equal portions by the parties hereto.

(Signed) "Thomas Archer Harding.
"Joseph Gibbs.
"Alice Harding."

Mrs. Harding was not in the family-way at the date of the agreement, and had no child born since the date thereof.

The bill then stated that ever since the date of the agreement, and on the faith and in pursuance of it, Mrs. Harding had lived separate and apart from her husband, and had forborne from suing him for, or otherwise endeavouring to obtain or claiming from him any restitution of conjugal rights, or return to cohabitation, or alimony or maintenance for herself or her child (save that the said annuity of 40*l.* had been claimed, but the last two quarters thereof had not been paid pursuant to the agreement), and she had in all respects performed the agreement. She lived with and was maintained by her father from the date of the agreement to the 12th of October, 1865, when she went into a situation as a domestic servant, where she had ever since continued, and was now maintaining herself by her labour. The infant defendant, her daughter, had from the date of the agreement to the present time lived with the plaintiff Mr. Gibbs, and been chiefly maintained by him. He had, with the aid of what Mr. Harding had paid on account of the annuity, maintained Mrs. Harding during the aforesaid period of three months, and the infant defendant during the aforesaid period of between two and three years, in reliance on the agreement and on the annuity; and he had, in reliance on the agreement, forborne from suing Mr. Harding for the cost of such maintenance (which had exceeded the annuity) or for any part thereof; and he had, on the faith and in pursuance of the agreement, paid one moiety of the costs of it. He had also caused to be prepared, by Messrs. Bradford & Foote, the engrossment of a deed of separation pursuant to the contract, and paid one moiety of the cost thereof; and he, as well as Mrs. Harding, had in all respects performed and caused to be performed the agreement on his part. The bill further stated that Mr. Harding had paid the annuity to Mr. Gibbs as trustee, and upon the trusts aforesaid, in pursuance and part performance of the agreement, save the last two quarterly payments thereof; but he had refused to make those payments, or to pay the annuity for the future, or to execute any separation deed whatever pursuant to the agreement, or in any way to secure the annuity of 40*l.*, or perform the agreement for the future. Mr. Gibbs caused to be prepared, pursuant to the agreement, and submitted to Mr. Harding for his execution, a deed of separation, charging the annuity on certain real estates of Mr. Harding, at Wansborough, to which he was entitled in fee simple, subject to certain charges thereon; and the plaintiffs were ready and willing and thereby offered to execute that or any other proper separation deed pursuant to the agreement; but Mr. Harding wholly refused to execute any separation deed whatever.

Mrs. Harding was of the age of twenty-six years or thereabouts, and the value of the annuity for her life exceeded 500*l.*

Mr. Gibbs had expended on the maintenance of Mrs. Harding and of her daughter since the date of the agreement a sum considerably exceeding the annuity of 40*l.* from that date. Mr. Harding had not contributed to such maintenance beyond the payment of the annuity, so far as he had paid the same as aforesaid.

Neither Mrs. Harding nor her daughter had any property or means of subsistence save the annuity of 40*l.* The bill charged that the rents and profits of Mr. Harding's real estate at Wansborough were sufficient to meet the annuity, and that he ought thereby or otherwise duly to secure the same, and that the infant defendant in respect of the annuity was a proper party to the suit. The bill then prayed that Mr. Harding might be decreed specifically to perform the agreement of the 5th of July, 1865, and to execute the said separation deed so prepared as aforesaid, or some proper separation deed to be approved by this Court according to the agreement, and to pay the annuity and do all other acts pursuant to the agreement, the plaintiffs thereby offering specifically to perform the agreement on their part; that if necessary an account might be taken of the annuity, and the defendant Mr. Harding decreed to pay the same; that he might pay the costs of the suit; and that for the purposes aforesaid all proper inquiries might be made and directions given.

Mr. Harding, by his answer, raised several matters of defence to the bill, of which the Court expressed its disapprobation, but to which it is not necessary more particularly to refer. He also denied several of the plaintiffs' allegations. He stated with respect to the non-payment of the two quarters of the annuity that, in the month of January, 1868, he tendered the sum of 10*l.* as a quarterly payment of the annual sum of 40*l.*, to Mr. Foote, the plaintiffs' solicitor; that Mr. Foote refused to accept it, alleging that the plaintiffs would prefer to have a gross sum (mentioning the sum of 500*l.*) paid in full discharge of the annuity, or to have it secured by a charge on land belonging to Mr. Harding. He refused to entertain either proposal; but (as he subsequently deposed) he, rather than incur litigation in the matter, consented to pay 350*l.* in satisfaction of all claims against him. That proposal was however declined. He further stated by his answer that, in May, 1868, he went to the office of Mr. Foote, and offered him, on behalf of Mrs. Harding, the sum of 20*l.* for two quarters of the annuity; that Mr. Foote refused to accept it, and said that as the matter had gone so far it must proceed, as there would be expenses to pay; that he again tendered the 20*l.*, saying, "Here is the money," but that Mr. Foote refused to accept it.

Mr. Foote in his evidence positively denied those allegations of Mr. Harding as to the tender of the 10*l.* and the 20*l.*

Mr. Harding further stated, with respect to his refusal to execute the deed of separation which Mr. Gibbs had caused to be prepared, that some time after the 5th of July, 1865, Mr. Foote called Mr. Harding into his office and asked him to execute a deed of separation between himself and his wife. Mr. Harding had never before seen that deed. He thereupon requested Mr. Foote to read it over to him, which Mr. Foote proceeded to do. But when Mr. Harding found it was intended that by the deed his small landed property at Wansborough should be charged with the payment of the annuity, he refused to execute the deed. Those allegations were also contradicted or qualified by the evidence of the plaintiffs.

It appeared, however, that the draft of the deed had proposed by way of an additional security for the annuity, that Mr. Harding should covenant with Mr. Gibbs to pay it for a term of ninety-nine years if Mrs. Harding should so long live, but the draft contained no covenant by Mr. Gibbs to indemnify Mr. Harding against his wife's debts.

Mr. Greene and Mr. Bagshawe, for the plaintiffs.—The simple question in this case is whether the plaintiffs are not entitled to the execution by Mr. Harding of some separation deed, which shall contain all the covenants usual and proper in such cases, and which shall also provide the best security he can give for the payment of the annuity. It is too late now to say that agreements of this nature cannot be enforced—Wilson v. Wilson (14 Sim. 405; 14 L. J. Ch. 204: on appeal 1 H.L. C. 538; 5 H.L. C. 40); Walrond v. Walrond (Johns. 18; 28 L. J. Ch. 97). It is true that Mrs. Harding is not named a party to the contract, but her father is, on her behalf, as trustee for her. In that way she can make a valid contract with her husband—Williams v. Bailey (L. R. 2 Eq. 731). There is no want of mutuality in the agreement; there is a good consideration for it; it has been acted on by the parties to it; and the Court will, therefore, give the plaintiffs the relief they pray by their bill.

Mr. Dickinson and Mr. W. W. Karslake, for the defendant Mr. Harding.—This case is one that ought never to have been brought into Court. 1. The agreement is vague and uncertain in its terms. It does indeed say that the proposed deed of separation is to contain "all usual and proper clauses"; but it does not specify them, neither does it make any provision for indemnifying the defendant against his wife's debts, nor point out who are to enter into the requisite covenants. The plaintiffs cannot therefore call upon the defendant to execute any deed "in accordance with the agreement." But that agreement is their only pretence to an equity. 2. The agreement is entirely voluntary. The fact of Mr. Gibbs having for a time maintained Mrs. Harding and her child forms no consideration for it. Mr. Harding is still liable to keep them, and would be even if he were to execute the deed. Further, Mr. Harding paid the annuity regularly till October, 1867. It was refused (as we contend) by the solicitor of the plaintiffs early in 1868. The bill in this suit was filed in June, 1868, after Mr. Harding had so far fulfilled his part of the contract. But those payments which Mr. Harding made cannot in any way operate as an acknowledgment by him that he is otherwise bound by the agreement to execute the proposed deed. 3. There is no mutuality in the agreement. It is in terms binding only on Mr. Harding. Even if Mr. Gibbs can sue him upon it (which however we deny) it is perfectly plain that he cannot compel Mr. Gibbs to perform it. Furthermore, Mr. Gibbs is not bound by it to enter into any covenants with Mr. Harding. But he is entitled (if he executes a separation deed) to a covenant from Mr. Gibbs to indemnify him against his wife's debts—Walrond v. Walrond (ubi supra). 4. The agreement is an illegal one. Mrs. Harding is not a party to it; and even if she were so, as there is no consideration for it, that would not avail. Whatever may be the state of the law now as to contracts between a husband and his wife for a separation between them, this is a contract (if a contract at all) between a husband and his father-in-law that the husband will live apart from his wife. That is a contract by which it is evident one man cannot bind another, even if it be not (as in fact it is) contrary to public policy, and void on that account. 5. The original agreement in this case was intended for the benefit of both Mrs. Harding and her child; but the deed contains no provision for the maintenance of the infant defendant. The proposed covenant that Mr. Harding shall pay the 40*l*. a year "for ninety-nine years if his wife shall so long live," will, if he executes it and dies to-morrow, leave his property charged with the annuity, which is not what he intended; and, moreover, if his widow were then to die the child would not be benefited by that arrangement. But in strict law, this Court cannot enforce any agreement for the maintenance of the child. Then, again, this agreement is silent as to any landed property of Mr. Harding. It is neither a charge on his land nor a covenant to create one, nor to do any act that shall at a future day create a charge on his real estate. This Court will not therefore make a decree for that purpose—The Countess of Mornington v. Keane (2 De Gex & Sm. 292; 27 L. J. Ch. 791); Wilson v. Wilson (ubi supra) was a very different case from this. There the consideration for the deed was a valuable one. Among the covenants inserted in the deed by the Master was one to indemnify the husband against the wife's debts. The husband, however, contended that he was entitled to a covenant to indemnify him against all the debts which he owed when he entered into the articles, in pursuance of which the separation deed was to be executed. But that was a mistake. Moreover, in that case, the abandonment of some proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts formed part of the consideration. Walrond v. Walrond (ubi supra) was much more like this case. Upon the whole the bill ought to be dismissed, and with costs.

Mr. A. Langley, for the infant defendant.

STUART, V.C.—The agreement in this case is one for the separation of the husband and the wife; and the parties to the agreement are the father of the wife, on her behalf, and the husband. The agreement is signed by the parties to it, and also by the wife.

No doubt the wife is a married woman; but as such she is, in my opinion, as much bound by the agreement as any married woman can be.

It was argued that there is no sufficient consideration for the agreement. As to that, the agreement is, in terms, to the effect that the husband and wife shall live apart. The agreement, so expressed, is made and entered into between the father of the wife, on her behalf, and the husband; and it stipulates that the husband will, when thereunto required, execute and sign a deed of separation, to be prepared by Messrs. Bradford & Foote, to contain all usual and proper clauses; and also to secure the sum of 40*l.* a year, to commence from the date of the agreement, and to be paid quarterly by the husband for the maintenance of his wife and child. The annuity of 40*l.* was to be increased to 50*l.* a year in case there was another child born within eight months afterwards, and for so long as that other child should live.

The agreement has been acted on by the father of the wife, who is now maintaining the only child of his daughter, and by the husband, the defendant Mr. Harding. But where the facts of a case shew that something has been done by the parties to a contract, in pursuance of it, and on the faith of its being fully completed, this Court will, if the agreement be one that is not in other respects illegal or improper, enforce the specific performance of it.

It appears from the evidence in this case that the father of the wife has caused a deed to be prepared pursuant, as he states, to the agreement. The deed is a short one. The husband having agreed to "secure" the 40*l.* annuity, the deed proposes to carry out that part of the contract by charging the annuity on certain lands at Wansborough, to which the husband is entitled in fee simple. In my opinion, however, there is not in the original agreement sufficient to justify the plaintiff Mr. Joseph Gibbs in calling upon Mr. Harding to secure the annuity by a charge on his landed property.

It also appears that Mr. Harding was advised not to execute the deed as prepared, and he has not done so. No doubt, it might have been advantageous for the parties if he had done so; and, if he is well advised, he may even now execute it. He is bound to see that a proper and sufficient security is given for the annuity. I am not disposed to make a decree in the exact terms of the prayer of the bill. But if Mr. Harding will not execute the proposed deed, I must direct a reference to chambers with respect to the execution of one in pursuance of the agreement; such deed to contain the clauses usual and proper in separation deeds, and to effectually secure the payment of the annuity according to the contract.

Having regard to the position and conduct of the parties to this suit, I cannot but feel the greatest possible reluctance to make any decree in it. Still, upon the whole case, I am bound to make one, and it must be a decree for the specific performance of this agreement of the 5th of July, 1865, accompanied with the reference to chambers (if necessary) for the purposes I have stated. I think also that Mr. Harding must pay the costs of the suit.

articles of association contained a provision for consolidating the 20*l. shares into shares of larger amount. Upon the faith of the prospectus and memorandum of association G. applied for twenty-five shares in the company. Subsequently to his application, in pursuance of the provision in that behalf, all the shares of the company, before any of them had been issued, were converted from* 20*l. shares to* 40*l. shares. Twenty* 40*l. shares were allotted to G. He was not aware of the alteration in the amount of the shares till some time afterwards, and never acquiesced in the alteration. On a summons by the official liquidator of the company for G. to shew cause why he should not be settled upon the list of contributories*:—Held, that G. was a contributory to the company in respect of twenty shares of 20*l. each.*

Upon G.'s counsel admitting that he was prima facie a shareholder in the company,—Held, that he had a right to begin on a summons in the form above mentioned.

This was a summons, taken out by the official liquidator of the above-named company, for Mr. Gustard to shew cause why he should not be settled on the list of contributories in respect of twenty shares of 40*l.* each.

Mr. Kay, for the official liquidator, in support of the summons, claimed the right to begin.

Mr. Amphlett, for Mr. Gustard, said that by the summons he was called upon to shew cause, and was therefore entitled to begin. In reply to the Vice Chancellor, he said he admitted that Mr. Gustard was prima facie the holder of the shares, his name being on the register in respect of them. Thereupon the Vice Chancellor said that Mr. Amphlett had the right to begin and shew cause.

The above-named company was registered on the 20th of January, 1864, with a memorandum and articles of association. The memorandum of association contained the following statement: "The nominal capital of the company is 1,400,000*l.*, subject to be increased or modified. First issue 700,000*l.*, in 35,000 shares of 20*l.* each, the remaining 700,000*l.* to be raised hereafter in shares, bonds or obligations as the board of directors may from time to time deem advisable." The articles of association also contained the following clauses: "The nominal capital of the company shall consist of 1,400,000*l.* sterling, to be paid at the time and in manner hereafter provided. The first issue thereof, consisting of 700,000*l.*, in 35,000 shares of 20*l.* each. The The remaining 700,000*l.* to be raised hereafter in shares, bonds or obligations as the board of directors may from time to time deem advisable. But the board may from time to time, by a resolution passed by a majority consisting of not less than two-thirds of the whole number of directors, consolidate the shares into shares of a larger nominal value, so that the shares when consolidated shall together be equivalent in nominal value to the nominal value of the original shares before consolidation."

About the beginning of the year 1864, a prospectus was issued marked "Private and confidential," which stated that the first issue of capital would be 700,000*l.*, in 35,000 shares of 20*l.* each.

On the 24th of January, 1864, Gustard, at the instance of K. A. Holden, the principal promoter and contractor for the works of the company, applied for twenty-five shares in the company (without specifying the value of such shares in his application).

On the 24th of March, 1864, before any shares in the company had been issued in pursuance of the provisions contained in the articles of association, a special resolution was passed by a majority of two-thirds of the whole number of directors, increasing the nominal value of the shares in the company from 20*l.* to 40*l.* each. Printed copies of this resolution were annexed, in the form of a memorandum, to certain copies of the memorandum and articles of association, but it was not registered by the registrar of joint-stock companies.

On the 22nd of April, 1864, twenty shares of 40*l.* each were allotted to Gustard in pursuance of his said application. The letter of allotment did not mention the value of the shares, and made no reference to the alteration in their value. Gustard duly paid the allotment-money upon these twenty shares, but he now stated that he made his application upon the faith of the statements contained in the prospectus and memorandum and articles of association, that the shares were of the amount of 20*l.* each, and that he accepted the twenty shares in ignorance of the alteration of the value of the shares, and supposed he had taken 20*l.* shares.

In April, 1865, an agreement was entered into between Holden and the company, by which it was provided that Holden should transfer to the company 1,250 specified shares, among which were mentioned the twenty allotted to Gustard, in exchange for debentures to the amount of 7,500*l.* Accordingly, with a view to the performance by Holden of this agreement, Gustard, on the 16th of May, 1865, executed a deed of transfer of his twenty shares to Holden. This deed of transfer was duly left with the company to be registered, but was never registered by them, and Gustard's name remained on the books of the company as the holder of the twenty shares. After this transaction, in May and August, 1865, and in January and June, 1866, there were four calls made upon Gustard in respect of the same shares. But the only statement or notice on call-papers as to the value of the shares was in the form of the receipt on the fly-leaf to be filled in by the company's bankers on the calls being paid. Gustard never paid anything in respect of these calls, and he now stated positively in his affidavit that he had never heard of the resolution to increase the value of the shares till May, 1866, a year after the date of his transfer to Holden, by which he had supposed he had been relieved of all liability in respect of the shares allotted to him.

Mr. Amphlett and Mr. Locock Webb, for Mr. Gustard.—The resolution passed to alter the value of the shares was ultra vires, and therefore nugatory and invalid. The company were bound by their prospectus and memorandum of association to make the first issue one of 20*l.* shares. The provisions of the Company's Act, 1862, which authorized a company "to consolidate and divide its capital into shares of larger amount than its existing shares" (Stat. 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89. ss. 12, 25, 28), obviously could not apply to a case like the present, where at the time of the consolidation there had been no shares in existence. The provision in the articles of association also had reference to shares which had been issued and gave the board power to deal only with existing shares. They could not be empowered to alter the memorandum of association, which distinctly stated that the first issue was to be of 20*l.* shares—In re the Financial Corporation (36 L. J. Ch. 695; L. R. 2 Ch. 714). But this case was stronger than that in Gustard's favour, for he never became a shareholder at all. He applied for twenty-five 20*l.* shares, and they gave him no such thing, but twenty 40*l.* shares instead. Then with regard to the questions of laches and acquiescence. Gustard had no notice or knowledge of the alteration till May, 1866, and the company since then by their conduct and apparent acquiescence in the agreement with Holden, to which they themselves in a manner were parties, had deceived Gustard into a state of acquiescence.

Mr. Kay and Mr. Bardswell, for the official liquidator.—If Gustard at the time knew the allotment to him was of 40*l.* shares, then the allotment was good.

[JAMES, V.C.—He has sworn positively he did not know it, and you have not cross-examined him.]

He now comes too late, and has lost any ground for relief he might have had earlier—In re the New Zealand Banking Corporation; Sewell's case (L. R. 3 Ch. 131).

JAMES, V.C. (without calling for a reply) said: I am of opinion that this gentleman is entitled to relief to the extent of half his liability; that is, he is only liable to be dealt with as if he were a shareholder of twenty shares of 20*l.* each.

The memorandum of association is registered at the office of the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, and is a document which every applicant for shares is supposed to read. He makes his application with reference to that; he is bound by it, and therefore is entitled to have the benefit of it. He is told there the first issue of shares is a certain number of shares of 20*l.* each. There was, it is true, in the private breast of the company (if I may use such a phrase as applied to a company) a resolution or an intention to raise the shares from 20*l.* to 40*l.* Mr. Gustard, who has not been cross-examined, swears positively he never heard of that resolution at all. Then, taking the memorandum of association alone, which is the only thing I can look at, he applies for twenty-five shares, and receives an answer back from the company, not referring to any resolution or intimation of any change, but saying, "in answer to your application for twenty-five shares, we have allotted you twenty." Now, I apprehend that that was a complete and binding contract between the company and Mr. Gustard. The company could not have said, "We will not give you anything but 40*l.* shares;" and he would have no right to have shares of more value than he asked for. The very day that the letter of allotment was sent to him it became a binding contract between him and the company, by which he was entitled to have and they were bound to give him twenty shares of 20*l.* each; and that being the contract, he became, in law and equity, a shareholder to the extent of 400*l.* only. But, say the company, we meant to allot you 800*l.* worth of shares, and you are bound by your knowledge of that intention. He says in reply, "I really never knew of this intention till May, 1866." Now, if they meant to give the shareholders notice that the shares were 40*l.* each, I must say I never saw anything more carelessly or more clumsily done in my life. There is nothing in any document to shew that he was paying upon 40*l.* shares, except the thing on the fly-leaf, which, in all probability, Mr. Gustard would never dream of reading, being merely a receipt for the money which he never paid. I therefore give entire credence to Mr. Gustard when he says, "I never looked at it." He never paid any call at all, though he received notice of the calls; therefore, if he never got a receipt for it, he never could have read the receipt. Then it is said, at all events he did know in May, 1866, that these were 40*l.* shares, and was therefore guilty of laches. But you must look at all the circumstances of the case; and at this time there was some sort of bargain by which the company had agreed with Mr. Holden to accept these shares, and under that agreement Mr. Gustard executed a transfer to Holden, who took it to the office of the company; and Mr. Gustard never heard anything more about it. He never thought afterwards he had anything more to do with it. I do not think, under those circumstances, that a transferor who has executed to a transferee a transfer of his shares, such as here, was bound, when he received notice that the shares were 40*l.*, to take steps to get the matter altered. He had a right to assume, as it seems to me, that he had ceased to have anything to do with the company, and that the company were treating Holden as the real owner of the shares. I think there is not sufficient to say that a new contract has been, by conduct of acquiescence, or whatever it may be called, entered into between the company and Mr. Gustard, by which that which was a contract originally for 400*l.* became a contract for 800*l.* Nothing has taken place to make a new contract having that effect, and therefore I am of opinion that the thing stands, as between Mr. Gustard and the company, exactly as it did on the day he received the letter of allotment. I cannot hold that their attempt to make the shares 40*l.*, which attempt he knew nothing of, could bind him; and, on the other hand, I do not think he can say, "Because you attempt to foist upon me other shares and seek to make me a shareholder for 800*l.*, therefore I am not a shareholder for 400*l.*"; nor can he say, "I thought I had done with the shares altogether, and you partly led me to that belief. I sent the shares to the office, and I never heard that the transfer had been refused or declined; and that being so, I had every reason to believe that you had accepted the transfer." Now, I am of opinion that the company are under no obligation to send notice to the transferor of their refusal to accept the transfer. It is for the transferor to see that everything is complete, and there is no duty which the company violated in that respect. The length of time is a matter which cannot affect the company. Their rights remain exactly the same, Mr. Gustard still having whatever rights he may have against Holden, who is, of course, bound to indemnify him; but he is liable to the extent of twenty shares of 20*l.* each, upon which 4*l.* deposit has been paid.

Will—Construction—Charitable Bequest—Uncertainty—Resulting Trust.

CHARITY.—Bequest of legacies to various charitable institutions by name, followed by bequest of residuary personal estate to trustees upon trust "to divide the same to or amongst the different institutions or to any other religious institution or purposes as they, the said trustees, may think proper, which disposition I leave entirely to their discretion":—Held, that "purposes" meant religious purposes, and not purposes generally, and that there was consequently a good charitable bequest.

This was the further consideration of a suit for the administration of the estate of Mary Davison, who, by her will, after having bequeathed legacies to various charitable institutions by name, gave the residue of her personal estate to her executors, T. Fletcher and J. Wilkinson, upon trust "to divide the same to or amongst the different institutions or to any other religious institution or purposes as they the said T. Fletcher and J. Wilkinson may think proper, which disposition I leave entirely to their discretion."

The question was, whether this was good to any extent as a charitable bequest, or raised a resulting trust for the next-of-kin.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. C. Hall, for the surviving trustee, contended that this was either a good charitable bequest or at least gave the trustees a discretion as to whether they would pay the residue to the charities or to the next-of-kin.

Mr. Roxburgh and Mr. Phear, for the next-of-kin, contended that the gift being for general benevolent purposes was void, and that there arose a resulting trust.

On the occasion (June 28) the charities were not represented, and

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS held that the gift of residue failed; and directed an inquiry as to who were the next-of-kin.

On the 13th of July the case was re-argued, the charities named in the will having obtained leave to appear.

Mr. Southgate and Mr. Bunting, for the charities, contended that the adjective "religious" qualified the word "purposes" as well as the word "institution." There was, therefore, a good charitable bequest. They referred to Morice v. the Bishop of Durham (10 Ves. 532); Baker v. Sutton (1 Keen, 224).

Mr. Roxburgh and Mr. Phear, contra.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I think I was wrong the other day. I cannot make the word "religious" apply to "institution" only, and not to "purposes." If this were done it would be an arbitrary construction introduced to create an intestacy. There must be a declaration that there was a good charitable bequest of the residue.

Winding-up — Proof — Creditor realizing Security — Purchase-money remaining unpaid—Rescission of Contract.

COMPANY.—The mortgagees of a company contracted to sell their security after the commencement of the winding-up, but before sending in a claim for the amount of their debt. After sending in their claim they entered into a new contract, whereby the rights and obligations of the original purchaser were transferred to two other persons, the first contract being declared to be cancelled, but the deposit already paid being considered as paid on account of the new contract:—Held, that the mortgagees having converted their security could only prove for the balance of their debt, and that as between them and the company the subsequent transfer or rescission of the contract made no difference.

Whether, if the purchaser had become bankrupt before the purchase was completed, the mortgagee could then have proved against the company for his whole debt, quære.

Adjourned summons.

By deed, dated the 3rd of July, 1867, containing the usual power of sale, the company mortgaged their premises in Oxford Street and Lambeth respectively to the London and County Bank, to secure an advance of 11,000*l.* and interest. The company was wound up on the 23rd of June, 1868. In September of the same year the bank put up the Oxford Street part of the mortgaged premises for sale by auction, but the property was not sold till the following January, when a Mr. Syers contracted to purchase the Music Hall for 8,500*l.*, and also the fixtures, which were subsequently valued at 758*l.* The sum of 1,000*l.* was paid by way of deposit.

On the 24th of March, 1869, a claim was for the first time sent in by the bank for 11,652*l.* 8*s.*, as the amount due for principal and interest at the date of the winding-up order.

Mr. Syers being unable to complete his contract, a new contract was signed on the 29th of June, 1869, whereby it was agreed that the former contract should be considered as cancelled, and that the property therein comprised (including the fixtures) should be purchased by a Mr. Taylor and a son of the former purchaser for 9,025*l.*; the deposit of 1,000*l.* to be considered as paid on account of the new contract, and the balance of the purchase-money, 8,025*l.*, to be paid on the 1st of April, 1870. The new purchasers were also to pay, by four equal instalments, interest at 6*l.* per cent. on the last-mentioned sum as from the time when the former purchase was to have been completed.

Under these circumstances the official liquidator opposed the claim of the bank, on the ground that they had realized their security, and could only be allowed to prove for the balance after deducting the amount of the purchase-money for which the premises were sold to Mr. Syers, and to receive a dividend on the smaller amount.

JAMES, V.C. was of opinion that the case was not governed by Kellock's case. The principle was clear, that the time to ascertain the amount due is the time when the claim is sent in. A mortgagee selling, or contracting to sell, would stand in the same position as if the mortgagor had on that day handed over the property to him on a contract that he should take it in partial satisfaction of the debt. It was no answer to say that the money was not actually received, that being his own choice. As long as the contract was in force he had exercised his power of sale, and could not consider himself a creditor for the whole debt; and as between him and the mortgagor he could not rescind the contract capriciously, and a mere transfer would make no difference; though he was not prepared to say that the absolute loss of the purchase-money by the bankruptcy of the purchaser or otherwise would not alter the case. The proof must stand only for the balance of the debt after deducting the proceeds of sale. Costs of all parties out of the estate.

Debenture—Set-off—Covenant to Indemnify.

COMPANY.—By articles of association a certain sum was to be paid by the directors to C, he indemnifying them against certain costs. Some of these costs being unpaid were proved in the winding-up against the company:—Held, that the assignee of debentures payable to the holder granted to C. in part satisfaction of his claim could not prove on them without deducting from each of them a rateable part of the unpaid costs by way of set-off.

Mr. James, the holder of three debentures, sought to prove on them against the company.

The only question was whether the official liquidator was entitled to a set-off.

Under the articles of association a sum of 1,750*l.* was due to Mr. Carter, he "indemnifying the directors from all costs, damages and expenses" (except as therein mentioned) "down to the allotment of the shares." Mr. Carter accepted in payment of this sum 50*l.* in cash and seventeen debentures of 100*l.* each, payable to the holder. Three of these debentures came into the hands of Mr. James. Of the costs covered by the indemnity sums amounting to 208*l.* 2*s.* remained unpaid, and had been proved against the company in the winding-up. The question was whether this sum could be set off against the proof of the debenture holders.

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Gardiner, for Mr. James, contended that neither at law nor in equity could damages for breach of a covenant to indemnify be set off against a debt, and that the assignee took subject only to the equities attaching to the debentures at the time of the assignment. Mr. Ford North, for the official liquidator, was not called upon.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS said: This is not a question to be determined on mere technicalities, but on the plain common sense of the case. There is a sum of more than 200*l.* which the company has to pay in respect of the expenses covered by the indemnity. The case must be treated as if these sums had been already paid, and as if the debentures were in the hands of Mr. Carter. I am of opinion, therefore, that, upon the principle of the case of In re the Natal Investment Company, decided by Lord Justice Lord Cairns, the company is entitled to set-off against the holders of the debentures these debts which have been proved against it. The seventeen debentures are bound to contribute rateably. The order, therefore will be that Mr. James's proof be allowed, deducting from each of his debentures one-seventeenth of the sum provable against the company under Mr. Carter's guarantee.

Clergy—Right of Vicar to cut Timber—Dilapidations—Injunction.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—Although, as a general rule, a vicar has a right to cut timber for the purposes of applying it specifically to repairs of the vicarage premises, and possibly a right to sell the timber and buy with the proceeds an equivalent amount of timber in a more convenient place for the purpose of using it in such repairs, he has no right to cut timber for the purpose of selling it to raise a fund to repair dilapidations in the vicarage premises arising from his own previous neglect to repair.

This was the hearing, upon motion for a decree, of a suit against the Rev. C. G. Fryer, vicar of Eltham, in Kent, and the other persons interested in the advowson, praying for an account of all timber and other trees and underwood cut down by the vicar, and of the moneys arising from the sale thereof; for an injunction to restrain the defendant C. G. Fryer, from cutting timber, &c., and for damages.

The plaintiff was the equitable owner by purchase at a sale in 1860, under an order of the Court, of the several terms or presentations to the vicarage of Eltham so often as the same should become vacant during the life of Helen Elizabeth Fryer, the wife of the defendant C. G. Fryer, with the appurtenances to the said rights of presentation belonging.

The defendant C. G. Fryer, the vicar of Eltham, was about sixty years of age, his wife, the said Helen Elizabeth Fryer, being about forty-eight years of age. The vicarage comprised (inter alia) a vicarage-house, with offices and outbuildings, garden and pleasure-grounds of little more than half an acre, and adjoining to these a meadow of about four and a half acres. Part of this meadow did not belong to the vicarage in 1860, when the plaintiff purchased his contingent rights of presentation, but was taken in November, 1861, in exchange for an outlying portion of glebe land. The portion of the meadow so acquired in exchange had in it a double row of elm trees, containing about eleven trees in each row, the trees in the one row being lofty and of considerable age, those in the other row being of about thirty years' growth. There were also ten other old trees in other parts of the meadow. The defendant shortly before the filing of the plaintiff's bill had cut down a number of these old trees, as the plaintiff alleged, without obtaining the consent of any other person whose consent to such an act was required by law No portion of the fallen timber had been sold or removed previously to the institution of this suit; but the defendant admitted that (subject to the issue in the suit) he intended to sell a part thereof for the purposes stated in his answer.

The defendant, by his answer, alleged that in consequence of the close vicinity of so many large trees the vicarage-house, which was a low old-fashioned building with a good deal of woodwork about it, had become exceedingly damp and unhealthy, and with the object of procuring timber for necessary and proper repairs of the said house and premises, as well as of remedying this evil, and at the same time improving the growth of the row of younger trees hereinbefore referred to, and the condition of the said meadow, which was rapidly deteriorating, from being so much overshadowed by the said older trees, he had directed twenty of the said old trees to be cut down. He further alleged, that he never had intended to apply the felled timber, or the proceeds thereof, for his own exclusive use and benefit; but he had, and then intended to apply so much of the timber as should be suitable for the purpose, and the proceeds of the sale of the rest, in necessary and proper repairs of the house, buildings and premises; and if any surplus should remain, he had been and was willing to retain and apply the same for future repairs, or otherwise for the permanent benefit and substantial improvement of the vicarage premises; and he asserted that the removal of the trees was a great improvement to the house, making it more airy and habitable.

Mr. Kay and Mr. Osborne Morgan, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Karslake and Mr. J. N. Higgins, for the defendant, the vicar.—The vicar had a right to cut timber on glebe land to be used in repairs, and he was entitled to cut and sell the timber and apply the proceeds in repair of the vicarage premises.

They cited the following cases: Bartlett v. Phillips (1 De Gex & J. 414); Holden v. Weekes (1 Jo. & H. 278; 30 L. J. Ch. 35); Knight v. Moseley (1 Amb. 175); The Duke of Marlborough v. St. John (5 De Gex & Sm. 174; 21 L. J. Mr. Freeling, for the other defendants.

JAMES, V.C. (without calling for a reply).—In this case the plaintiff, in my judgment, is clearly entitled to the relief he asks by the interposition of the Court. The question is simply whether what the defendant is doing is legally justified. If what the defendant has done is not legally justified, the plaintiff, as the immediate owner of the advowson, has a right to interfere on behalf of the advowson. He is the proper person to apply to this Court for an injunction to prevent the mischief which, to a certain extent, he is still in a position to prevent, and which has been done, or is about to be done, by the defendant. The defendant is the vicar. He has been vicar, I am told, for upwards of twenty years. During these twenty years it was his duty to keep the vicarage in repair. It is said he has allowed it to fall into such a state of dilapidation, and especially the woodwork, that it is in a disgraceful state. Then he has cut down a great number of elm trees which formed part of an avenue of trees, in fact, the whole of one row of the avenue. The plaintiff says, You have no right to cut timber as a general rule. That is true. The vicar or rector has no right to cut timber except for a certain limited purpose, which is, that he has a right to cut timber to be applied specifically; that is, to timberwork that is required for the repairs which are about to be done. Or he may perhaps do this,—for some of the cases would seem to justify it;—having the right to cut down timber for that purpose, he may procure an equivalent amount of timber by disposing of the timber on the spot where he actually cuts it, and getting some other timber at a more convenient place. The illustration given by one of the Judges was this: If a man had a right to cut down the timber on outlying places, half a dozen or ten miles off, it would be absurd to make him drag what timber he wanted from that place if he could get timber close by or at another place which was more convenient; that is to say, the amount of timber required for the woodwork is the limit. It really does not signify whether that amount of timber is the absolute amount required or whether it is in substitution of other timber. But it is quite clear from all the cases that a man has no right to cut down timber from the glebe land for the purpose of forming a fund to repair the dilapidations which he ought never to have allowed to have occurred to relieve him from any liability for the amount of those dilapidations when his successor comes in. The case upon the evidence is this: It is not pretended that this amount of timber was ever meant to be applied, or was ever intended to be applied, to the repair of that portion of the building which is said to consist of woodwork. All is left perfectly vague. They say, "A great deal more repairs were required than the value of this timber would amount to "—(that may be true)—" and there is upon this property, especially upon the out-buildings, which are of no value at all, and which I may be obliged to keep up, a good deal of woodwork, for which some of this may be required "—one-third, I think, it was. Of course that would not justify what he did. The plaintiff, finding the defendant cutting down timber in violation of the law, comes here, as he has a right to do, for he is fully justified in saying, I must get an injunction to prevent your doing anything more. It is no answer for a wrongdoer to say, In my own breast I have determined not to cut down a single tree more, therefore you are premature in coming to this Court for an injunction. A man has committed a wrong; there is nothing to shew that he will not commit a further wrong. The plaintiff, therefore, was justified in coming to this Court for the purpose of preventing the defendant committing any further wrong. But, more than that, he was in time to stop the defendant from doing another wrong. He was clearly entitled to prevent the defendant from selling the timber. In those cases of Knight v. Moseley and Holden v. Weeks it was held that the plaintiff could not get an account of the past proceeds of what the defendant had done, cases which, I am bound to say, to my mind, are utterly unintelligible (although of course I am bound by them), because I never could make out why the owner of an advowson could not require the proceeds taken by a wrongdoer to be invested for the benefit of the advowson. In this particular case, the timber which has been cut down has not been converted into money; it was still on the ground when the plaintiff came for his injunction, and the plaintiff is entitled to have that specific timber. I think I can go to that extent without violating the decision, or supposed decision, in Holden v. Weeks or Knight v. Moseley, that the plaintiff was entitled to have the proceeds of the particular timber invested for the benefit of the advowson. I therefore make the injunction perpetual, and order the timber to be sold, the proceeds to be brought into Court; and I order the defendant to pay the costs of the suit, this being one of those cases in which the costs must abide the event. The proceeds of the sale of that timber being brought into Court, I will allow the defendant liberty to apply in chambers for the application of any part of it before sale for the purpose of being applied specifically to the timber repairs about to be actually done to the property.

June 27.—Upon the matter being mentioned to the Court upon the minutes, His Honour, at the request of the defendant C. G. Fryer, instead of having an auction, gave him liberty to purchase the timber which he had cut, and which was still lying in situ, at a valuation to be made thereof by the valuer of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, Mr. Clutton, and then to apply at chambers as to the costs of having such valuation made.

Landlord and Tenant—Fixtures, Right to remove—Forfeiture of Lease—Re-entry.

FIXTURES.—In whatever mode a lease be determined, the tenant has no right (unless protected by special contract) to remove his fixtures after he has ceased to be in lawful possession.

Where a tenant forfeited his lease by an act of bankruptcy, and the landlord re-entered:—Held, that the landlord was absolutely entitled to all fixtures remaining upon the premises at the date of the re-entry.

The plaintiff, Edmund Lechmere Pugh, was landlord of a shop and other premises at Worcester, which had been demised to John Vaughan, a stationer and bookseller, for a term of seven years from the 25th of March, 1865. Among other provisions, the lease contained a proviso that, if the lessee should become bankrupt or execute any assignment for the benefit of his creditors, or enter into any composition for the payment of his debts, it should be "lawful for the plaintiff, his heirs or assigns, immediately or at any time thereafter, to enter into and upon the hereditaments thereby demised, or any part thereof in the name of the whole, and the same to repossess and enjoy as of his or their former estate, as if that indenture had never been made." The lease contained no provision in respect of fixtures.

On the 2nd of March, 1868, Vaughan executed an assignment of all his estate and effects to the defendant George Arton, for the benefit of his creditors; the deed was registered in bankruptcy on the 11th of March.

Under the authority of this deed the defendant Arton advertised for sale all Vaughan's stock-in-trade, including shop-fixtures, gas-fittings and other fixtures in and upon the premises. The plaintiff, however, upon the 12th of March, served the defendant with a formal notice to the effect that all the fixtures belonged to him as landlord, and that, as the interest of the lessee had become forfeited by breach of the conditions of the lease, he (the plaintiff) claimed possession of the premises and all the fixtures, articles and things affixed thereto, and should hold the defendant liable for any loss sustained by their removal.

Notwithstanding this notice, the defendant threatened to proceed with the sale of the fixtures, whereupon the plaintiff filed his bill and obtained an injunction to restrain the sale. The order directed an inquiry as to which of the fixtures enumerated in the catalogue of sale were affixed to the premises at the date of the lease, and which had been affixed by Vaughan during the tenancy, and whether the fixtures were such as between the plaintiff and Vaughan could not be removed from the freehold without the plaintiff's consent; also, as to the value of any which had been already sold by the defendant.

The chief clerk certified that the fixtures in question were tenant's fixtures; that many of them had been purchased by Vaughan from a prior tenant, and others had been put up at Vaughan's own expense, but all of them were claimed by the plaintiff on the ground that the tenant's right to remove them was barred by the forfeiture and subsequent entry of the landlord.

This point now came on for argument upon further consideration of the cause.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Elderton, for the plaintiff, argued that after the determination of the lease, whether by forfeiture or otherwise, the tenant's right to remove the fixtures was barred. In the absence of any special contract of reservation, all fixtures not removed by the tenant while he remained in lawful possession became the property of the landlord. The rule applied still more strictly where, as in this case, the determination of the lease was caused by the tenant's own act—Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, 9th edit. 533; Weeton v. Woodcock (7 Mee. & W. 14; 10 L. J. Ex. 183); Lyde v. Russell (1 B. & Ald. 394; 9 L. J. K.B. 26); Bishop v. Elliott (11 Ex. Rep. 120); Poole's case (Salk. 368).

Mr. J. Pearson and Mr. Hadley, for the defendant, contended that the breach of covenant did not ipso facto determine the lease; it must be followed by the landlord's re-entry, and then a reasonable time must be allowed to the tenant for removing his fixtures—Sumner v. Bromilow (34 L. J. Q.B. 130). The policy of the law had been greatly relaxed of late years in favour of the rights of the tenant, and it would be a dangerous precedent to establish that any landlord could arbitrarily avail himself of a breach of covenant to come in and take immediate possession of all a tenant's fixtures without allowing a reasonable time for their removal. They also cited Hellawell v. Eastwood (6 Ex. Rep. 295; 20 L. J. Ex. 154); Stansfield v. the Mayor of Portsmouth (4 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 120; 27 L. J. C.P. 124).

MALINS, V.C.—This case involves an important question between landlord and tenant, the plaintiff being the landlord and the defendant, as the tenant's assignee, being in the same position as the tenant himself. Under a lease, dated the 17th of February, 1865, a house was demised by the plaintiff to John Vaughan for a term of years, which, in point of time, has not yet expired. That lease contained a covenant or proviso that if the lessee should do certain acts, amongst which is the execution of an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, the landlord should have an immediate right of re-entry; that is, in fact, a forfeiture, not of course absolute, but at the option of the landlord, and therefore the lease would in that respect become voidable, not void, on the happening of any one of the specified events. On the 2nd of March, 1868, Vaughan made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, which, beyond all doubt, amounted to an act of bankruptcy, and was a forfeiture of the lease. That did not become known to the plaintiff until the 11th, on which day the deed was registered under the act. On the 12th he gave notice to Vaughan that he intended to treat the lease as forfeited, but he did not enter until the 14th, on which day he actually determined the lease, and thereby revested the estate in himself. Vaughan's business was that of a bookseller, and there were certain fixtures in and about the house or shop which are now admitted on both sides to be tenant's fixtures, that is, things which, though in a certain sense attached to the freehold, the tenant had still a right to remove during the continuance of his tenancy or lease. If, therefore, the lease had not been forfeited the tenant would at this moment have that right, because the law is clear that where such fixtures are put in by the tenant he has a right at any time during the continuance of the lease to remove them; and it is equally clear that if he omits to remove them during the currency of the lease, after its expiration it is too late for him to do so without the consent of the landlord; and I was surprised to hear the case argued as if there was any doubt on this point, for it was long ago settled, as I always thought, in Lyde v. Russell. Nothing can be more distinct on the subject than the point there raised, and decided by Lord Tenterden. That was a case in which the tenant brought an action of trover for bells which had been put up at his own expense, and which he would have had an unquestionable right to remove during his tenancy; but it was held that by remaining fixed to the freehold after the expiration of the term they became the property of the landlord.—[His Honour referred at length to Lord Tenterden's judgment in the case, and continued]—Mr. Glasse cited several other authorities, but I need not refer to them as they are all collected in Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, at page 534 of the last edition. It is there laid down that where a lease expires, whether by effluxion of time or by forfeiture, which is the act of the tenant (the right being the same in either case), if the tenant does not remove the fixtures during the continuance of the lease or while he remains in lawful possession, it is too late for him to do so after the landlord has entered. Against this rule two cases were relied upon, by Mr. Pearson and Mr. Hadley, namely, Stansfield v. the Mayor of Portsmouth and Sumner v. Bromilow, both of which proceed upon the footing that there was a covenant between the landlord and the tenant that certain things should remain and certain things should be removed; it was held that if the tenant had a right by virtue of his covenant to remove particular fixtures he must have a reasonable time for doing so after the expiration of the lease, but all that those cases decide is, that where there is an express contract that the tenant shall have a right to remove fixtures he does not lose that right the moment his term ends or is forfeited, but he must have a reasonable time after the lease determines. They do not, therefore, vary the old law on this most important principle, nor do I accede to the argument that it has been varied or gradually relaxed: I think it remains unaltered. Where there is an express contract between the parties the Court will put a reasonable construction upon it, and allow the tenant a reasonable time; but unless the tenant protects himself by a contract, giving him the right to take away the fixtures after the expiration of the term, there is no such right. Whether the lease is determined by lapse or by the act of the tenant (of which he must necessarily have the best notice) he must protect himself, for when once the landlord has re-entered he is back in his possession. Upon the principle of Lyde v. Russell, the law presumes a gift to the reversioner. That being the state of the facts here, and there being no special contract, the plaintiff is entitled to such of the fixtures as were not removed during the continuance of the lease, that is, before the plaintiff took possession under the forfeiture on the 14th of March, and he must have a decree. At the same time I think this a most unconscionable and ungracious claim, seeing that these are trade fixtures, put up at the tenant's own expense or bought by him from a previous tenant, and I shall not give the plaintiff any costs, although as a general rule the costs would follow the result.

Power of Appointment, Exercise of—Agreement for a Settlement by Appointee giving Appointor a remote contingent Interest—Pecuniary Consideration given by Appointor—Fraud on the Power.

POWERS.—By articles made upon the marriage of G. D, her father, T. D, covenanted that he and his wife would, in exercise of a power of appointment among their children given to them by their marriage settlement, appoint a share of certain trust funds to G. D, and he also covenanted to give to trustees a bond for the payment of a sum nearly equal to the appointed share. The same articles provided that the appointed funds and the moneys secured by the bond should be so settled as that, in case of default of issue of G. D.'s marriage, the ultimate remainder in them should be vested in T. D. absolutely. In pursuance of these articles T. D. and his wife appointed to G. D. a share of the trust funds, subject to their settlement. T. D. executed the said bond, and the moneys so appointed and secured were settled as agreed. There was no issue of G. D.'s marriage:—Held, that the appointment was a valid execution of the power, notwithstanding the contingent interest which T. D, one of the appointors, obtained under it by the above-mentioned arrangement.

This suit was instituted to contest the validity of an appointment of trust funds under a power, upon the ground that the appointment was a fraud on the power.

By an indenture of settlement, dated the 8th of September, 1806, and made in contemplation of the marriage of Thomas Daniell and Lucy Maria, his intended wife, a trust fund of consols was settled, subject to life interests thereby given to Mr. and Mrs. Daniell, " in trust for all and every or such one or more of the child or children of the said intended marriage at such age or ages, time or times, and in such parts, shares and proportions, manner and form, and under and subject to such provisoes, conditions, restrictions and limitations over, being for the benefit of some or one of such child or children as the said T. Daniell and his wife should at any time or times during their joint lives " by deed appoint; and in default of such joint appointment as the survivor of them should appoint; and " in default of any such direction or appointment, and in the meantime and until any such direction or appointment should be made, and as to so much of the said Bank annuities or such right or interest therein to which any such direction or appointment, if incomplete, should not extend, in trust for an only child of the said then intended marriage, if there should be but one child, and if there should be more than one, then in trust for all and every the child and children of the said then intended marriage, equally to be divided amongst them, share and share alike," the shares of sons to vest at twenty-one, and the shares of daughters at twenty-one or marriage. The said settlement also contained a hotch-pot clause. There were five children of the said marriage, of whom the defendant Maria Gertrude Daniell, on the 14th of February, 1832, married George O. B. Trevanion, since deceased.

By articles of agreement, dated the 11th of February, 1832, made in contemplation of such last-mentioned marriage, reciting the power of appointment contained in the settlement of 1806, and that Mr. and Mrs. Daniell had agreed to make a joint appointment of one-fourth of the moneys thereby settled in favour of their daughter Maria Gertrude Daniell, and reciting that Thomas Daniell had also agreed to secure by his bond the sum of 4,567*l*., to be paid as thereinafter mentioned, and reciting that as well the sums of money so agreed to be appointed and the said bond as future property of the said Maria Gertrude Cooper, were agreed to be settled in manner thereinafter expressed, G. O. B. Trevanion covenanted with Thomas Daniell, his executors, administrators and assigns, that he, G. O. B. Trevanion, would settle certain moneys intended to be appointed in his favour by his father, John Trevanion, in manner therein mentioned; and Thomas Daniell, for himself and his wife, Lucy Maria Daniell, covenanted and agreed with G. O. B. Trevanion that they, Thomas Daniell and Lucy Maria, his wife, would, immediately after the said appointment so intended to be made by the said John Trevanion should have been duly executed in due form of law, execute the said recited power of appointment vested in them as aforesaid in favour of their said daughter, in order that the same might be settled to and for the several trusts, intents and purposes thereinafter mentioned; and also that he, the said Thomas Daniell, would, immediately after the said appointment so intended to be made by the said John Trevanion should have been duly executed, execute to the trustees of the settlement a bond for payment to them, in the year 1840, of the sum of 4,567*l*., with power to pay off the same at an earlier period, with interest at 5*l*. per cent. from the date of the bond, payable half-yearly; and it was declared and agreed that G. O. B. Trevanion, Thomas Daniell and Lucy Maria, his wife, and Maria Gertrude Trevanion should, as soon as might be after the solemnization of the said intended marriage and the said deed of appointment should have been duly executed by the said John Trevanion, legally and effectually convey, settle and assure to the trustees of that deed all and singular the moneys and premises thereinbefore mentioned and intended to be settled as aforesaid, and also all other estate or property to which the said Maria Gertrude Daniell might become entitled as aforesaid, to hold the same unto the said trustees upon the trusts thereinafter expressed, being trusts in favour of G. O. B. Trevanion and Maria Gertrude Daniell for their respective lives, with remainder amongst their children and issue as therein mentioned; and it was thereby provided that in case there should be no child or children of the said intended marriage who, or whose issue, should acquire a vested interest in the said trust funds, then and in such case the moneys intended to be settled by the said G. O. B. Trevanion should go and belong to his executors, administrators and assigns, and the moneys intended to be settled by the said Thomas Daniell and Lucy Maria, his wife, should go and belong to the executors, administrators and assigns of the said Thomas Daniell.

By a deed-poll, dated the 10th of April, 1832, Thomas Daniell and his wife absolutely and irrevocably appointed one equal fourth share of the moneys, stocks, funds and securities liable to the trusts of their settlement of the 8th of September, 1806, which were in the said deed-poll stated to consist of the sum of 11,834*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* consols and the sums of 4,000*l.* and 3,590*l.* sterling, as and for the portion of the said Maria Gertrude Trevanion, and that the same should immediately become a vested interest in her so as to be transmissible to her executors, administrators and assigns, and should immediately upon the decease of the survivor of them, the said Thomas Daniell and Lucy Maria, his wife, or so soon after as circumstances would permit, be transferred to the said Maria Gertrude Trevanion, her executors, administrators or assigns, for her own use and benefit.

The deed of appointment provided that nothing therein contained should preclude Maria Gertrude Trevanion from taking a share in the unappointed funds, subject to the original settlement on bringing the moneys now appointed to her into hotch-pot.

On the 11th of April, 1832, a settlement of Maria Gertrude Trevanion's appointed share and property to be after acquired, was duly executed in accordance with the articles of February, 1832.

G. O. B. Trevanion died in September, 1832, and there was no issue of his marriage.

In June, 1841, Maria Gertrude Trevanion was married to the plaintiff Frederick Bathurst Cooper. By a settlement made in contemplation of such marriage it was agreed that the trustees of the settlement of April, 1832, should stand possessed of the funds thereby settled to which the said Maria Gertrude Trevanion was entitled for her life or otherwise, upon trust during the joint lives of herself and the plaintiff to pay a moiety of the interest thereof to her for her separate use, and the other moiety of the interest to the plaintiff, and after the death of one of them to pay the interest to the survivor for life.

In the year 1834, Sophia (another daughter of Thomas and Lucy Maria Daniell) was married to J. H. England (since deceased). In contemplation of such marriage, Thomas Daniell and Lucy Maria (his wife), by a deed-poll, dated the 3rd of May, 1834, made an appointment of one-fourth part of the said funds subject to their marriage settlement in favour of their said daughter Sophia, in similar terms to the appointment in favour of Maria Gertrude hereinbefore mentioned.

By a settlement of even date with the last-mentioned deed-poll, reciting that upon the treaty for the said intended marriage it had been agreed that Mr. and Mrs. Daniell should appoint one-fourth part of the funds liable to the trusts for the settlement of the 8th of September, 1806, to or in trust for Sophia England, in manner effected by such deed-poll, and that the part so to be appointed to the said Sophia England, and all other her interest in the same trust premises, and all her after-acquired property, should be settled in manner thereinafter expressed, and that Thomas Daniell should execute a bond to the trustees of the settlement for payment to them of 4,000*l.*, with interest as therein mentioned (which bond was duly executed), the share so appointed to Sophia England and the moneys payable under the bond were settled upon trusts in favour of Mr. and Mrs. England and the survivor of them, during their respective lives, with remainder amongst their children and issue as therein mentioned; and in default of children who, or whose issue, should become entitled, upon trusts in favour of Thomas Daniell, his executors, administrators and assigns, similar to those contained in Mrs. Trevanion's settlement.

There were six children of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. England, of whom five had attained twenty-one, and thereby acquired vested interests in remainder under their parents' marriage settlement.

In August, 1844, Mr. and Mrs. Daniell appointed the unappointed moiety of the funds, subject to the trusts of the settlement of September, 1806, to their children Ralph Allen Daniell and Marianne Daniell. Thomas Daniell, in the year 1835, was declared a bankrupt. Up to his bankruptcy he had duly paid the interest due upon the two bonds, and the bond debts were duly proved in the bankruptcy; and in 1843 and 1845 dividends to the amount of one-fifth of the principal sums secured were paid thereon. In May, 1849, the assignees in bankruptcy of Thomas Daniell assigned for value to Sir Alexander Duff Gordon and others, as trustees of the Economic Life Assurance Society, the reversionary interest of the said Thomas Daniell under the articles and settlement executed upon the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Trevanion, in the one-fourth share of the trust funds appointed to Mrs. Trevanion as aforesaid, and also in the amount received under the bankruptcy of the said Thomas Daniell, as dividends upon his said bond debt of 4,567*l.* Thomas Daniell died in March, 1866, having survived his wife. Upon the death of the said Thomas Daniell the trust funds, subject to the settlement of September, 1806, were divided by the surviving trustee of that settlement among the persons who were entitled or conceived to be entitled thereto, one-fourth being paid to the trustees of Mr. and Mrs. Trevanion's settlement, and another fourth to the trustees of Mr. and Mrs. England's settlement. The plaintiff submitted that the appointment of the one-fourth of the trust funds made to his wife upon her former marriage with Mr. Trevanion was a fraud upon the power of appointment, by reason of the same being made for the purposes of a settlement, which conferred an interest therein upon Thomas Daniell; and he contended that such one-fourth share was now distributable among the persons entitled thereto in default of appointment, and for the same reasons he contested the validity of the appointment of one-fourth to Mrs. England.

Mr. Kay and Mr. W. C. Druce, for the plaintiff, in support of their argument that the appointment was a fraud upon the power, by reason of its having been made for the purposes of a settlement which limited an interest in the fund appointed to the donee of the power, cited Goldsmid v. Goldsmid (2 Hare, 187; 12 L. J. Ch. 113); Birley v. Birley (25 Beav. 299; 27 L. J. Ch. 569); Pryor v. Pryor (2 De Gex, J. & S. 205; 33 L. J. Ch. 441); The Duke of Portland v. Topham (11 H.L. C. 32; 34 L. J. Ch. 113); Palmer v. Wheeler (2 Ball & B. 18); Sugden on Powers, 8th edit. 613; Lane v. Page (Amb. 233).

Mr. Fischer, for Mrs. Cooper, urged that there had been no antecedent bargain with her regarding the terms of the settlement. He cited Arnold v. Hardwick (7 Sim. 343); Salmon v. Gibbs (3 De Gex & Sm. 343; 18 L. J. Ch. 177).

Mr. Hemming (Sir Roundell Palmer with him), for the Economic Assurance Society, argued that the appointment to Mrs. Cooper was good. The rule acted upon by the Court was, that where the purpose and object of the appointment was to benefit the appointor, there the appointment was bad, but the principle could not be carried so far as to vitiate every appointment under which the donee of the power might receive a benefit, or by which there might be a remote chance of anything coming back to him. If that were so, every appointment made by a father to a daughter upon her marriage with a view to a settlement in the ordinary form by which an ultimate limitation, in default of children, was reserved in favour of the daughter's next-of-kin to the exclusion of her husband would be invalid. The case of Askham v. Barker (17 Beav. 37; 22 L. J. Ch. 769), summed up the law upon the subject. In order to make the appointment fraudulent there must be an improper and sinister purpose of giving some advantage to the appointor. Such a purpose, whether direct or indirect, would vitiate the appointment, but the mere fact that the donee of the power might remotely derive some benefit from his exercise of it would not necessarily invalidate the appointment. In this case, Thomas Daniell had given to the trustees of Mrs. Cooper's settlement made upon her marriage with Mr. G. O. B. Trevanion a bond nearly equal in amount to the share of the trust funds, subject to his own settlement, which he and Mrs. Daniell had appointed to her; and an arrangement was made that, upon his giving such a bond, he should be entitled in an improbable or, at least, remote event to a contingent benefit in the appointed share. There was nothing in that indicating an improper or sinister motive. Besides, the arrangement had been acquiesced in and acted upon for a number of years by all parties, and a considerable amount of the money due upon the bond had actually been recovered, and the plaintiff himself was taking benefits under it. He could not now, in any case, come and disturb the arrangement. He referred to The Duke of Portland v. Topham (11 H.L. C. 32; 34 L. J. Ch. 113); Daubeny v. Cockburn (1 Mer. 626); Jebb v. Tugwell. (7 De Gex, M. & G. 663; 25 L. J. Ch. 109).

Mr. Eddis and Mr. Hamilton Humphreys, for Mrs. England and her children, argued that the appointment and settlement would be upheld. At all events, if the ultimate limitation in favour of the appointor were bad, the other parts of the settlement, which could readily be distinguished from it, were perfectly unimpeachable. And, even with regard to the appointment, although the condition upon which it was made might be bad, yet the appointment itself might be good—Fitzroy v. the Duke of Richmond (27 Beav. 190; 28 L. J. Ch. 750); Lane v. Page (Amb. 233); Palsgrave v. Atkinson (1 Coll. C.C. 190); Sadler v. Pratt (5 Sim. 632); Topham v. the Duke of Portland (1 De Gex, J. & S. 517; 32 L. J. Ch. 257); Rucker v. Scholefield (1 Hem. & M. 36; 32 L. J. Ch. 46); Ranking v. Barnes (33 L. J. Ch. 539).

Mr. W. F. Robinson, Mr. Deverell and Mr. Swan, for other parties.

Mr. Kay replied.—The question to be regarded in considering the validity of the appointment was the motive in the mind of the appointee; and if there was, in the exercise of his power, any motive or influence there not consistent with the trust imposed upon him, the appointment was bad. The plaintiff was not bound to take any proceedings to upset the appointment till the death of Mr. Daniell, the previous tenant for life.

JAMES, V.C.—The case of the plaintiff in this suit appears to me to be an illustration of a class of cases in which rules laid down by the Court of Chancery for the prevention of fraud are endeavoured to be strained, upon some technical grounds, for the purpose of producing fraud in such a way that one sometimes cannot help wishing that there were a Court of equity to correct what the Court of Chancery is doing in these matters. Luckily, in this case one is able to deal, not with any technical rule, but with the substance and truth of the case; and, regarding merely the substance and truth of the case, it is this: A father and mother, having a power of appointment among their children, upon the marriage of one of the daughters, who is now the wife of the plaintiff, executed an appointment of one-quarter of the fund to the daughter. The appointment is in terms perfectly unimpeachable; it is an appointment to the daughter absolutely, so as to be a vested and transmissible interest in her. But it is said that, looking at the whole transaction and looking at the articles of agreement which were made before that appointment was in form executed, the Court is able to see that there was some corrupt purpose, some indirect and sinister purpose in the mind of the father, who joined in the appointment, which makes this appointment a fraud in equity. The sinister purpose is this, that it was agreed by those articles of agreement that there should be a marriage settlement, by which, in certainly not a very probable event, or at all events, a remote event, the fund so appointed should come back to the father. The fund was settled upon the daughter for life, with remainder for the husband for life, with remainder for the children and issue of the marriage, and then with an ultimate trust, in default of issue, to the donee of the power, the appointor.

That, no doubt, if it stood alone, would be a grave ground for impeaching the settlement. I do not mean in the slightest degree to question those cases which hold that if a donee of a power directly or indirectly obtain for himself a personal benefit by reason of the execution of the power, that will not do; but in this case, what the father did was this (because you must look at the whole transaction), he not only executed the power of appointment by appointing a sum of 5,000*l.* for his daughter, but he binds himself in a bond of about 5,000*l.*: he being a man at that time in credit, the bond was not a sham. The interest of the bond seems to have been paid for a number of years, and even after his bankruptcy there has been realized for this very trust on account of the bond debt the not inconsiderable sum of 1,500*l.*; he himself puts into settlement that bond of 5,000*l.*, and gives an immediate interest to the wife, an interest to the husband, and an interest to the children in this fund. Therefore, taking the whole bargain together, it is this: "I will appoint to you the 5,000*l.*" (or whatever the exact sum is) "provided you will enter into a bargain with me that for 5,000*l.* more, which I am going to pay down directly, you will give me a contingent reversion in this fund." In that case I must look at the substance. Was that an indirect advantage to the father at all that he should be buying a future reversion of this kind for that high price? If I were to set aside the transaction, I must set it aside in toto. For instance, if a man say, "I will appoint White Acre to you, one of the objects of the appointment being that you will sell it to me for 1,000*l.*, could it be contended that the person could sell White Acre and keep the 1,000*l.*? It appears to me the substance of the transaction was a bargain intended substantially for the benefit of the daughter, who was the object of the power, and that the contingent benefit which the father got was a thing for which he gave value over and over again, and therefore it is not within the rules at all which apply to these cases. Upon that ground, I am of opinion that the appointment is perfectly good, and it seems to me that upon other grounds it would be utterly impossible for this plaintiff, whose wife was a party to the whole transaction, who took the whole benefit under the settlement when he married her, the settlement executed upon his marriage with her referring to the prior settlement, and who is now taking the benefit of the purchase-money of the father's bond, it appears to me to be utterly impossible to allow him, after taking the advantage of all the interest, to have it set aside.

I do not know that I should have heard the case out upon that ground, but I thought possibly he might have some ground for setting aside the appointment to Mrs. England, which he was not estopped from by reason of his being a participator in the benefits of it: but I think it is impossible to allow him to question that. The appointment to Mrs. England seems to stand upon the same ground as the appointment to Mrs. Cooper; the one is perfectly good, and independently of that, there is a second ground. The money having got home to the trustees of Mrs. England, and there having been this acquiescence and consent, I do not think I should allow him to disturb the whole family arrangements, made on the footing of that, when he did not know anything of the facts at the time. But both of these are subsidiary grounds. I base my judgment upon the broad principle that there was no corrupt, fraudulent or sinister purpose in the father, that it was an honest settlement made by him in execution of the power of appointment for the benefit of his daughter. The bill must be dismissed, with costs.

Letters Patent—Specification—Successive Patents—Part of a Combination —Sliding Door.

PATENT.—Where a patentee has taken out a fresh patent for improvements on his original invention it is sufficient if, reading his second specification with the first, an artisan would have no substantial difficulty in ascertaining what was claimed.

A patent for an entire combination is not a valid patent for a part when that part would not of itself be patentable, nor (semble) when, though new and useful for other purposes, such part has no bearing on the professed object of the patented invention.

Therefore, when the subject of a patent was declared to be an invention for producing "a glazed lamp, the frame of which shall throw little or no shadow, and yet at the same time possess the requisite strength and also facilities for lighting and cleaning":—Held, that the substitution of a sliding door for a hinge, which diminished the danger of breakage, but gave no facilities for lighting and cleaning, and had nothing to do with the strength or the shadow, was not protected by the patent.

Semble—that there can be no patent right in the mere substitution of a slide for a hinge in the door of a house, of a carriage, or of a lamp.

A patent was entitled, for "improvements in the manufacture of railway station and other gas lamps," but the specification claimed only (by reference to a former specification) improvements in "that class of lanterns suitable for suspension in railway stations and other public places." Whether the patent was confined to lamps suspended, quære.

This was a suit to restrain an alleged infringement of a patent, in which the following issues were by consent directed to be tried before the Court itself without a jury:

1. As to the novelty of the alleged invention, the subject of the patent.
2. As to its utility.
3. Whether it was or was not a proper subject for a patent.
4. Whether the specification was sufficient.
5. Whether there had been any infringement by the plaintiff.

In 1862 the plaintiff took out a patent for "improvements in gas lanterns," and filed the following specification:

"My improvements in gas lanterns relate to that class of lanterns suitable for suspending in railway stations and other public places, and are of a globular form, the framework consisting of a series of segmental ribs to which the glass is fitted and makes up the globular form, each piece being a section of a sphere. I employ three rings in the frame, two small ones, one each at top and bottom, and one large one at the middle or equatorial line. The small rings I make of a thin strip of metal, presenting the edge to the light, and consequently to throw little or no shadow. The middle bead is unlike that in ordinary use, being narrow and without openings, the only opening in the lamp being above and below, the one at the bottom, for admission of the air, and the other at the top, for the escape. The section of metal of which I form the segmental ribs and the large ring consists of a flat strip with a hollow bead united thereto on the outside, the whole being kept as narrow as consistent with the strength necessary. I support this lamp with three rods united to the middle bead and meeting at top in a single pendent arm or branch, or they may be otherwise supported. From the absence of apertures in the middle bead and the disposition of the metal in its upper and lower rings and ribs, which are few in number, comparatively little surface is presented to intercept the radiation of light, and consequently little or no shadow is thrown. The gas duct passes down one of the arms to the mid ring and there enters the globe and descends to a suitable position for the jet. The stop-cock I prefer to place immediately under the jet and concentric with the lower opening in the lamp, the elbow being formed with a stop-cock in which the gas passage emerges at one end of the axis with a view to that object. The parts of the frame are united by soldering, brazing or otherwise, and the glass which is inside the frame is fixed by means of metal strips coinciding with the ribs and large metal ring and fixed thereto inside and upon the edges of the glass, or the glass may be fixed with putty and otherwise in the ordinary manner of fixing the glass in similar kinds of lamps."

The plaintiff subsequently observed various points in which his lamp might be improved, and, in particular, that the form of door used, viz., one of the segmental ribs of the globe opening outwards on a hinge, gave rise to frequent breakages, owing to the two convex surfaces of the glass coming into contact at a point. He therefore, in 1865, took out a second patent for "Improvements in the manufacture of railway-station and other gas lamps." The specification was as follows: "My invention relates to the construction of lamps of a class forming the subject of a patent granted to me, bearing date the 26th of June, 1862, No. 1876, which lamps are particularly applicable for suspension in railway stations or in large exposed areas, either inclosed or open, the great object of the improvements being to produce a glazed lamp the frame of which shall throw little or no shadow, and yet, at the same time, possess the requisite strength and also facilities for lighting and cleaning the lamp. According to my improvements, I make the ribs, which stand in a vertical plane, of a strip of copper or other metal drawn into the form of a round bead in cross section with narrow flanges, one on either side, throughout the length. The parts of the metal where curled to form the bead do not touch, a narrow space being left between for the reception of a rib or feather-piece on edge, which projects from the flat or flange side of the bead and inside the lamp. These ribs are united in a circular band above and below, pins entering the ends of the beads through the bands, and the whole being riveted and soldered together. A metal band is carried round at the largest diameter of the lamp, united to the whole of the upright ribs; this midband is of a half-round, bead-like form, with flanges, and of larger size than the upright ribs, which are dovetailed across and into it flush on the inside. This band is also strengthened by a rib on edge in the interior of the bead, which is introduced in sections between the feathers of the upright ribs and flush therewith; these projecting ribs or feathers inside the lamp serve to receive the glass, which is puttied therein and introduced from the inside. There are six (more or less) pieces of glass in the upper half and six in the lower, each piece being in the form of a section of a sphere. The top ring is double, one part being fixed to the upright ribs, the other part fitting within the fixed one and rotating therein freely, but held by pins working in slots; this movable ring supports the door of the lamp at the top, which door consists of one of the panes of glass fixed in a separate frame; the door is further supported at bottom by a part or parts fitted in a slot or slots in the large mid-bead in the direction of which it is traversed round in opening or closing the said door. This door is formed of a light frame of U-shaped metal to receive the glass and lie close on the outer surface of the lamp. The glass of the upper half of the lamp, in addition to the holding of the putty to keep it in place, is received at its upper edge between two flange-like parts of the upper fixed ring. These lamps are suspended by three rods or tubes, one forming the gas-duct, which unite with the lamp at equidistant points around the mid-bead, and at points where the upright ribs intersect. To make the junction of the suspending parts, I apply a ball or enlarged like piece, having at one part a four-pronged like projection which fits on and embraces the intersecting parts of the ribs and mid-band, the whole being fixed through with a pin and soldered in that pendent conducting the gas. I make the four-pronged like piece separate from the ball or enlargement which in this case embraces also the stop-tap, the parts being fixed together by a hollow nipple instead of the pin before mentioned, but also soldered in addition. The gas passes from this point to the burner through one of the upright ribs instead of by a tube within the lamp as formerly; an upright stand-pipe from the bottom ring and gas-rib carries the burner. The feather in the gas-rib is omitted in the interior of the bead, to leave the channel free. The top piece, or canopy, in which the three rods unite I cast hollow in one piece, instead of forming it in pieces as formerly. I tin the whole of the metal of the lamp to protect it from the action of the gas."

The specification then gave in detail a description of the drawings thereto annexed, and concluded as follows: "Having described the nature of my invention and the manner of performing the same, I declare that what I claim as my invention, to be protected by the hereinbefore in part recited letters patent, is the arrangement and combination of parts hereinbefore described and represented in the drawings annexed in the manufacture of railway-station and other gas lamps."

The plaintiff charged that certain large globular lamps supplied by the defendant for lighting up New Palace Yard, Westminster, were an infringement of his patent; in particular in the use of the peculiar revolving or sliding door invented by the plaintiff, with the merely colourable difference that the door was put in the lower instead of the upper section of the lamp. The defendant's case was, that the only resemblance was in the sliding door, which was no essential part of the plaintiff's invention, and was, in fact, too obvious and familiar a contrivance to be the subject of a patent at all.

JAMES, V.C.—In this case I have to deliver my verdict on each of the several issues which have been set down for trial before me without a jury.

The defendant in this case was employed to place, and has placed, in Palace Yard, certain lamps of a globular form, the lamps being divided into segments,—as he lawfully might. One of those segments was a door opening as occasion might require for the purpose of lighting and cleaning. It is not contended that it is not open to any one of Her Majesty's subjects to make a globular lamp in segments, with one of such segments made to act as a door, but the plaintiff says it was not lawful for the defendant in his globular lamps to make the door segment open and shut by sliding along grooves left in the framework of the adjoining segment or segments instead of revolving on a hinge or hinges. The plaintiff says, "That is part of an invention the subject of letters patent granted to me in December, 1865, and your use of it is an infringement of my patent right." The plaintiff produces two patents, one of 1862 and one of 1865. It is not suggested that there has been any infringement of the patent of 1862; it has however been necessary to refer to it.—[His Honour read the material parts of the two specifications.]—The particulars of the infringement are as follows.—[His Honour read the particulars, the substance of which has been already stated.]—The defendant has given in his particulars of objections, the nature of which, so far as is material, sufficiently appears from the issues directed to be tried. The first, second and third issues may be taken together, the first being whether the alleged invention was or was not a new invention, new within the United Kingdom; the second, whether such alleged invention was an invention of public utility; the third, whether such alleged invention was or was not a proper subject for letters patent to be granted to protect it.

Upon those issues I am of opinion that the plaintiff has produced, by a skilful and ingenious arrangement and conbination of the parts of the framework of his lamp, an article of manufacture of great neatness and elegance of form and calculated to produce the desired end, i. e., a framework which throws little or no shadow, while at the same time it possesses the requisite strength, with facilities for lighting and cleaning. There is evidence, not contradicted, that the arrangement and combination of the parts were new. It required some thought to design it, and some labour to give the design practical form and effect; and it seems to have answered better, taken as a whole, than any lamp previously designed for the same object.

My verdict on the first three issues is in favour of the plaintiff; but the defendant contends that the specification is not sufficient, and he relies for this objection upon the judgment of Lord Westbury in the case of Foxwell v. Bostock, to the effect that a patent for the infringement of a machine must, with sufficient distinctness, describe the particular part of the machine which is alleged to be an improvement, and the particular improvement for which the protection is claimed. I need not say that I should feel myself bound by that decision if I did not, which I do most entirely, concur in it. It is obvious that a patentee does not comply as he ought to do with the conditions of his grant if the improvement is only to be found, like a piece of gold, mixed up with a great quantity of alloy, so that a person desiring to find out what was new or what was claimed as new, must have to get rid of a large portion of the specification by eliminating from it what was old and commonplace, bringing to the subject not only the knowledge of an ordinary skilled artisan but that of a patent lawyer or agent. For example, suppose a compensation pendulum was for the first time invented, it would not do to patent improvements in clocks in general terms and give a specification of the whole machinery of a clock, introducing somewhere in the course of the description the mode of making a compensation pendulum, and then claim the arrangement of a compensation pendulum and improvements. He must say expressly, "I claim an arrangement of a compensation pendulum, and I make it thus." But I am of opinion that that case does not apply to or govern such a case as the present. After all, the question of the sufficiency of the specification is not a question of law; it is a question of fact in each particular case. In this case I am of opinion that the patentee has a right to have his specification of 1865 read with his specification of 1862; and reading them together, I do not think any maker of lamps would have any substantial difficulty in ascertaining what was claimed under the general description of "the arrangement and combination of parts hereinbefore described and represented in the drawing annexed."

But the patent being for an arrangement and combination of parts so as to form an entire lamp, and not being for or claiming to be for any particular part, the last question arises, Is the introduction into a lamp, which is not alleged in any other respect to adopt any part of the plaintiff's arrangement and combination, of a sliding door, an infringement? The plaintiff's counsel have contended that it is, on the authority of Lister v. Leather, the marginal note of which is as follows: "A patent for a combination does not import a claim that each of its parts is new, and the patent may be valid though each part is old; but the use of a subordinate part only of a combination may be an infringement of a patent for the combination, if the part so used be new and material." The authority of that case has been pressed upon me as if it really established that which would be a most startling proposition, that a patent for a combination or arrangement would be a distinct patent for everything that was new and material which went to make up the combination. The marginal note, if read hastily, is calculated to give some colour to that contention, but if the judgment be read it will be found to give no warrant whatever for what I must call such a baseless notion. The law is summed up at page 1023 of the volume I have before me as follows: "A valid patent for an entire combination for a process gives protection to such part thereof as is new and material for that process without any express claim of particular parts, and notwithstanding that parts of the combination are old,"—which is really nothing more than stating, in other words, that you not only have no right to steal the whole, but you have no right to steal any part of a man's invention; and the question in every case is a question of fact: is it really and truly a substantial part of the invention?

I will again refer to the illustration of a clock. Suppose a clock was now for the first time invented and patented as a machine for measuring and indicating time, a man could not evade the patentee's right by substituting a spring for a weight, or by leaving out the whole of the striking apparatus. But the principle of that case has no application whatever, in my judgment, to the present case; and even if there had been any sufficient novelty and merit in the substitution of a sliding door for a hinge, I should have held that that was no part of the invention for producing "a glazed lamp, the frame of which shall throw little or no shadow, and yet at the same time possess the requisite strength and also facilities for lighting and cleaning." The sliding door has nothing to do with the strength, and gives no facilities for lighting and cleaning. The advantages are altogether collateral to the expressed object of the invention, and indeed so far as the sliding goes, it diminishes the facilities of cleaning. The advantage claimed and proved is, that in the hands of the class of men employed to light and clean the lamps they are far less liable to breakage, but that ought to have been the subject of a distinct claim, if it was intended to have been and could have been protected. But I am clearly of opinion that there can be no patent right in the substitution of a slide for a hinge, whether applied to the door of a house, the door of a carriage, or the door of a lamp or lantern, whether large or small, suspended or not suspended.

It was hardly contended before me that the introduction of the door alone would have been sufficient to sustain a patent; but it was contended that because it was, as alleged, a novel part of a novel combination and arrangement, it was so protected. To say that a patent for an entire combination is a valid patent for a part, when that part would not of itself be patentable, is, in my judgment, a reductio ad absurdum of the supposed principle of Lister v. Leather.

I do not think it necessary to say more on the other part of the patent than this: I doubt, and perhaps more than doubt, whether the plaintiff's patent is not confined to gas lamps suspended. My verdict on the issue as to the infringement will therefore be for the defendant.

Will—Construction—Substitution—"May die in my Lifetime"—Legatee dead at Date of Will.

WILL.—A testator gave a sum to be equally divided between his first cousins, and then gave "the share or shares of those my first cousins, if any, who may die in my lifetime unto all and every the children of all my first cousins who may so die in my lifetime share and share alike, such shares to be taken per capita and not per stirpes":—Held, that the children of a first cousin who was dead at the date of the will were excluded.

In re Potter's Trusts (L. R. 8 Eq. 52), doubted, but distinguished.

The will of Thomas Hotchkiss, dated the 4th of July, 1865, contained the following clause: "I give and bequeath the sum of 2,000*l.* free of legacy duty unto my first cousins either on my father or mother's side, to be equally divided between them, and I give the share or shares of those my first cousins, if any, who may die in my lifetime, unto all and every the children of all my first cousins who may so die in my lifetime, share and share alike, such shares to be taken per capita and not per stirpes.

The testator died on the 16th of August, 1865, and his will was duly proved in 1866 by the executors thereof.

On the 24th of October, 1867, John Cranstown, the surviving executor, paid the money into Court under the Trustee Relief Act, and filed an affidavit stating that, in answer to advertisements inserted in the London Gazette and certain local papers, the several persons thereinafter named had sent in their claims to participate in the said legacy as first cousins of the testator, or children of first cousins who died in his lifetime.

By order of Vice Chancellor Wood, dated the 16th of November, 1867, upon the petition of one of the claimants, an inquiry was directed "who were the first cousins of Thomas Hotchkiss deceased, living on the 4th of July, 1865, the date of his will, and whether any and which of such cousins are since dead, and if so, when they died, and as to any of them who shall be found to have died in the lifetime of the testator, whether they or any of them left any child or children who survived their respective parents and the said testator, and, in case any of such first cousins or children of first cousins of the said testator have died since the said testator, who are their legal personal representatives"; and it was ordered that the matter of the said petition should stand adjourned till the result of the said inquiry should be certified.

The chief clerk made his certificate accordingly, dated the 4th of April, 1869, to the effect that the only first cousins of Thomas Hotchkiss living on the 4th of July, 1865, were the eleven persons thereinafter named, all of whom were still living; and that "there were no first cousins of the said testator Thomas Hotchkiss who died in his lifetime after the said 4th of July, 1865, leaving any child or children who survived their respective parents and the said testator.

On the petition coming again into Court,

Mr. Eddis appeared for the four children of John Yapp, a first cousin of the testator, who died prior to the date of his will.

Mr. Kay and Mr. Ford, for some of the first cousins who survived the testator.—The rule recently laid down by Malins, V.C. in In re Potter's Trusts (L. R. 8 Eq. 52), viz., that "Wherever there is a gift to a class, with a gift by substitution to the issue or children of those who shall die, the children take what their parents would have taken if living at the testator's death, without regard to the question whether the parents died before or after the date of the will, unless a contrary intention is shewn," is not justified by the cases there cited. It amounts in fact to saying that the Court has power to make a will for a testator, and such a will too as it is by no means clear that the testator would have desired to make; for in the very case put by the learned Judge of a gift by a parent to his children of definite parts of his whole property, he having at the date of his will living children, and also grandchildren the children of a deceased child, it might well be that he knew the grandchildren to be already provided for.

[JAMES, V.C.—The rule might even extend to children of a person who had died before the testator came into existence.]

The particular words used in the case before Malins, V.C. "the share that his, her or their deceased parent would have taken if living," might perhaps be considered as alternative rather than substitutional, and thus be held to warrant his decision, though not the principle on which he grounded it, and Loring v. Thomas (1 Dr. & Sm. 497; 30 L. J. Ch. 789) is still more easily distinguishable on the same ground; but the general rule is that of Christopherson v. Naylor (1 Mer. 320), which has been followed again and again—Crook v. Whitley (7 De Gex, M. & G. 490; 26 L. J. Ch. 350[1]; Stewart v. Jones (3 De Gex & J. 532).

[JAMES, V.C.—That case has no bearing on the question.]

Ive v. King (16 Beav. 46 (see p. 53, "The distinction which is to be found," &c.); 21 L. J. Ch. 560); Butter v. Ommaney (4 Russ. 70; 6 L. J. Ch. 54); Gray v. Garman (2 Hare, 268; 12 L. J. Ch. 259).

Mr. T. Hughes, for other persons in the same interest, referred to Gowling v. Thompson (16 W. R. 1131), in which Christopherson v. Naylor was treated as a case of undoubted authority, though there a contrary intention was inferred from extrinsic evidence.

Mr. Eddis, contra.—This is not, properly speaking, a substitutionary clause. There is first a gift to a class, viz., first cousins, who are to be ascertained at the death of the testator; then follows, not a proviso, but another substantive gift, to "the children of all my first cousins who may so die in my lifetime." It is admitted that the words "may so die" do not necessarily import futurity; neither does the word "share" necessarily import substitution. The Court always leans to inclusion rather than exclusion; and, as was pointed out in Loring v. Thomas (1 Dr. & Sm. 511) the solution of the question must depend on the particular language used in each case; and the language may be so wide and general as to embrace every class of issue. Butter v. Ommaney and Gray v. Garman were cases of pure substitution, and Christopherson v. Naylor could only be supported on the same ground; but the latter case was disapproved of by Stuart, V.C. in Parsons v. Gulliford (10 Jur. N.S. 221) and Phillips v. Phillips (13 W. R. 170), not to mention the recent decision of Malins, V.C. in In re Potter's Trust. Then again, such expressions as "them," "the said," "such children," which have sometimes been considered as limiting the class described in the second clause to those who could have taken under the first clause, are all absent here; it is an independent gift, as in Bebb v. Beckwith (2 Beav. 308); Coulthurst v. Carter (15 Beav. 421; 21 L. J. Ch. 555); Tytherleigh v. Harbin (6 Sim. 329; 5 L. J. Ch. 15).

Mr. R. R. A. Hawkins, for the executor.

JAMES, V.C. said that, if the words of the will had been the same as in In re Potter's Trusts, he should have followed that decision without giving any opinion as to its correctness, at the same time expressing a wish that the matter might be brought before the Lord Chancellor, since nothing could be more unseemly than to have conflicting principles laid down in co-ordinate branches of the Court. But, in fact, there was a substantial, and not a merely verbal distinction between the two cases. In re Potter's Trusts might have been decided on the ground that the gift was to a class which, according to a fair construction, might be held to consist of two distinct classes: first, the nephews and nieces then living; secondly, the issue of all nephews and nieces, whether living or not at the date of the will. But here the class was clearly described, and limited to first cousins living at the date of the will; and, to read the second clause as equivalent to "I give the share or shares of any cousin who would have taken if living at my death," would be introducing words of contingency which were not in the will at all. His Honour added, that his construction would have been the same if it had been an instrument inter vivos.

Will—Codicil—Revocation—Re-acquired Property—Republication.

WILL.—A testator (before the Wills Act) devised two freehold messuages to his wife, who pre-deceased him, for life, and after her death to E, in fee, to whom he also gave certain legacies. Afterwards, by settlement on the marriage of E, he conveyed the same two messuages to the use of E.'s husband for life, remainder to E. for life, remainder to certain uses which did not take effect, with ultimate remainder to his own right heirs. Afterwards, by codicil (also before the Wills Act), reciting the provision made for E, by the settlement, he revoked the legacies, and in other respects, except as therein mentioned, confirmed his will. By the death of E. and her husband (after the testator), leaving no issue, the ultimate remainder to the testator's right heirs took effect in possession:—Held, following Jackson v. Hurlock (2 Eden, 263) that the specific devise in the will was revived by the codicil, and passed the re-acquired fee.

SPECIAL CASE. The material facts were as follows.

David Morgan, late of the parish of St. Mary, Haverfordwest, Esq., made his will, dated the 20th of August, 1821, duly executed and attested as by law then required for passing freehold estates of inheritance by devise, and thereby he devised all his real estates unto his wife, Martha Morgan (who predeceased him), and after her decease he gave and devised two messuages or dwelling-houses therein described unto his niece, Elizabeth Lloyd, her heirs and assigns for ever. The will contained a residuary devise to certain persons, to the uses and upon the trusts to be thereinafter declared, but no uses or trusts, except as to certain parts of the property, ever were declared; and it also contained divers bequests of and concerning his personal estate, including a legacy of 1,000*l.* to his said niece, Elizabeth Lloyd. The testator made a codicil on the 9th of November, 1832, not affecting the devise or bequest to Elizabeth Lloyd.

By an indenture of settlement, dated the 5th of April, 1823, the testator, in consideration of the marriage then intended and shortly afterwards solemnized between James William James and the said Elizabeth Lloyd, and in consideration of his natural love for his niece, the said Elizabeth Lloyd, and for increasing her portion, granted the two messuages therein described, situated in Dew Street, in the said parish of St. Mary, Haverfordwest (being the same two messuages as the testator had by his said will devised to his said niece Elizabeth Lloyd as aforesaid), unto Thomas Lloyd, his heirs and assigns, to the use (after the solemnization of the said intended marriage) of him the said David Morgan and his assigns for his life, with remainder to the use of the said James William James for his life, with remainder to the use of the said Elizabeth Lloyd, if she should survive the said James William James, for her life, with remainder to the use of the issue of the said intended marriage as therein expressed, with remainder to the use of the right heirs of the said David Morgan for ever.

The said testator, David Morgan, afterwards made a second codicil to his said will, dated the 6th of May, 1826, which, after making certain alterations in his said will, proceeded as follows: "And whereas I have by my said will directed the sum of 1,000*l.*, other part of the residue of my personal estate, to be paid unto my niece Elizabeth Lloyd, now Elizabeth James, the wife of, &c., to whom I gave and bequeathed the same, now since [upon?] the marriage of my said niece Elizabeth James I have already settled certain real and personal estates to certain uses expressed in the settlement made upon the said marriage, I hereby revoke and make void the last-mentioned direction and bequest;" and, after varying certain other of the legacies given by his said will, the said codicil concluded as follows: "And lastly, I do hereby ratify and confirm my said will, and all devises and bequests, matters and things therein mentioned and contained, excepting so far as the same is or are by my said former codicil revoked, altered or varied, and also my said former codicil and all devises and bequests, matters or things therein mentioned or contained, so far as my said will and former codicil respectively are not hereby or herein revoked, altered or varied."

The testator died on the 11th of May, 1826, and his said will and codicils were duly proved in 1832.

There was issue of the marriage of the said James William James and Elizabeth, his wife, one child only, a daughter, who died in her parent's lifetime, an infant and unmarried.

Elizabeth died on the 23rd of March, 1865, and her husband on the 7th of December in the same year.

The ultimate remainder or reversion in the two messuages in Dew Street, to which the testator was entitled under the settlement of 1823, having thus taken effect in possession, the question now to be decided was, whether it passed to the testator's right heirs as in case of intestacy, or to the right heirs of Elizabeth James under the will as revived by the codicil.

Mr. Kay and Mr. Freeling, for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the will of David Morgan Lloyd, the heir-at-law of Elizabeth James, relied on Jackson v. Hurlock (2 Eden, 263), and commented on and distinguished the case of Cowper v. Mantell (22 Beav. 228).

Mr. F. J. Wood, for the defendants claiming under the will of William Morgan, the heir-at-law of the testator.

JAMES, V.C., said he must follow the decision in Jackson v. Hurlock, and hold that the codicil operated as a republication of the will, and passed the reversion.

Will—Construction—Gift to a Legatee "absolutely," trusting she would carry out Testator's Wishes verbally communicated to her—Beneficial Gift.

WILL.—A testator, by his will, gave his real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust to sell the same, and after payment of his debts, &c., to pay the same, and he thereby gave and bequeathed the same, to D. I. (to whom he was engaged to be married), "absolutely, trusting she would carry out his wishes with regard to the same, with which she was fully acquainted." Shortly before the date of his will the testator had verbally expressed to D. I. his wish that she should make certain gifts out of the property to be bequeathed to her, and she had afterwards written down his wishes for her own use, but not in the testator's presence:— Held, that D. I. took the property beneficially, but subject in part to the wishes which the testator had expressed to her, and as to which she had bound herself.

This was the further consideration of a suit for the execution of the trusts of the will of General de Pontes, and for the administration of his estate and effects.

The testator, by his will, dated the 21st of February, 1865, devised and bequeathed all his estates and effects, real and personal, to E. C. Sullivan, the wife of Major-General Sullivan, D. Macloughlin, and F. T. Robins, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, "upon trust," as soon as conveniently might be after his decease, to sell and convert into money all such parts thereof as should not consist of money, in such manner and subject to such conditions as they should think proper; and he declared that the receipts of the trustees of that his will should be sufficient discharges for the purchase and all other moneys payable to them. And the said testator proceeded as follows: "I direct that the moneys arising from the said sale, and otherwise forming or representing my estate and effects, after payment of my just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and the expenses of carrying out the trusts of this my will, shall be paid by my said trustees, and I hereby give and bequeath the same to Emblyn D'Arcy Irvine, of Ryde, in the Isle of Wight, widow, absolutely trusting that she will carry out my wishes with regard to the same, with which she is fully acquainted;" and the said testator appointed the said Mrs. Sullivan, D. Macloughlin and T. F. Robins, executors of his said will.

The testator died on the 30th of March, 1865, and his said will was duly proved by his executors. Shortly before the date of his will the testator had expressed to the plaintiff Mrs. Emblyn D'Arcy Irvine, to whom he had for upwards of four years been engaged to be married, his wish that she would out of the property which he would leave to her make certain gifts of sums of money, pictures, plate and jewellery to certain friends, relatives and dependents, including 1,000*l.* to each of his three executors. A few days after the date of the said will, the testator, at Mrs. D'Arcy Irvine's request, repeated to her his wishes, and she then, at her own instance, and for her own use only, wrote them down on paper, but not in the testator's presence, nor was the memorandum shewn to him.

The testator was a native of France, and a general in the French service, but he had obtained a certificate of naturalization as an English subject, and at the time of his death was the owner of an estate at Eyford, in Gloucestershire, and other lands and immovable property, as also of certain movable property in England and of movable and immovable property in France. But at the time of his death the domicil of the testator was in France, and previously to this suit proceedings had been taken in the French Courts by the testator's next-of-kin for the purpose of having the testator's will to the plaintiff declared void according to the law of France. The result of these proceedings had been a decree in the plaintiff's favour, and accordingly the Chief Clerk, [redacted] in this suit, certified that Mrs. Irvine was absolutely entitle[redacted] personal property. Hence the question now to be determined related solely to the testator's real estate in England. The plaintiff contended that under the gift in the will she was beneficially entitled to the testator's residuary estate. On the other hand, the co-heirs of the testator claimed the property by virtue of a resulting trust in their favour.

Mr. Willcock, Mr. Amphlett and Mr. Law, for the plaintiff.—No valid trust was created, and the plaintiff is absolutely and beneficially entitled to the whole estate—Heptinstall v. Gott (2 Jo. & H. 449; 31 L. J. Ch. 776); Mcredith v. Heneage (1 Sim. 542: and on appeal to the House of Lords, 1 Sim. 561); Sale v. Moore (1 Sim. 534, 540); Podmore v. Gunning (7 Sim. 644; 5 L. J. Ch. 366); M'Cormick v. Grogan (L. R. 4 Ir. Ap. 82); Bardswell v. Bardswell (9 Sim. 319; 7 L. J. Ch. 268); Wood v. Cox (2 Myl. & Cr. 684); Clarke v. Hilton (L. R. 2 Eq. 810); Dawson v. Clark (15 Ves. 409); King v. Denison (1 Ves. & B. 260); Briggs v. Penny (3 Mac. & G. 546; 21 L. J. Ch. 265); Bernard v. Minshull (Johns. 276, 292; 28 L. J. Ch. 649); Fenton v. Hankins (9 W. R. 300); Morice v. the Bishop of Durham (10 Ves. 252); Webb v. Woods (2 Sim. N.S. 267; 21 L. J. Ch. 625). If there is a presumption in favour of the heirs-at-law, evidence is admissible to disprove it—Mallabar v. Mallabar (Ca. temp. Talb. p. 79); Hall v. Hill (1 Dru. & War. 94). The question of the admittance of parol evidence in a case like the present has never arisen and been argued. The testator has spoken of his trustees in another part of his will, and evidently meant to distinguish between those who were named by him as trustees to carry into execution the purposes of his will, and the plaintiff whom he intended to benefit.—They also referred to Dobson v. Bowness (37 L. J. Ch. 309; L. R. 5 Eq. 404).

Mr. Mackeson and Mr. T. Stephens, for the defendant Robins.—You cannot import into the will words which are not part of it—Baker v. Mosley (12 Jur. 740). "Absolutely" may perhaps be read together with "trusting," in the sense of "implicitly trusting."

Mr. Little and Mr. Caldecott, for Dr. Macloughlin.—There was an understanding in the nature of a contract between the testator and Mrs. Irvine, and she is bound by the obligation of that contract. We say this is the case of Wood v. Cox, ubi supra. The heirs-at-law say it is the case of Briggs v. Penny, ubi supra.

Mr. Roupell, for General and Mrs. Sullivan, said they had confidence in the honour of the plaintiff, and declined to argue the question against her.

Mr. Kay, Mr. Fry and Mr. Busk, for the testator's heirs-at-law, argued that the will of the testator shewed that he intended the whole of his property given to the plaintiff to be affected by some trust, but that trust had not been sufficiently declared, and failed on that account. That fact, however, could not entitle the plaintiff to retain the property beneficially, but she was bound in conscience to take it upon some trust, which if not declared by the testator would be a resulting trust for the heirs-at-law, who not being bound in conscience by any expressed trust could hold it for their own benefit. They distinguished from this case the authorities cited on behalf of the plaintiff, and also cited the following—Stubbs v. Sargon (2 Kay, 255, and 3 Myl. & Cr. 507; 6 L. J. Ch. 254: and 7 L. J. Ch. 95); The Corporation of Gloucester v. Wood (3 Hare, 131); Barrs v. Fewkes (2 Hem. & M. 60; 32 L. J. Ch. 52); Saltmarsh v. Barrett (3 De Gex, F. & J. 30; 30 L. J. Ch. 853).

Mr. Willcock having, in reply to a question by the Vice Chancellor, intimated that the plaintiff intended to carry out the testator's wishes as stated in the paper she had written, and that he had no wish to address in reply any argument to the Court against the persons entitled under that paper:

JAMES, V.C. (without calling for a reply) said, I do not think that I should derive any aid if I took further time to consider this case, which I feel to be a case just balanced between the principles laid down in two of the cases which have been cited; but on the best consideration I am able to give to the matter, I have come to the conclusion that this is not governed by Briggs v. Penny, but that it is governed by those two cases of Bernard v. Minshull and Wood v. Cox, which seem to me to mark the distinction on the one side and the other.

If the words here amounted on a fair construction to what was said in Briggs v. Penny,—if it was a gift to Emblyn D'Arcy Irvine, of Ryde, in the Isle of Wight, widow, "upon trust to carry out my wishes with regard to the same, with which she is fully acquainted,"—if that had been the true construction, I should hold it would be utterly impossible that she could take anything beneficially; and then the wishes not being manifested in such a way as that this Court can take notice of them, the trust would have failed, for the benefit of the heir-at-law. The question is, whether that is the true meaning of this will. There is an observation of Vice Chancellor Wood, in Bernard v. Minshull, which I think it may be as well to repeat: "In other words, these canons of construction are valuable as affording a general rule by which the Court is to be guided in the absence of particular expressions in the will; but in the construction of every will the whole instrument must be carefully weighed and considered." In truth, in that case of Briggs v. Penny, the whole instrument was carefully weighed and considered, and it is impossible not to see that whatever may be the words in which part of that judgment is couched, the Court was more influenced by the fact that Miss Penny's beneficial interest was marked by the two legacies. The two legacies there given to her, one of 2,000*l*. in her character of legatee, and 3,000*l*. in her character of executrix, were considered as marking the extent of her beneficial interest. The Court seemed to me very readily to come to the conclusion that she was a trustee, and nothing but a trustee, but a trustee for the purpose of giving effect to those wishes, that was to say, that it was for the purpose of the gift to her.

Then, in the case of Wood v. Cox, on the contrary, the Lord Chancellor came to the conclusion that that was not the purpose of the gift to Sir George Cox, but that the words of the gift to him, "for his own use and benefit, trusting and wholly confiding in his honour that he will act in strict conformity to my wishes," were capable of being reconciled by reading "trusting" as being the imposition of a duty upon him; that he took the thing beneficially, but subject in that case to a trust which was limited to the extent of the wishes which the testator had communicated to Sir George Cox.

It appears to me that there are some points of singular resemblance between the case of Wood v. Cox and the case now before me. In the first place, there was there a gift to the executors, and then there being a gift to executors and trustees that was altered to a gift to one of them, and then to somebody else as the legatee, and the Lord Chancellor considered that very strong as shewing that the legatee was not made by him a trustee simpliciter, because supposing he was a trustee simpliciter, it would have been the simplest thing in the world to have confided that same trust to the executors whom he appointed trustees. Here the testator appoints three persons as trustees, and having appointed those three persons trustees for every executorship purpose, except that of ascertaining the net residue, giving them the power of selling his estate, and all the powers and authorities which by law are considered to be conferred upon and given to executors and trustees,—having given them all those powers, he then says, "I direct the net proceeds of my estate" (that is the substance of it) "to be given to Mrs. Emblyn D'Arcy Irvine." That seems to me to be even stronger than the case of Wood v. Cox. One can hardly conceive why she should have been selected as trustee, if trust was the purpose which the testator had in view in his will. Then I think it is very difficult to imagine, having regard to the admitted relationship between the testator and Mrs. D'Arcy Irvine, which is proved and not denied, and which is a thing that one can look at in construing a will, namely, that, under the circumstances in which they were placed, she was a person as to whom he had some motives of bounty; it is very difficult to believe that he merely meant to make her a bare trustee, without giving her any beneficial interest whatever. That is a strong circumstance.

Digitized by Google

Then I think it is also a very strong circumstance here that the word "absolutely" has been introduced, because it is, "I direct that the money shall be paid by my said trustees." It is not merely "shall be paid by my trustees to Mrs. Emblyn D'Arcy Irvine, of Ryde, in the Isle of Wight, widow," but it is, "shall be paid by my said trustees to her, trusting that she will carry out my wishes." Then he introduces emphatically the words, "And I hereby give and bequeath the same to her absolutely." Of course the words "absolutely" may mean, as was very well suggested by Mr. Kay and Mr. Fry, extent of interest, that is to say, to the entire unlimited interest. It may mean that, but it may mean something a great deal more; and I think the natural grammatical meaning of the word "absolutely" is unfettered and unlimited. It implies both the words which occur in Meredith v. Heneage (1 Sim. 542, 561), that it is unlimited in point of estate, and unfettered in respect of any condition or trust. The word "absolutely" does naturally imply both those words. That being so, I think I am following the cases which come nearer to this in holding that the gift was a gift to Mrs. D'Arcy Irvine absolutely in the sense that she took it beneficially, but not, as was expressed by the Lord Chancellor in Wood v. Cox, absolutely with regard to the entire property, but subject, so far as the testator had made it subject, in part to the wishes which he had expressed to her, and as to which she had bound herself.

That being the conclusion I have arrived at, I must declare that there was a good gift to Mrs. D'Arcy Irvine of the net residue of the estate, but subject to the performance of the wishes communicated to her by the testator, and set out in the bill. The costs of all parties must come out of the estate.

Following Wood v. Cox, the Vice Chancellor held, that the charges on Mrs. D'Arcy Irvine's legacy were to be treated as legacies carrying interest at 4*l.* per cent. from the expiration of one year after the death of the testator.

Company—Winding-up—Losses occasioned by Misconduct of Directors—False Balance-sheets—Dividends improperly Declared—Loan to Directors.

COMPANY.—The deed of settlement of a banking company provided that if at any time the losses of the company should have exhausted the whole of the surplus fund and also one-fourth of the paid-up capital of the company, the directors should, as soon as possible, call a special general meeting of the proprietors, and submit to it a full statement of the affairs of the company; and if it should appear at such meeting that the losses of the company had exhausted the surplus fund and also one-fourth of the paid-up capital, the company was to be dissolved. Losses having been incurred to the extent of more than one-fourth of the paid-up capital, a special meeting was called, in 1842, at which it was resolved that the company should go on, and from that time till 1863 the company continued to be carried on, the directors issuing favourable balance- sheets and declaring dividends. Further capital was lost, but no meeting was called again, and when the company was wound up, in 1863, the debts very considerably exceeded the assets. Upon a bill filed by the official liquidator, seeking to make the directors liable for the losses subsequently incurred, it was held (reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls*), that as the shareholders were aware of the position of affairs when it was resolved to continue the bank the directors were not liable for not calling another meeting and stopping the concern.*

The bill also sought to charge the directors with the loss sustained by allowing one of themselves to overdraw his account:—Held (reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls*) that as this was within the powers conferred on the directors by the deed of settlement they were not liable, and the bill was dismissed without costs.*

This was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, reported 37 L. J. Ch. 582, where the facts of the case are fully stated.

The suit was instituted by the official liquidator of the Herefordshire Banking Company, suing on behalf of the company against the directors and representatives of deceased directors of the company, to recover damages for losses occasioned to the company by the misconduct of the directors, such misconduct consisting of the following particulars:

First, that they had not, in accordance with the 108th clause of the deed of settlement,[1] proceeded to wind up the company, the whole of the surplus fund and one-fourth of the paid-up capital of the company having been lost in 1846, and the loss having gone on increasing until the winding-up of the company.

Secondly, that from 1846 until the winding-up of the company the directors had annually presented to the shareholders false reports of the progress and proceedings of the company and false balance-sheets; that they had recommended the declaration of dividends upon repeated false statements that profits had been earned when no profits had been really made; that they had printed and circulated false balance-sheets among the shareholders, purporting to be issued under the 90th clause of the deed of settlement, and that many persons had been induced by such false reports and balance-sheets to become members of the company; and dividends amounting to upwards of 14,000*l.* had been paid out of capital.

And thirdly, that they had allowed Mr. Higgins (formerly one of the directors) to overdraw his account by upwards of 8,000*l.*, in violation of the 53rd clause in the settlement, and all this money had been lost by the death of Mr. Higgins insolvent.

The defendants were, 1. Messrs. Grayston and Sowdon, who were directors in 1846 and from that time to the winding-up of the company, Mr. Sowdon having been appointed managing director in 1850. 2. The representatives of Mr. Crowther, who was appointed a director in 1849, and had died since the winding-up; the representatives of Mr. Smeeton, who was appointed a director in 1855, and had also died since the winding-up; and the representatives of Mr. Powell, a director from 1846 to 1856; and of Mr. Edwards, a director from 1846 to 1851.

The bill prayed that the damage caused to the company and the shareholders, by the continuance of the business of the company after it ought to have been wound up under the 108th clause of the deed of settlement, might be ascertained; that an account of the dividends declared since 1846, with interest at 5*l.* per cent., might be taken; that the damages caused by allowing directors and others to overdraw their accounts to an undue extent, by allowing bad debts to remain so long outstanding that they became irrecoverable, by publication of false reports and balance-sheets, and by all other breaches of trust committed by the directors, might be assessed; and that it might be declared that Grayston and Sowdon, and the estates of Crowther, Smeeton, Powell and Edward were jointly and severally liable to make good the amount of such damage, and of the dividends so distributed.

(1) The 108th clause provided, that if at any time the losses of the company should have exhausted the whole of the surplus fund and also one-fourth of the paid-up capital of the company, the directors should as soon as possible call a special general meeting of the proprietors, and submit to it a full statement of the affairs of the company; and if it should appear at such meeting that the losses of the company had exhausted the surplus fund, and also one-fourth of the paid-up capital, the chairman was to declare the company dissolved, and it was to be dissolved accordingly.

The Master of the Rolls held that the defendants could not, in a suit instituted by the official liquidator, be made responsible for issuing false balance-sheets and false reports of the affairs of the company, or for paying dividends improperly, for that the injury done by these acts was to individual shareholders, and in different degrees, and did not affect the whole body of shareholders. He held, however, that they were liable in such a suit for losses occasioned by continuing the business after the surplus fund and one-fourth of the paid-up capital had been lost, and also for the loss occasioned by allowing Mr. Higgins to overdraw his account; and that the estates of the deceased directors were liable to make good such losses, as no distinction could in that respect be drawn between the position of directors and that of ordinary trustees, and the maxim of actio personalis moritur cum persona did not apply.

The executors of Crowther and of Smeeton appealed.

The Lord Chancellor (Feb. 11).—This case is one which has given me considerable anxiety, because the bill is in itself essentially a bill of first impressions, at least in this country, there being no case at all similar to it except the case of The Western Bank of Scotland v. Baird, and I have had to consider, first, how far the decree of the Master of the Rolls could stand under any circumstances, and, secondly, whether any other decree could be made which would be adequate to the exigencies of the case.

Now, I confess, I have not been much troubled with the technical difficulties that have been raised, either on the ground that this banking company is not of that class called a registered company, or that Mr. Turquand is suing as the official liquidator on behalf of the company. Those are difficulties which I think the Court would at all times struggle to overcome, and which I should have little difficulty in overcoming. The real substance of the case goes, first, to the relief sought, and the grounds upon which that relief is asked; secondly, the form of the decree which the Master of the Rolls has made; and lastly, to whether or not there could under the circumstances of the case be any relief given in a suit of this description.

I have had great difficulty in ascertaining exactly on what ground the bill is placed, whether it was meant to be founded on fraud or negligence, or both together; nor did I know exactly whether the relief asked was simply the recovery of the money lost by the neglect of the directors to inform the shareholders when one-fourth of the capital was exhausted, so as to enable them to withdraw the remaining three-fourths of the capital, or whether it was asked on the ground of misrepresentation, which had induced the parties to become shareholders, or whether it was on the ground also of capital having been paid away as dividend. But it seems to me, in substance, that the bill stands more on neglect or default than on anything else. I think I must treat the bill as proceeding on the neglect of the directors to comply with the 108th section of the company's deed, which directed them, when one-fourth should have been ascertained to have been exhausted, to call a meeting of the company together and put it to them whether they desired or not that the company should proceed. It is alleged that there was a breach of that duty, that the loss was concealed from the shareholders by means of false accounts until the whole of the capital became exhausted, and there were heavy debts, amounting to 37,000*l.* when the company was wound up, occasioning considerable loss to those who had to pay those debts. Then it is said, taking a different view, that the defendants are liable for all the money they have paid in dividends, which is no doubt a somewhat singular claim, as the recipients of the dividends are the persons complaining, so that it would be saying, in effect, Pay us again that part of our capital which you paid us before in the shape of dividend. And then there was a special prayer directed, not against Mr. Higgins in particular, but against all undue advances made by directors or otherwise. All that portion of the bill is of a completely different character from that which seeks the replacing simpliciter of the capital, and the making the directors accountable for its loss; because a bill for that purpose would not be at all improper or inaccurate, although probably the same result might be obtained under a winding-up.

It was said in the argument of counsel in opening this case, that the object of the suit was to make the directors liable for breaches of trust in having in various ways fraudulently abstracted large sums from the funds of the company, and systematically neglected the provisions of the articles of association; but I do not think it was intended to impute personal fraud in the matter, or to say that the directors in any way benefited themselves, whatever may have been their conduct towards the shareholders. The whole scheme of the bill is to represent a series of balance-sheets annually laid before the company at their general meetings, in which were contained false entries misleading the whole of the shareholders into a belief in the prosperity of the company, when it was in fact failing, and hiding from them the fact that one-half of the capital had been exhausted together with the surplus funds. In the 15th paragraph of the bill I find this charge: "The trial balance-sheet for the year 1846 has been discovered among the papers of the company, and from that it appears, as the fact is, that the first item of assets on the credit side of the balance-sheet for 1846, namely, the current account, 83,163*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.*, is made up by including in one aggregate sum, good, doubtful, and bad debts of the company, at their full amount, without distinction. Amongst other sums forming part of the said item is a sum of 3,015*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.*, which is taken from the above-mentioned account, called the 'bad and doubtful debt account,' in the current account ledger of the company, and which sum is fraudulently treated as an asset."—That is the single instance in which the word occurs. I think the Master of the Rolls has in truth reduced the objects of the bill to two main subjects, viz., the non-stoppage of the bank at the time when the loss accrued of one-fourth of the capital, and the particular debt to Mr. Higgins, which I keep apart as a separate transaction.

I entirely concur with his Lordship's judgment on all that part of the case in which he rejected the claim to dividends and the interest upon them. It is totally impossible in this Court that persons who must be taken to have been the receivers of that money out of capital should be able to sustain a special demand in respect of that which they have so improperly received because it was represented as something which it was not.

The case, then, is reduced to this simple breach of engagement to the shareholders in not stopping under the 108th clause when they should have done so, and the Master of the Rolls has considered it immaterial at what date that breach may have occurred, because, although it is alleged to have occurred in 1846, before either Mr. Smeaton or Mr. Crowther (whose executors are appellants) had become a director, he conceived it to be a continuing breach of trust, rendering them liable for all the losses that had been incurred in respect of non-compliance with the 108th clause.

It is very important, first, to see what are the exact provisions of the deed, and what the transaction was in 1841 and 1842. In the first place, the 108th clause, with which we have mainly to deal in this case, provides that when the losses shall have exhausted the whole of the surplus fund and also the one-fourth of the actual paid-up capital, without regard to amount, the directors of the company "shall as soon as possible after the above-mentioned state of the said company shall have become known to them, call a special general meeting of the proprietors or shareholders." I quite go with the Master of the Rolls in the view he has taken, namely, that if there was nothing special in the case beyond the mere circumstance of the loss having occurred, and the directors having ascertained that loss, and then having reduced their capital by a certain amount, the new business would be carried on with reference to the altered state of circumstances upon the same principles, unless something or other had appeared to the contrary which rendered that impossible or impracticable; and it might be taken that the directors would still be under an obligation, if the one-fourth of the capital was wasted with their knowledge, to call together a meeting of shareholders. But a great deal more appears with reference to the meeting in 1842 and the anterior meetings, than the simple fact of the reduction of the capital which then took place to the extent of one-fifth; because it is plain, when we come to consider the whole of the balance-sheets, that it was known distinctly to the company at that time, and known beyond all possibility of doubt, that the one-fourth of their capital was gone. When you have the facts before you that the shareholders knew everything that it was necessary for them to know, and exercised a judgment on that point, and agreed to receive a dividend at 4*l.* per cent., you cannot say, after they agreed to go on with the capital diminished to below the one-fourth, that the directors are liable under the 108th section for not stopping the company immediately. It is the secret, I am afraid of all these cases, that no shareholder will inquire, for fear a dividend should not be forthcoming, and they take care after that time never again to inquire, and this will be found to be the key to the whole of this history.

Now, I shall state in the strongest manner against the directors the case that arises on behalf of the shareholders. The directors have the sole control of the concern, and the sole management of the books. Nobody is to examine the books in any manner besides themselves, unless it be in the course prescribed in the deed, which does not wholly leave the shareholders defenceless, but exposes them to the impossibility of correcting on their own knowledge, and without a process which very few shareholders like to resort to, any misrepresentation or misstatement which may be made; because the shareholders are to have no access to the books, except such as may be produced at the general meeting. They have only this safeguard, that it is competent to any shareholder to move that there should be a committee of inquiry; and something of that kind seems to have taken place in the early part of the history of the concern, when, in 1836, although dividends had been paid, somehow or other it must have oozed out that matters were not so comfortable as they were represented to be, and accordingly there was an examination into the affairs of the company determined upon. A very large general meeting took place on the 3rd of June, 1840, specially convened for the purpose of looking into the whole affairs of the company, and receiving a report made by a gentleman appointed to investigate. The auditors found that the preliminary account, which was stated in January to amount to 8,962*l.*, was spent as follows: 2,500*l.* in the purchase of a business at Hereford, which does not seem to have turned out very prosperous, certain sums in acquiring the goodwill of a house of business, and other sums applied to current expenses for different purposes. Then they go into an acount of the net profits, and say, in substance, "There was only one year in which an honest dividend could properly be paid; you have nevertheless had profits divided for a series of years." They then give an account of the bad debts, which they say amount to 6,517*l.*, and which, added to the capital taken to make up the yearly dividends, made a sum of 8,629*l.*, the then present loss of the company. Nothing can be more fair and open than the whole statement made by the auditors of every bad and doubtful debt upon full inquiry and examination. That being so, we come to the meeting in February, 1841. On the 5th of February a report was made, and the directors submitted to the shareholders a statement of the affairs of the bank. "They thought it right to inform such as were not present at the special general meeting held in June last, for the purpose of receiving the auditor's report and on other affairs, that it was then resolved that the company's affairs and accounts be again investigated and examined, for the purpose of testing the accuracy of the report then read, and they have now the satisfaction of informing the proprietors that the same has been certified to be correct in every respect." Then they say they have appointed Mr. Hastings as manager, and continue: "The transactions of this company being now reduced to the establishment at Hereford, and the Leominster and Evesham branches, the directors have to call the attention of the shareholders to the circumstance of their being able materially to lessen the amount of expenditure; and by the business being less divided, the manager will have that superintendence and constant vigilance over the whole which is extremely desirable." They further say, "It will appear by these accounts that the directors are not in a situation to pay bona fide dividends"—that is a very proper statement to make—"they have therefore passed the whole of the profits now realized to a fund for reduction of the debts and preliminary expenses." That is quite right. They see that the preliminary expenses, instead of being an asset, are nothing at all. They have been paid, and they must be provided for. It forms no longer a part of the capital of the company, and they therefore wish to realize a fund for the reduction of the debts and preliminary expenses, and hope by so doing and pursuing the policy which has guided their management since the last meeting, ultimately to realize those expectations of profit which it is desirable they should obtain,—though we find even then a gentleman who does not like being paid no dividend proposes a dividend of 4*l.* per cent. for the past half-year. Then came the important meeting of the 2nd of February, 1842. At that meeting the report of the directors was read. It states: "The directors have much pleasure in meeting the shareholders at the fifth annual meeting, and in submitting to them the usual balance-sheets and profit and loss statements, which are now laid upon the table for their inspection. The proprietors are reminded that a very considerable portion of the bank's capital has been expended in its formation, which, in a limited capital, may be considered excessive, and has tended much to paralyze the exertions of the directors." With respect to the preliminary expenses, they give the goodwill of the business at 4,000*l.*, and a number of other items, the total being 9,872*l.* Then they say, "After a careful estimate of the bad and doubtful debts (which have been reduced since last meeting, 1,768*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.*) they are found to be 3,635*l.*, making with the preliminary expenses a total of 13,507*l.*" I observe that 13,507*l.* is within a few hundred pounds, one-fourth of the capital then paid up. They continue: "The directors therefore recommend to the proprietors to consent to a positive reduction of an amount equal to 2*l.* 10*s.* per share from the capital stock of the bank, for the purpose of clearing off the bad debts and a portion of the preliminary expenses. The directors have to report that the profits upon the business of the bank for the past year, after deducting the current expenditure, amount to 1,969*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* They feel thus justified in recommending a dividend of 4*l.* per cent., after the rate of 8*s.* per share, and they recommend the striking off the 2*l.* 10*s.* paid in the interval." The report concludes by congratulating the proprietary upon the very great progress the bank had made. Then comes this account, which represents the preliminary expenses of 9,872*l.*, and they propose that the 2*l.* 10*s.* which has been raised should be applied in paying off part of the bad debts and part of the preliminary expenses. The very next year it appeared that, although there was an attempt at reduction and a good deal of the preliminary expenses had been cleared off, there still remained 6,000*l.* So it went on for several years, until it was a good deal reduced, and the bank got into a somewhat better condition. The present shareholders must be taken to know all that the original shareholders knew, and therefore they must have been perfectly well aware while going on with these dividends at 4*l.* per cent. that, in effect, if the company had been wound up the preliminary expenses could not have been provided for. Therefore, there being something considerably over one-fourth gone at that time, it seems to me that from that moment these gentlemen must be taken to know what was done, and cannot go back afterwards and fix those directors who have come in at a subsequent period with a continuance of that which, with the knowledge and sanction of the shareholders, had been already done.

However, the case does not quite rest there as regards the position of these directors and their shareholders. The two great heads of what are called false charges in all the subsequent reports are these: the one of the past-due bills, in respect of which it is said that they were all credited with their full value, though it was well known the full value could not be recovered, and the purchase of shares in the company by the company itself. But that was perfectly legitimate according to the provisions of the deed. Whether it was wise and prudent is not for me to say, but there are two express provisions in the deed—one that the company may deal with all things, including the shares of the company, and another, that the investments to be made by the company of their capital are to be, among other things, in shares of the company. This is a clear and express provision. Further than that, in the report of 1841, there is an express entry of 12,000*l.* paid in the purchase of shares. Again, I say, therefore the shareholders knew that the directors were doing what they were authorized by the deed to do. It would have been better undoubtedly if that had been brought out in each balance-sheet, but it was thought, I suppose, that the outside world would not like to know that the company was dealing with its own shares, as that would not give very great confidence in the bank. They knew there was that power, and had moreover the safeguard of the register, because it is sworn distinctly that the register was open to the shareholders. They knew, on the one hand, by the actual balance-sheet, that shares had been purchased to the extent of 12,000*l.* at that time, and ultimately to a much larger extent. 2,900 shares, or more than half of the whole shares of the company, were afterwards bought by the company itself. That was a fact which the shareholders were perfectly capable of ascertaining for themselves whenever they pleased.

As regards the past-due bills, it is only just to say, on the part of some of the directors, although not on the part of those who were actually engaged in making out the accounts, that it would not be so easy altogether to fix them with wilful default for not ascertaining whether the past-due bills were recoverable or not, or for not ascertaining whether the debts were recoverable or not, though there might be cases so palpable, such as bankruptcy or the like, as would make it impossible to put down a debt as an asset which could not by any possibility be recovered; or you might fix the directors with knowledge wherever they have entered a debt in the list of bad debts, and say they themselves treated it as a bad debt, and they ought not to have introduced it as an asset.

The main feature of the case is as to whether or not, under the 108th section of the deed, the directors are now liable in respect of any loss accruing by reason of their not having stopped the concern at that time. Upon looking carefully through the evidence, it appears to me that, with the fullest knowledge on the part of the shareholders, the shareholders persisted in being paid dividends when they knew from the accounts laid before them that more than a fourth of the capital must have been exhausted, because the preliminary expenses must be deducted entirely from the assets. In that state of circumstances, it is impossible to say that the parties have not agreed to waive the provision made by the 108th section. Had it not been so, I confess, it appears to me that the whole matter would be surrounded with the greatest difficulty, because it is stated that all these things were done before 1846—before Smeeton became a director—and that at that time nearly the whole of the capital was exhausted. It is somewhat difficult to fix a director who came in after Smeeton, when nearly the whole of the capital was gone, with the full amount of the capital, because he did not take some proceedings against his co-directors in order to enforce the replacing of the capital. To do that you would have required him to be fixed not only with knowledge of the 108th section of the deed, but also with the knowledge of the state of the accounts when he joined the company. He comes into the concern, seeing a certain state of accounts which have been from year to year adopted by the shareholders, with the statements in them of this heavy outstanding item of preliminary expenses. It is said that in that state of circumstances he stands exactly in the position of a trustee, who, finding that there is a trust fund which ought to be in his hands, does not take steps to recover that trust fund and bring it back to the trust. I should have found great difficulty even upon that view of the question. There is an item of that loss supposed to have been incurred by the company of 37,000*l.* over and above the capital. A loss so attempted to be fixed upon the directors would again be a matter of much greater difficulty than the question of replacing the fund, because I am bound to say, after the argument I have heard, that I am far from being satisfied that that is a loss which could be recovered by any such proceeding as is now before me, not on the technical grounds only, but on really substantial grounds. A trustee may well be fixed with the detriment that is done to the estate in his possession. He may be fixed also with the duty of recovering an asset for which he was once responsible but which somebody else had wasted, or which he had made himself responsible for by dealing with it and not taking steps to get it in. I know no instance whatever of a trustee being made responsible in the fashion which is here attempted, because being a trustee for a number of persons who have invested their capital in a business, certain losses are incurred by them owing to their names having been kept longer in the concern than he had any right to keep their names so engaged; and they have thereby been exposed to the general creditors who have forced them to pay up in respect of that loss. That appears to me to be distinctly a loss which would be recoverable in an action at law. How far it would be so the Lord Justice Clerk seems to have had some doubt in the case I have mentioned of The Western Bank of Scotland, because he thinks the loss rather a remote one, which there might be considerable difficulty in establishing. I do not deal with that question at all, and I pronounce no opinion upon it. It appears to me that each shareholder must recover for himself at law, and would be in the position in which the Master of the Rolls considers Mr. Skey's case to be, with reference to any loss he may have incurred by purchasing shares in consequence of a false representation. Every person's case would be a separate case, and no action could be brought until the loss was actually ascertained. A man who paid no part of the contribution could bring no action until he paid it. Each man would have to bring his action when the damage accrued, in respect of the damage. It is not a concern in which the whole body of the shareholders can call upon the directors to pay into the funds of the concern that sum which is the amount of the loss occasioned by their continuing too long in the business in which they had been engaged. It occurred to me that it was difficult to imagine an exact example of a case likely to occur independently of joint-stock companies. It does not occur with regard to executors who keep their testator's assets in a business, because if he has given them his sanction to employ a portion of his assets, the estate is only liable for the amount so employed, and the executor remains personally liable to outside creditors, who have no claim on the assets of the testator beyond the amount lawfully employed in the business. It appears to me, therefore, in every view, that the difficulties which beset the case would have been very considerable if I had got beyond the first difficulty. On the one hand the directors are to be fixed with all the knowledge of what took place previously to their entering into the contract; and on the other hand, the shareholders must be taken to know all that the previous shareholders knew, and they cannot recover that which the previous shareholders could not have recovered against the directors. I cannot conceive that upon a bill filed in 1844, if there had been this loss, they could have succeeded in making the directors responsible. I have had no difficulty in treating the directors as trustes so far as the trust fund goes. Call them agents, or by whatever name you like, they are trustees for the shareholders to the extent of all the assets committed to their charge; and in respect of those assets they must be made liable to account. It is satisfactory to find that really in no sense is fraud alleged as shewing that any single step taken by the directors has been taken with a fraudulent view to their own benefit, or for their own purposes, or otherwise than for the purpose, as they thought, of aiding the prosperity of their company, however incorrect the course pursued must be taken to have been. My belief is that in that respect they had a clever, and somewhat unscrupulous, agent who seems to have done what he thought best, and no doubt with the motive of doing his best for the company. He, however, seems to have done a great many acts which he ought never to have done; but he kept up the delusion in the minds of the directors, and I am sorry to say induced them to do what they were not entitled to do.

I must now deal with Higgins's case, which is a separate matter. His case is stated in a very perfunctory manner as a part of the general case of misrepresentation. It is only in two passages of the bill that he is mentioned at all. The first is where it is said William Higgins, who had for some time been a director, was permitted by the other directors of the bank to become indebted to the bank to an amount which appears from the accounts of the company to have been at this time 8,134*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* In June 1858, the solicitor of the company was instructed to take proceedings with reference to a portion of this debt. It appears from a resolution of the directors under date the 9th of February, 1859, that it was resolved not to accept an offer made by Higgins of 3*s.* 4*d.* in the pound. In the report from the manager of the Hay branch of the said banking company, bearing date the 4th of July, 1859, and made to the directors of the company, is the following statement: "About a twelvemonth ago, Mr. Higgins made a complete smash of it, and everything was sold off. Then William Higgins died insolvent in 1860. The debt was included as a good debt in the general item of current account in the balance-sheet presented to the shareholders at every subsequent annual meeting. No portion of this sum has he ever paid." That is the specific statement, and it comes in, in a general statement of the improper conduct of the directors in inserting bad and doubtful debts as part of the assets of the company. There is another passage in which it is referred to as follows: "A trial balance-sheet for the year 1861 has been discovered among the papers of the company, and from that it appears, as the fact is, that the first item of assets on the credit side of the balance-sheet for 1861, namely, current accounts, 117,534*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.*, is made up in the manner before stated, and includes in an aggregate sum the bad and doubtful debts owing upon the current accounts, including the 11,753*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.* so carried to 'imperative accounts,' as before shewn, and also the debt of 8,134*l.* 2*s.* 1*d.*, due from Higgins as before mentioned," and also the nominal value, at 10*l.* per share, of the shares that have been bought by the directors. That is stated exactly in the same way as every improper entry in the account. There is nothing specific beyond that averred. Nothing is said about the impropriety of lending, beyond throwing out a suggestion that money was lent by his brother directors, and therefore it was wrong in that sense. Paragraph 3. of the prayer runs thus: "That the damages caused to the said company and to the shareholders thereof by allowing directors and others to overdraw their accounts to an undue extent, and by allowing bad debts to remain so long outstanding as to become irrecoverable, by the publication of false reports and balance-sheets, and all other breaches of trust which may be shewn by the plaintiff to have been committed by the said William Crowther, Edward Smeeton, Thomas Powell, Henry Edwards, James Grafton, and Thomas Snowdon, or any one or more of them, may be assessed by this Honourable Court." Now, as regards this, it is all swept into one prayer, and nothing specific is mentioned as to Higgins, as being improper in the sense of being ultra vires. Under such circumstances, it would not have been ultra vires, but the charge is that they are to be fixed with wilful default for allowing people to overdraw to an undue extent. That is idle. They were entrusted with full powers of lending the money. It was part of the business of the concern to trust people with money, and their trusting to an undue extent is not a matter with which they can be fixed, unless there is something more than that alleged, namely, that it was done fraudulently and improperly, and not merely by a default of judgment. Whatever may have been the amount lent to anybody, however ridiculous and absurd it would seem, it is a misfortune for the company that they chose such unwise directors; but as long as they kept within the powers of the deed, I could not interfere with the discretion exercised by them. If a bill were filed to stop their lending money, the Court could not have interfered so far as to put them out of the trust, and there would be no dealing with it on that score. As regards the case of Higgins, it seems to have been assumed that it was impossible to lend money to a director. There was no such impossibility. It only required certain useful preliminaries to be gone through, namely, that there should be a vote of the board with reference to any advance to a director, and that in that voting the particular director himself should not take a part. There is no allegation in the bill or in Mr. Turquand's evidence that the precautions were not taken. It is wholly put on this, that they have no power to lend money. I really have no evidence or material before me to judge of this, nor do I think that under the circumstances of this case I can deal with it on such a bill as this, or allow upon such a shred of a case any relief to be given to the plaintiffs; the more so because it is perfectly open to them to deal with it in the winding-up; because, in the winding-up, the accounts of the directors can be taken. They may be made to account for every farthing, and for every farthing they have paid to Higgins without an order they would be liable. It appears to me that must be so, without wishing to decide it. Either they can or they cannot shew a discharge. If they cannot shew a discharge, they will be fixed with it in taking the accounts in the winding-up. If they can, I ought not to deal with it. It appears to me, therefore, that the bill really entirely fails, and it is not a bill in which it is possible for the Court to give relief.

I have passed over a great many points in the case as to the delinquencies of the directors and the impropriety of their conduct, but I have to consider that with reference to the remaining question of costs. At first sight, I was struck by the fact of this not being a suit by the whole body, but the suit of Mr. Skey, he having indemnified the official liquidator with reference to the litigation. But on the other hand Mr. Skey has much to complain of, and one fact has convinced me of the propriety of dismissing the bill without costs, viz., the circumstance of Mr. Skey attending a meeting, Mr. Smeeton himself (a director against whom there is the least to be said), being present, and putting questions of some importance, and those questions being answered in a manner in which undoubtedly they ought not to have been answered without very careful inquiry, because they were questions requiring thought and consideration. No doubt there have been grave and grievous errors committed by some of these directors. I ought to remember that two of those who are said to have committed these are dead, and it is a most unfortunate thing, especially as regards Mr. Crowther, that, the petition for winding-up being presented in June, 1863, and Mr. Crowther not having died till 1865, no steps should have been taken in the matter when he could have defended himself, or would have been in a position to give some account of his conduct. It is impossible for his executors to do so, and all that they could say is, that they know nothing at all about it. If Mr. Skey, upon those questions being answered as they were answered, had a right of action, that right he will retain, independently of anything here done, but the bill by the general shareholders will not stand upon that ground. Finding, then, Crowther apparently actively engaged in one of these very imprudent transactions—it is only justice to his memory to say he was ignorant of everything else that was going on—finding him in that position when these questions were asked by Skey, and assenting and consenting to the responses which were given (which he either did with knowledge of the facts, or, if not, he allowed them to be given in a solemn way without taking the trouble to ascertain the facts), I cannot say it is a case in which the Court can properly mark its opinion of the conduct of the directors in the subject-matter before it otherwise than by dismissing the bill without costs. The costs, therefore, of the appeal will be costs in the cause. There will be no costs in fact.

Evidence—Parol Promise by Deceased Person, Uncorroborated Statement as to.

EVIDENCE.—The Court will never give a person anything on his own uncorroborated statement against another after that other's death.

This was a bill to restrain an action of ejectment by the devisee of George Rogers, deceased, against the plaintiffs, Robert Rogers and Harriet Frances, his wife, on the ground of a verbal promise by the testator to buy the land in question for the said Frances Rogers and of expenses incurred by the said Robert Rogers on the faith of such promise. The plaintiff Robert Rogers was, as he alleged, previously to and in the year 1856, the tenant and occupier of two pieces of copyhold land at North Hayling, in the county of Southampton, known as Tye Piddle, under one John Bulbeck, who was then owner thereof for an estate of inheritance according to the custom of the manor of Southampton Hayling.

Harriet Frances Rogers stated by her affidavit as follows: "In the month of December, 1856, George Rogers, then of North Hayling aforesaid, yeoman, since deceased, the first cousin of my husband the said R. Rogers, and who was a neighbour of and on terms of very intimate friendship with me and my said husband, stated to me that he was desirous to do something for me in return for the many acts of kindness I had done him and his late wife, with whom I had been on terms of friendship, and asked me if I would like him, the said George Rogers, to buy a piece of land for me, and I told him, the said George Rogers, I should like him to do so, and he, the said George Rogers, then said he would try and buy two pieces of copyhold land called Tye Piddle, which my said husband, Robert Rogers, was then occupying. On the 31st of December, 1856, the said George Rogers called on me and told me he had been to Havant and had bought the said two pieces of land for me. What took place at this interview between me and the said George Rogers was, to the best of my belief, as follows: The said George Rogers said, 'I have bought the two pieces of land for you; one piece you can build a house on, and the other you can make a little market garden or turn a horse out, which you like. I will read you the piece of paper (meaning thereby the contract entered into by him the said George Rogers for the purchase of the said two pieces of land), and you shall hear what Mr. Bulbeck says; as soon as he is admitted in you shall be. Mr. Bulbeck says that as Mr. P. (meaning thereby the then lord of the manor) and he are not on very good terms, he does not intend that Mr. P. shall have any of his money at present, and you can't be admitted till Mr. Bulbeck is.' At the same time he gave me a copy of the said contract entered into by him for the purchase of the said two pieces of land and read the same to me, and said, 'You can take care of this until such time as you can be admitted; you will be all right. I have got nothing else.' The contract entered into by the said George Rogers as aforesaid was dated the 31st of December, 1856, and made between John Bulbeck the younger of the first part, and the said George Rogers of the other part, and was to the effect set forth in the 5th paragraph of the bill filed in this cause. The said G. Rogers, by what he said and did at the interview last aforesaid, effectually gave the two pieces of land to me, and the said G. Rogers well knew that both I and my said husband believed, and he intended us to believe, that he, the said G. Rogers, had effectually and absolutely given to me the said two pieces of land, and that he, the said G. Rogers, also well knew that my said husband was expending his own money in building a cottage on one of the said pieces of land, and was bringing the said pieces of land into cultivation under such belief; and that he, the said G. Rogers, with such knowledge as aforesaid, advised and encouraged my said husband to build the cottage and cultivate the said land, and assisted him in the said building by conveying some of the materials purchased by my said husband on to the said land for the purpose of such building. The said cottage and outbuildings were built and the said land brought into cultivation by my said husband under the belief that the said two pieces of land had been effectually and absolutely given to me, and with the knowledge, on the part of the said G. Rogers, that my said husband in so doing was acting under such belief. I and my said husband entered into the occupation of the said cottage some time in the year 1857, and have ever since been and now are in the possession, use and enjoyment of the said cottage and pieces of land. Since the said 31st of December, 1856, we have not, nor hath either of us, paid any rent for the said pieces of land and cottage, nor made any acknowledgment of title or otherwise to any person in respect of the said pieces of land or cottage. The said G. Rogers never made any claim on me or my said husband, or either of us, for rent or otherwise, in respect of the said pieces of land or cottage, and since the said 31st of December, 1856, no claim has been made in respect of the said pieces of land or cottage by any other person until the claim by the defendant mentioned in the bill filed in this suit. On the 30th of January, 1864, I drove to Portsea in my own cart, and took the said G. Rogers to the office of Mr. Way, his solicitor, in Portsea, and brought the said George Rogers back with me from Portsea to North Hayling. On the journey home the said G. Rogers told me that he had made his will, to which I replied, 'You have not put me in one corner, I suppose?' or to that effect. He answered, 'No, you did not want me to. I have given you the ground you have got your house built on, and assisted you all I could in the carriage' (meaning the carriage of the building materials as aforesaid), 'and I will do something more for you before I die.'"

Nearly the whole of this statement was contradicted by affidavits on behalf of the defendant.

The case coming on upon motion for decree,

Mr. Hardy and Mr. Bovill, for the plaintiffs, referred to Ramsden v. Dyson (L. R. 1 E. & I. Ap. 129), especially the rule laid down by Lord Kingsdown at p. 170.

Mr. Kay and Mr. F. H. Colt, for the defendant, were not called upon.

JAMES, V.C.—Mankind would not be safe if this kind of evidence were admitted. The affidavits seem to be framed so as to fit in with reported decisions and the language of judgments, and the expenditure seems an afterthought. But I never will give a person anything on his own uncorroborated statement against another after that other's death. The bill must be dismissed, with costs, including costs of the motion.

Baron and Feme—Married Woman's Reversionary Interest in Personalty—Equity to a Settlement—Fraud—Negligence.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—A married woman may by fraud deprive herself, not only of her equity to a settlement out of moneys to which her husband may become entitled in her right, but (obiter per Giffard, L.J.) of any right to a reversionary interest falling due after his death.

On the sale by a husband of his wife's reversionary interest in a sum of stock, a document was produced in the handwriting of the wife, purporting to be an ante-nuptial assignment to him of her interest in the fund, and in a suit for specific performance instituted by him against the purchaser and the wife, and which was heard as a short cause, a decree was made by consent (no evidence being entered into) declaring the plaintiff to be absolutely entitled, but no decree was made for specific performance. The purchase was not completed, and the husband afterwards contracted to sell the same interest to a reversionary interest society, who, on the production of a letter signed by the wife acknowledging the ante-nuptial assignment, completed the purchase, the wife receiving a portion of the purchase money. Upon the falling of the reversionary interest into possession, the trustees transferred the fund into Court, and the reversionary interest society presented a petition for a transfer thereof to them. The Court was of opinion upon the evidence that the assignment was in fact executed after the marriage; but held, reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls, that the wife had by the subsequent letter been guilty of a fraud which deprived her of any equity to a settlement out of the fund, and that no such negligence could be imputed to the society as would deprive them of their right to it.

On the 3rd of February, 1858, Ellen Louisa Buckland intermarried with Edward Bowren, being entitled, under the will of her grandfather, Charles Lush, Esq., to one-sixth share of a sum of 5,640*l.* new 3*l.* per cent. annuities, and of 1,540*l.* 3*l.* per cent. consolidated annuities, in remainder expectant upon the death of her mother.

On the 20th of May, 1858, Bowren agreed to sell this reversionary interest to John Collins, who refused to complete the purchase on the ground that a married woman's reversionary interest in personalty was not assignable. Thereupon Bowren, on the 7th of July, filed his bill for specific performance against Collins and Mrs. Bowren, alleging that he had become absolutely entitled to the reversionary interest in the stock by virtue of a document signed by his wife, and bearing date the 1st of February, 1858, two days before the marriage. This document was as follows:

"I, Ellen Louisa Buckland, of Shaftesbury, Dorset, spinster, being about to marry Edward Bowren (and upon his marrying me), I, in consideration of such marriage, give up to him, the said Edward Bowren, for his own sole use and benefit, the whole of my interest under the will of Charles Lush, Esq., late of Hoxton, Middlesex, and in case of such marriage I hereby request and direct the trustees of the said will to pay over to the said Edward Bowren the whole of such interest of me the said Ellen Louisa Buckland under such will, and I, Ellen Louisa Buckland, have assigned my interest under the said will to the said Edward Bowren before my marriage. As witness my hand this 1st day of February, in the year of our Lord Christ, 1858.

"Ellen Louisa Buckland."

On the 14th of July, Collins put in his answer without oath or signature, stating that he was a willing purchaser, and willing to complete on having a good marketable title made out.

The cause was heard as a short cause at the Rolls, on the 17th of July, no evidence being entered into, and a decree was made by consent, declaring that the plaintiff was absolutely entitled under the document of the 1st of February to his wife's reversionary interest under her grandfather's will; but the decree contained no order for specific performance, and the contract never was in fact performed, being abandoned by mutual consent.

On the 20th of August, in the same year, Bowren put up the reversionary interest for sale by auction, and it was purchased by the Law Reversionary Interest Society for 400*l*. Before completing their purchase, the solicitors to the society required notice of the ante-nuptial assignment already mentioned to be given to the trustees, and accordingly Mrs. Bowren, on the 11th of October (her husband being at the time a prisoner for debt in Whitecross Street Prison), signed the following letter addressed to one of the trustees of the fund:—

"Dear Sir,—I beg to inform you that previous to my marriage with Edward Bowren, on the 3rd day of February last, I assigned to the said Edward Bowren all my interest under the will of Charles Lush, Esq."

The purchase was completed on the 14th of October, 1858; the money was received by Bowren's solicitor, and after certain payments made out of it by Bowren's direction, the residue was handed to Mrs. Bowren.

The reversionary interest fell into possession in October, 1867, and the trustees of the will transferred Mrs. Bowren's share of the stock into Court, and the Law Reversionary Interest Society presented a petition for a transfer of the fund to them. This was opposed by Mrs. Bowren, who claimed an equity to a settlement, and filed an affidavit denying that she had before her marriage signed any paper relating to the trust fund. Her statement was as follows: "About two months after my marriage with Edward Bowren, that is to say on or about the 3rd day of April, 1858, the said Edward Bowren and I were lodging in the house of one William Howard, who had married a sister of my said husband. The said Edward Bowren told me that if I signed a paper which he had in his possession he would borrow a sum of money on my reversionary property. We were then in great distress for want of money. He assured me that by signing such paper I was not parting with my property, or in any way injuring myself, and that such paper was wanted merely for the purpose of borrowing money. He forced me to sign such paper, and said that if I did not he would leave me, and I should have to return home. I at first objected to sign the paper, as he wished it dated previous to my marriage, and to be signed in my maiden name, but he forced me to sign it. At length, when I could resist no longer, I yielded to his persuasion, and signed some paper writing, the terms of which he dictated to me."

She alleged that the sale to Collins was fictitious, and that the Chancery suit, of which she denied that she had ever heard until after the presentation of the petition, was got up by Bowren and Collins, for the purpose of depriving her of her right. In fact no answer had been put in by or required from her.

The petition came on to be heard before the Master of the Rolls, who came to the conclusion that the document, dated the 1st of February, 1858, was in fact written after the marriage, and was therefore inoperative as an assignment, nor, as Mrs. Bowren had signed it under coercion, could she be made responsible for the fraud. He therefore ordered the costs to be paid out of the fund in Court, and the dividends on the residue to be paid to Mrs. Bowren for her separate use until further order.

The Law Reversionary Interest Society appealed from this order.

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Bristowe contended that Mrs. Bowren's evidence could not be relied upon to rebut the presumption that the document, dated the 1st of February, was executed on that day; but at all events Mrs. Bowren, by her subsequent acknowledgment that it was ante-nuptial, had been a party to a gross fraud which deprived her of the right to the protection of the Court.

Sir Richard Baggallay and Mr. Cutler, for Mrs. Bowren, supported the order of the Master of the Rolls.

SELWYN, L.J.—Although I cannot concur in the conclusion at which his Lordship the Master of the Rolls has arrived in this case, I do not think there is any difference of opinion between that learned Judge and this Court with respect to the law which is applicable to cases of this description, for I observe that in his judgment he refers with approbation to the decision of Vice Chancellor Kindersley in the case of Vaughan v. Vanderstegen. In that case the Vice Chancellor stated in a very few words a proposition of which I apprehend at the present time no doubt can be entertained—viz., that it is well established that a married woman is capable of committing a fraud, and is liable to be visited with the consequences of the commission of that fraud. Then he refers to the case of Savage v. Foster, in which the husband and wife concurred in the fraud. In that case there was not such an active participation in the fraud as we find in the present case; it was a case of standing by and allowing the purchase to take place in ignorance on the part of the purchaser of the real state of the title, which the husband and wife were aware of. Now, there is no doubt that in cases of separate estate, and especially in cases where that separate estate is coupled with a restraint upon anticipation, many questions may arise as to how far the Court can, in dealing with cases of fraud on the part of married women, overrule a declaration of the settlor or of the testator in respect of the separate estate, and the restraint upon anticipation, and some cases have gone so far as to say that, although it may be very greatly for the benefit of the married woman that that restraint should be removed, still, if the settlor or testator has imposed it, the Court has no power to take it away, even for the benefit of the married woman. But in the present case we are relieved from any consideration of this kind, because we find that this lady was absolutely entitled in her own right to this reversionary interest. That, upon her marriage, would pass to the husband, subject, of course, only to the rights which she might have in the event of her surviving him, and to her equity to a settlement. That equity to a settlement is certainly an interest which this Court will control, and will not, as we have had occasion to say in the very recent case of Barnard v. Ford (L. R. 4 Ch. Ap. 247), allow the equity to a settlement to be made an engine of fraud, or, as it was expressed by my learned Brother in that case, to be enforced where it would be contrary to good conscience to do so.

I think, therefore, the question we have now to consider is whether, under the circumstances proved in this case, it would be contrary to good conscience to allow this lady to assert an equity to a settlement.

With respect to the facts: in the first place, we have a document which is entirely in her own handwriting, which bears date the 1st of February, 1858, two days before her marriage on the 3rd of February. That is a document, certainly, open to the observations which have been pressed upon us with great force by Sir R. Baggallay, as being a document of a very unusual character, but at the same time it is one which calls most pointedly the attention of the person who writes it to the circumstance that it was very material indeed to make out that it had taken place before her marriage. Then the representation which the lady now makes with respect to that document is, that, in point of fact, it was not written until the month of April; that she did it then under the influence of her husband, and under the influence of a threat that unless she signed it her husband's circumstances would compel him to leave her and send her home.

Digitized by Google

She says she did it very reluctantly, and only in consequence of the exercise of that influence, and under the pressure of that threat.

Then the first question is, are we to take it as being established that that document was not in fact written until after the date of the marriage? Because I think that, supposing it to have been written before the marriage, it is perfectly clear that it would be sufficient to exclude any equity to a settlement. With respect to that I cannot help saying that I agree in the conclusion at which the Master of the Rolls arrived, because, although it is, no doubt, very dangerous to trust to the unsupported testimony of a person who has been an actor in such a transaction, when she comes to say that a document, written by herself, and signed by herself in her maiden name, and dated on the 1st of February, 1858, was actually written by her when that was no longer her name—when she had been married several months; although, I say, it is very dangerous to listen to such testimony, still I think that there are corroborative circumstances here which induce one to believe that her representation with respect to that is correct. Beyond that, there is this very extraordinary suit, which I think I ought not to pass over without some comment, because I entirely agree with the observations which the Master of the Rolls has made upon that suit, as being a means of making the Court an instrument of fraud; a suit having for its only proper and legitimate purpose that of binding the interest of a married lady, by proving as against her a fact which she denies. The bill was filed on the 7th of July; the answer was put in on the 14th; the decree was obtained on the 19th, and upon the face of that decree it appears that that which was the only essential thing in the suit at all, viz., the evidence, was omitted altogether. That being so, I am of opinion that it is sufficiently established that this document of the 1st of February, 1858, was not written until after the marriage of the lady. But the document itself is most material for the purpose of shewing that this lady's attention must, at the time when she wrote it, the whole being in her handwriting, have been most pointedly called to the transaction, and her own statements clearly shew that, her husband being in great difficulties, she was aware that attempts were being made to raise money upon the footing of this security.

Then, that being so, it brings us down to the date of the suit which I have already mentioned; then to the transaction in October, when the sale by auction took place. Now, with respect to that I cannot entertain any doubt that the purchase was a bona fide one, made at a price which seems to me to have been a very fair and reasonable price. The purchase was not made at all at an undervalue by this society at the sale by auction; and I cannot help expressing my very strong belief that the matter, as far as the society were concerned, was entirely bona fide, a purchase by auction under ordinary circumstances. Then they proceeded to investigate the title, and although I agree that the document has certain marks of singularity upon it, and although the suit was one of a most singular character, and one which, if the suspicion of the purchasers had been aroused, would have been calculated to increase that suspicion, still I do not think that those circumstances were of such a character as to induce the Court to say that the purchasers must have known (I believe they did not know) that any fraud or deception had been perpetrated with regard to it. I think that the transaction is very fairly represented in the letter produced this morning, which was written on the 12th of October, 1858, from Mr. Dalton, writing in the name of his firm, to one of the trustees, in which he says, "As we thought it would probably be satisfactory to the trustees to have a letter from Mrs. Bowren stating the fact of her having made over her interest under Mr. Lush's will prior to her marriage, we required the vendor's solicitor to obtain one, and we now inclose it. Perhaps you will be kind enough to put it away with the papers you have relating to the trust. We have not yet completed the purchase, but expect to do so in the course of the week, when we will send you the usual formal notice." I think that letter correctly represents what really took place, and it is, to my mind, quite conclusive that these purchasers were acting bona fide in this matter, and that they required this letter for the purpose of preventing any possibility of doubt as to it.

Of course, in all these transactions we must ascertain whether the lady was in truth acting as a free agent; because, although a married lady may be, as I have already said, guilty of a fraud, and may consequently be visited with the consequences of that fraud, on the other hand, she is entitled to the same protection as any other person, and she is not to be rendered liable for acts which were not done of her own free will, and in respect of which she was acting under such coercion as prevented her from being a free agent. Now, in the first place, even assuming that she was acting under some species of coercion in this transaction, still, the very fact which she states as to the pressure put upon her must have left an impression upon her mind which would render her exceedingly sensitive with respect to all subsequent transactions relating to the same matter; and when we find by her own admission that she was aware that money was about to be raised upon the security of this reversionary interest, when she knew that she had written and signed a document which she says herself she wrote and signed with very great reluctance, knowing that it did not express the truth,—knowing that it was signed by her in a name which was no longer hers, and that it bore a date which was not the true date, under these circumstances, an application was made to her to write the other letter, which bears date the 11th of October, 1858. It is true that the body of that letter is not, like the body of the former document, altogether in her own handwriting; but although she originally denied her signature, it is now clearly proved, and, in fact, is admitted at the bar on her behalf, that that letter was signed by her. At that time she was under no coercion; her husband was in prison, and she was living separate and apart from him, and the question of fact which we have to try (and this is, in truth, the question upon which my opinion differs from that of his Lordship the Master of the Rolls) is, whether she was a free agent when she wrote that letter. I say, having regard to the circumstances stated by herself and to the pointed manner in which her attention must have been directed so recently as April in the same year to this transaction; having regard to the fact that she admits that she knew that money was about to be raised upon the security of this reversionary interest, and to the fact that she also admits that she actually herself received some portion of the money which was raised by means of this transaction, it is impossible to believe that she could have signed so short a document as that of the 11th of October, 1858, without being fully cognizant of the contents, meaning and object of it. I say that, she having written that, the parties who were about to advance the money, and who did advance it four days afterwards, were entitled to believe the representations so made by her, and I think she cannot now be heard to say that they ought to have disbelieved those representations and ought to have said: "We do not believe that you did assign to Edward Bowren previous to your marriage all your interest under that will." I think it would be contrary to equity and good conscience to allow a lady who has made, under such circumstances, a declaration so clear and distinct as that, to set up afterwards a claim to an equity to a settlement, so as to defeat the interest of the purchasers, who, upon the faith of that representation, have paid the purchase-money in respect of this lady's interest. Consequently, I think that the order made by the Master of the Rolls must be reversed, and that there should be an order directing the payment out of the fund of the costs of the trustees in the usual form, both here and in the Court below, and the payment of the remainder of the fund to the reversionary society.

GIFFARD, L.J.—The propositions of law which are applicable to this case are, to my mind, very simple and such as are not disputed, and they are simply these, viz., that a married woman may by fraud preclude herself from her equity to a settlement; and added to that, I have no objection to this, although I do not think it necessary for the decision of this case, that she may also preclude herself by fraud from any right to a reversionary interest falling due after the death of her husband. In fact, if that were not so, it would be contrary to what has been decided over and over again in this Court, viz., that a married woman who chooses to commit a fraud may be held responsible for that fraud. Then the next question is, whether in this case there has been fraud in the statements made by this married lady? Taking all the circumstances into consideration, I have no doubt that the documents which she represents to have been signed on some day after the marriage in February, 1858, was, in truth, signed on the day which she so represents. With reference to that document, what she says is, that her husband threatened to leave her if she did not sign it; and she says, in her cross-examination: "I think I must have known that he was trying to borrow money upon my property. My husband told me that if I would sign exhibit I. he could borrow money upon my property, and I signed it with the intention of enabling him to do so." The whole of that document is written in her hand; it is written in a very plain hand and in a very firm hand; and I can have no hesitation in saying that a married woman who signs a document of that description under those circumstances, if she turns round afterwards and affects to come to this Court and to say that she is entitled to make a claim as against that document, must be treated as having committed a fraud. In this case there is no evidence of any such pressure or influence as would do away with the effect of that act which she did; and there is a very wide difference indeed between a case where it is a matter of contract and a case where it is a matter such as this, viz., a matter of false representation and fraud. Then, that being so, the next question really is, whether the reversionary society were cognizant of the fraud? It is quite plain that they were not, because this was a sale by auction; they bought it at the auction in the usual way and paid a fair consideration for it, and, indeed, that they were cognizant of the fraud has never been suggested. Then there is this further question, viz., was there any such negligence on their part as would visit the society with the same consequences as if they had been cognizant of the fraud? I think there was no negligence. I think it would be a monstrous thing, where property is put up for sale by public auction and documents of this description are produced, which, on the face of them, would lead any person to believe that they were bona fide, in the absence of proof full and conclusive to the contrary, that they should be bound to make any further inquiry than that which would appear on the face of these documents. This document itself is not an unusual document; it was no improbable document for a married lady to have executed; it is neither more nor less than this, that this lady, being entitled to a certain sum of money expectant on the death of her mother, gives up her right to a settlement to her husband. There would be nothing very extraordinary in that, nor anything very extraordinary in its being done by a document of this description. Then, as to the decree. To that decree all necessary persons were parties. It is true that the decree does not recite that there was any evidence; but you cannot impute to persons that when a decree is brought to them, because it does not recite that there is any evidence, therefore it is put upon them to inquire whether there was any evidence or not. When such a document as this and such a decree as this are presented to the purchaser, I cannot hold him liable for negligence because he makes no further inquiry. But here there is an additional fact that, beyond all question, this lady must have known perfectly well, when her husband was in prison, that his solicitor was trying to raise money, and was raising money upon the footing of the very document which she signed in the month of April previous. In the course of that transaction, because the trustees had said that they had had no notice, a request is made that she would sign a letter stating that she had executed this document antecedently to her marriage. She signs that letter, and, although she has forgotten it, I have no hesitation in imputing to her, and in saying that every Court must impute to her, a knowledge of the contents of that letter. It would be most monstrous, and, in fact, the transactions of life could not go on if, after putting her signature to a document of that description, she could be heard to come into Court and assert such a right. For these reasons I am clearly of opinion that, whether this is an equity to a settlement or whether it is a reversionary interest, it would be most unjust that this lady should be allowed to come forward and to assert in this Court, contrary to all good conscience, any right of any kind or description. I cannot help saying that I think, considering what the acts done were, she ought not to have made this claim in any shape or form, and that it was not an honest thing to do. I quite agree that she is very much to be pitied, because she has contracted a most imprudent marriage, and because she has been deserted by her husband, and because, in all probability, her husband influenced her more or less; but that is no reason why a married lady who chooses to commit a fraud should afterwards come forward and say, Notwithstanding that fraud, I am entitled to property which other persons have been induced to purchase upon a misrepresentation which I knew at the time I made it to be utterly and wholly untrue. For these reasons I am of opinion that the order below must be discharged, and that the reversionary society must have the money.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL v. SIDNEY SUSSEX COLLEGE.

Will—Construction—Devise to Two Colleges for Educating in Piety and Learning—Usage.

CHARITY. WILL.—A testator, in 1641, devised lands to two colleges, one at Cambridge and one at Oxford, for educating ten of the descendants of certain persons named in his will in piety and learning:—Held, that this was a gift to the two colleges as tenants in common, subject to the trust of educating the persons specified in the will in piety and learning, according to the course and usage of education in the colleges respectively, and according to the regulations and discipline thereof.

In construing a will, the Court has regard to the period when and the circumstances under which it was framed; and where the will is of ancient date, if there is any ambiguity in the construction, the course of action on the bequest since the will came into operation may be referred to in aid of the construction which has been adopted, on the ground that it is not to be assumed that a continued series of breaches of trust has been committed in the presence of those who are interested in an opposite conclusion.

Decree of the Master of the Rolls varied.

Francis Combe, by his will, dated the 1st of May, 1641, infeoffed the defendants, Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and Trinity College, Oxford, "and theire successors for ever with all I have in Abbotts Langley and the lordship there, and the meadow in St. Stephen's with the appurtenances, equally between the said colleges, for the only use, education in pietie and learninge of foure of the descendants of my brothers and sisters, and three of the descendants of the brother and sister of my first wife, and three of the descendants of the brothers and sisters of my second wife, or in default of such to their next poor kindred, for the first by the father's side, for the second by the mother's side."

His will, which was comprised in numerous heads or articles, contained many other devises and bequests, and among them a gift out of his lands at Hemel Hempstead of 10*l.* a year for ever "to a free schoole for teaching poore to cast accompt, to read English, and to write." It also contained other bequests for charitable and educational purposes, which are sufficiently referred to in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

The colleges had from the death of the testator been in the habit of educating those and those only of the " descendants " specified in the will who from time to time came to them for education, and claimed the benefit of the trust; and, if none such presented themselves, they had from the year 1646 down to the latest period adopted the plan of adding the rents arising from the land at Abbotts Langley to the general funds of the colleges and using them for the purposes to which those funds were applied.

This information was filed at the relation of Joseph Greenhill, a descendant of a brother of the second wife of the testator, for the purpose of obtaining a decision on the construction of the devise to the two colleges, and for a scheme to carry into effect the trusts as declared by the Court; and by an order made on further consideration in the cause on the 20th of November, 1868, by the Master of the Rolls, his Lordship declared that, according to the true construction of the will of Francis Combe, his real estate at Abbots Langley was vested in the two colleges in equal moieties as tenants in common, in trust to educate or to provide for the education in piety and learning of ten of the descendants of the persons named in the will, such ten persons to be selected in turns by each of the colleges, and that the term " descendants " included females as well as males, and was not confined to persons of an age to receive education at either of the said colleges; and that in default of such persons being in existence and being so selected and educated as aforesaid, the poor kindred of the testator's wives were entitled to the gifts given by the testator for their own absolute use and benefit, and that the term " kindred " included both male and female, first by the father's and secondly by the mother's side, and also that a scheme for the purpose of carrying into effect the educational purposes of the testator, as nearly as the circumstances of the case and the altered condition of society would permit, should be settled by the Judge at chambers.

From this decision both the colleges appealed.

Mr. Cole and Mr. Rigby, for Sidney Sussex College, and

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins, for Trinity College.—When a person endows a college with a fund for the purpose of education, it will be presumed that he was cognizant of the rules and regulations of the college, and intended that the objects of his bounty should be educated according to those rules and regulations, and in the manner in which the college was in the habit of educating those who came to it for instruction; that is a principle which follows from the decisions in Ex parte Inge; In re Catherine Hall (2 Russ. & M. 590) and The Attorney General v. Pearson (7 Sim. 290), which latter case is a type of the manner in which similar endowments are treated by this Court. Besides, the colleges have applied the funds according to the construction for which they now contend for more than 200 years, and this long usage by them is not to be thrown out of view in seeking for the true construction, nor is it to be presumed against them that they have been committing a breach of trust for so long a time in the face of interested persons who have been in existence and competent to dispute their construction of the devise—The Attorney General v. Smythies (2 Russ. & M. 717, 749); The Attorney General v. Caius College (2 Keen, 150; 6 L. J. Ch. 282); The Attorney General v. the Corporation of Rochester (5 De Gex, M. & G. 797, 822); The Attorney General v. the Master and Fellows of Catherine Hall (Jacob, 381, 394); The Attorney General v. the Mayor of Bristol (2 Jac. & W. 294). Then, as to the gift over in default of descendants to poor kindred, if that is not for educational purposes, it is bad; for a gift merely to poor kindred in perpetuum cannot be upheld as a charity—Thomason v. Moses (5 Beav. 77).

Mr. Hinde Palmer and Mr. Bedwell, for the relator, contended that if a college accepted a trust, it did so on the terms of properly executing the trust when ascertained, and the fact that the colleges had virtually applied the gift for their own benefit for 200 years, would not absolve them from at last doing their duty by the gift.

[The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question is, whether the colleges have not fulfilled the trust by providing education within their own walls: are they compellable to do it in any other way?]

If they are not, the scope of the devise is narrowed. There is in the devise a devotion to educational, i.e., charitable, purposes generally; and the mode of dealing which the colleges have adopted, cuts that down.

Mr. Wickens, for the Attorney General.

Mr. Hemming, for other "descendants."

Mr. Cole and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins, in reply, referred to The Incorporated Society v. Richards (1 Dru. & War. 258); In re the Chelmsford Grammar School (1 Kay & J. 543, 565; 24 L. J. Ch. 742).

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The principal point which arises in this case is, whether under the devise to Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and Trinity College, Oxford, the testator intended that the property devised to them should be taken by them upon trust to educate ten of the class of persons specified by the will in piety and learning in the ordinary manner in which those colleges were in the habit of educating all who resorted to them for education, or whether it is a trust imposed on the colleges of providing generally for the education of such ten persons, whether boys or girls, somewhere or other, and in some manner which, if not adjusted by the colleges themselves, would be subject to the directions and regulations of this Court. I can find no case in the books, nor has any been cited by the learned counsel at the bar in which there is a bequest worded in a manner precisely similar to this, or even so analogous to it as to afford me any useful help in forming my judgment. I am therefore obliged to consider it principally upon the actual shape and form of the will as the words in it express, or are intended to express, the testator's meaning, and to come to the best conclusion I can upon it, having regard at the same time to the period when and the circumstances under which the will was made.

Now, the will is dated in the year 1641. It is very informal in its arrangements; it is comprised in certain heads or articles, and must have been subject to certain interlineations and additions from time to time. It contains a vast number of dispositions, the general character of which was to make provision for the relations of both his wives. We find, also, in the fifteenth article, that he intimates some regard to the two colleges in question, for he there directs that all his books, except some few his friends might desire, should be given equally to the two colleges. Then we find further a direction as to one part of his property, in article seventeen, in which he gives the overplus of his goods to those who want most of his next kindred, and gives his house by Abbotts Langley Church, for ever, one half of the rent thereof to the poor there quarterly, and the other half of the rent to any quarterly that will teach poor children English there for ever. And then there is another bequest with reference to teaching poor children at Hemel Hempstead. There is to be a free school there for teaching the poor children to cast accounts, to read English and to write. So that it is clear that the testator had his own ideas with reference to those who are to be instructed at these schools. In one of them he simply directs the teaching the poor of the district; in the other he indicates the sort of education which he thinks will be appropriate to them, namely, reading, writing and arithmetic, a notion in which he seems to have agreed with one very prevalent at the present day. Then, in the 22nd article, which I now have to construe, he proceeds thus.—[His Lordship read the devise to the colleges.]

His Lordship the Master of the Rolls seems to have been led in a great measure to the conclusion at which he arrived by the argument which has been addressed to me here, namely, that this is only a gift to the two colleges, that no place of education is named, that it does not follow necessarily that because a gift is made to a college, therefore it should be for the purpose of educating there, and that it may have been that the testator selected these two colleges as persons upon other occasions have selected for the purpose of continuous charities, a corporate body for the administration of the charities without the corporate body being called upon itself in any way to assist in the due administration of the charity beyond seeing that the trust is executed. No doubt there are such cases, and there is a well-known case, that of Sonley v. the Clockmakers' Company (Dru. & War. 306), referred to in The Incorporated Society v. Richards, in which a corporation is made a trustee simply and entirely for private purposes. Of course that may be done. But the question here is different; we have here to consider what it is when a person gives to a corporate body, itself providing education in "piety and learning" (on which I shall say a word presently), a sum of money for the purpose of bringing up his descendants in piety and learning. I apprehend that a person at first sight—and this was my first impression, and continues to be my impression—would say that when the corporate body to whom the property is given does that very thing which the testator desires to be done, does take in hand the education of persons requiring to be educated, and does specially educate them in piety and learning, that in such a case the intention is that the persons in whose favour the trust is created shall be dealt with in the manner in which the corporate body deals with all other persons committed to its charge for the purpose of such instruction. I put the case (it is idem per idem no doubt) of a gift to one of the corporate trading bodies in the city of London of a sum of money for apprenticing young men. Surely the first impression would be this, that it was for apprenticing them to the craft to which the corporate trading body belonged. I mean, of course, a gift made at the time when it was necessary that all persons who were to be apprenticed to a certain craft should be under some control before they were allowed to enter upon the trade itself. Take, again, a gift to Bartholomew's Hospital (a corporate body) by a testator, on say that the hospital is bound to seek out all over England any ten of his sick relations. Could anybody suppose it was not to be done at the hospital, which is a place undoubtedly appropriated for it, and could any one reasonably say that the hospital is bound to seek out all over England any ten of his relations who might be existing if it was found incumbent to remove them to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, provided the hospital was always ready, and offered on its own part that which it considered to be the trust and duty imposed upon it?

That being so, I have next to inquire whether or not these colleges were, in 1641, as they are now, in the habit of instructing people in piety and learning. And if there were any doubt on the point, I find that the very charter of incorporation of Sidney Sussex College contains these identical words, and that that college was incorporated for the express purpose of promoting "piety and learning." That is the common expression to be found over and over again in books which refer to the Universities as being places for instruction. Sometimes the expression used is, "sound learning and true religion," sometimes "piety and learning," and that is the very object for which these several societies seem from the earliest time to have been incorporated.

Further, also, there is, in aid of the construction which I put on the devise, the singular fact that the testator has not chosen one college only to be his trustee, as would probably have been the case if the only purpose he had in view was that the trust might have a perpetual endurance, but the devise is made to two colleges, one at each University, who are constituted tenants in common of the property.

Finding, therefore, as I do find, a deed of gift to two bodies expressly incorporated to inculcate that which the testator desires to inculcate in his descendants, it appears to me that the plain, ordinary construction is this, that he makes the devise to the two colleges for the purpose of giving to the objects pointed out by his bounty the benefit which these colleges confer upon all others who resort to them for the purpose of instruction at all; and I cannot come to any other conclusion than that this was the original intention of the testator's gift.

But the case does not rest there, because the appellants are entitled to claim in aid of the construction which they put upon the bequest, the principle of the Court, which says, that if there be any ambiguity at all, the course of action upon the bequest may be called in aid as shewing this, that the persons who are concerned in the trust have not been committing a breach of trust from the commencement downwards to the present time. The reason the Court relies upon that rule with reference to charities where there is anything doubtful in the construction of the will (and there must be something doubtful here for the Master of the Rolls to have arrived at a conclusion different from mine) is this, that there always have been persons alive who have been competent to controvert any such conclusion; and it is not to be assumed that in the face of many persons interested in controverting such a conclusion a course of action has been adopted which has been a plain and clear breach of trust. The cases are very numerous on the subject, but I think one of the latest is The Attorney General v. the Corporation of Rochester (5 De Gex, M. & G. 822), where Lord Justice Turner (though deciding against the usage because he thought the will was not doubtful) put it thus: "Undoubtedly if an instrument be doubtful in its terms contemporaneous usage may be referred to; and if there has been a long usage in the application of funds to purposes which may be warranted upon one construction of the instrument, but which may not be warranted upon another construction of the instrument, the Court will lean to that construction of the instrument (provided it be doubtful) which will best correspond with the mode in which the funds have been for so long a period applied."

It is not necessary, as I have said before, to have recourse to this rule of practice, because I think enough is derivable from the terms of the will itself; but it appears to me, at the highest, there cannot be more said than this, that it might admit of the opposite construction; and in the case of a general trust you look back to see what has been done. Then the case in that point of view is extremely strong, because observe what were the circumstances. The testator appointed four or five supervisors of his will; one of them was his father (Greenhill, as he called him, that is, his father-in-law), who would be interested in looking after the interest of the Greenhills; another was his brother Greenhill, whose descendants were entitled to the benefit of the trust; and these supervisors having been appointed both the colleges appear from the first to have adopted the plan of educating those, and those only, who came to be instructed by them. But more than that: Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, from the very earliest period, in 1646, down to the very latest period, made a resolution that when anybody did not come the funds should go into the general funds of the college which are not (as has been often pressed upon me) for the benefit or behoof of the college itself in any other sense than this, that they go to instruct other people, for exhibitions, and for the purpose of instructing those who needed instruction; and that having been laid down as their rule, Trinity College, Oxford, did, as well as Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, act upon the same rule. In Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, this was laid down as the definite rule very soon, some five or six years after the bequest, when these supervisors must in all probability have been alive, and when certainly there must have been persons interested in disputing anything they were doing; and that course of action they pursued to the latest period, so that there have been abundant opportunities of disputing it, if disputed it ought to be.

The other part of the case I can dispose of much more shortly. It is a question what is to be done with reference to the second bequest, which is undoubtedly a somewhat different one as to its true construction, for it is very imperfectly expressed, namely, after the descendants of the brothers and sisters it says, "Or in default of such to their next poor kindred, for the first by the father's side, for the second by the mother's side." The Master of the Rolls has made a declaration that it is a good charitable bequest to these kindred. But what strikes me on the present occasion is this, that as these poor kindred are not represented before me I ought not to make a declaration in their absence which may affect them. Moreover, it appears that the descendants of the persons named in the will are exceedingly numerous, and that there is no chance of their failing. It would therefore be improper to direct any inquiry now which might bring the poor kindred before me, and in their absence, I repeat, I ought not to make any declaration concerning them. The decree, therefore, of the Master of the Rolls must be varied, and I shall declare that, according to the true construction of the will of Francis Combe the defendants the College or Corporation of the Master and Fellows of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and the defendants the College or Corporation of the President, Fellows and Scholars of Trinity College, Oxford, became entitled on his decease in equal shares as tenants in common in fee simple to the testator's property at Abbotts Langley in the will mentioned, with the appurtenances, subject to the trusts imposed upon the said colleges respectively by the said will of educating in piety and learning, according to the course and usage of instruction in the said colleges respectively and according to the regulations and discipline thereof, four of the descendants of the brothers and sisters of the testator, three of the descendants of the brother and sister of his first wife, and three of the descendants of the brothers and sisters of his second wife; and it appearing that there still exist many of such descendants as aforesaid but no other poor kindred than such poor descendants of any of the persons in that behalf mentioned in the said will have come in and made any claim under the original decree made in this cause, this Court doth not think fit further to prosecute that inquiry directed in the original decree as to the poor kindred of the testator's brothers and sisters or the poor kindred of his first and second wives, but this decree to be without prejudice to such rights, if any, of the poor kindred other than the descendants of the testator's brothers and sisters and of the brothers and sisters of his first and second wives.

Trust Estate—Sale by Court—Trustee an Incumbrancer—Application by, for Leave to Bid.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—The Court, when it has directed the sale of a trust estate, will not, in opposition to the declared wishes of adult cestuis que trust, and prior to any attempt to sell, grant leave to the trustee to bid, notwithstanding that, besides being trustee, he is entitled to a charge on the estate, and that the sale has in fact been ordered with a view to the payment of such charge. But Semble—on the failure of previous attempts to sell, the trustee may be accepted by the Court as purchaser.

This was an appeal from an order made, by Vice Chancellor James, on an adjourned summons.

Charles Tennant, the plaintiff in the suit of Tennant v. Trenchard, was managing trustee under a settlement made by his mother of an estate near Swansea, comprising important canal property; but he alleged that he had been de facto divested of the trust since the year 1859, when a receiver and manager of the trust estate was appointed by the Court. He claimed to be an incumbrancer on the trust estate for charges amounting in the aggregate to 46,301*l.*, besides arrears of interest about equal in amount to the principal, and the suit was instituted by him for a foreclosure of his charges, which he maintained considerably exceeded the value of the premises. Vice Chancellor Giffard thought the plaintiff entitled to foreclose; but his order was, on appeal, reversed (38 L. J. Ch. 169) by Lord Chancellor Hatherley, who held the plaintiff's charge to be a charge simpliciter, with the incident, not of foreclosure, but of sale only, which he accordingly ordered. Thereupon the plaintiff applied to Vice Chancellor James, in whose chambers the sale was to be conducted, to have leave given him to bid. His application was resisted by certain of the cestuis que trust who were of full age, and the Vice Chancellor refused it, on the ground that the plaintiff, according to the Lord Chancellor's view, retaining still the character of trustee under the settlement, could not be allowed to place himself in a position where his duty and his interest would be in opposition. He appealed. It appeared that it had not been as yet determined who was to have the conduct of the sale, and no reserved bidding had therefore been at present settled.

Mr. E. K. Karslake and Mr. W. W. Karslake, for the appellant, contended that the Vice Chancellor had treated the point as not res integra, but, as, in fact, concluded by the Lord Chancellor's judgment in the suit. They argued that the reason of the rule against a trustee's bidding, which was instituted for the protection of the cestuis que trust, did not apply here, where it would be rather for their protection against the estate being sold at an undervalue that he should be allowed to bid.—They cited Ex parte Lacey (6 Ves. 625), and distinguished Ex parte James (8 Ves. 337).

Mr. John Pearson and Mr. Hume appeared for the defendant Dr. Trenchard, who, however, had not now been served, and had not appeared in the Court below. They did not consent to the appellant's application, but they declined to argue the case.

Mr. Freeling and Mr. Speed, for the cestuis que trust (the children of the late Henry Tennant, the settlor's eldest son), who opposed the plaintiff's application, contended that a trustee, whether also an incumbrancer or not, could not purchase without the consent of the adult cestuis que trust, and that the Court had no power to consent for them. This disqualifying of a trustee as a purchaser was to prevent his duty and his interest from conflicting, and the dissent of a single cestui que trust was sufficient to prevent the removal of the disqualification—Ex parte Lacey (ubi supra); Ex parte James (ubi supra); In re Bloye's Trust (1 Mac. & G. 488; 19 L. J. Ch. 89); Hamilton v. Wright (9 Cl. & F. 111); Campbell v. Walker (5 Ves. 680); Price v. Byrn (5 Ves. 681); Parkinson v. Hanbury (2 De Gex, J. & S. 450); Ex parte Bage (4 Madd. 459); Carter v. Palmer (8 Cl. & F. 657). The same principle which made it unlawful for a trustee to purchase the trust estate prevented the Court from authorizing him to bid—Sir George Colebrooke's case (6 Ves. 622); Lewin on Trusts, 364. It was, moreover, especially necessary to adhere rigidly to the rule in a case like the present, where the trustee had possessed such vast powers of management.

Mr. E. K. Karslake was heard in reply.

The Lord Chancellor said.—In this case the peculiarity of the position does not consist in the circumstance of the same gentleman being trustee and incumbrancer, for that may happen, and does happen, in a great many instances. A person may take an interest under an instrument in which he is trustee, and that interest may require a sale of the property to give it effect. Certainly I do not intend to depart—and I hope I did not do anything by the decree which I made on the former occasion which could in any way be held to depart—from the trusts of the deed; but it appeared to me that this gentleman certainly had been trustee with very large powers vested in him as trustee, and that this constituted the peculiarity of the case, his powers being almost equivalent to ownership by the express terms of the deed itself; while at the same time he had acquired a very large interest as mortgagee. There cannot be the least doubt that a very large sum of money is owing to him, and also very large arrears of interest in respect of that principal sum. He was proceeding to foreclose the estate; but it appeared to me that under any circumstances of the case that was not his right.

I thought, in the first place, upon the terms of the deed, it was rather a charge which was to be raised by sale; and, secondly, I thought, even if there had been more doubt upon that point than I on the whole entertained, regard being had to the rather ambiguous expressions of this deed, still, regard being had to the fact that the whole scope and object of the deed were to save the estate, and that he had been appointed trustee for that purpose, that it was his duty as trustee to do what he could towards saving the estate if it could be saved, and if that could not be altogether done, then to seek to save some portion of the surplus after paying all charges when a sale should become absolutely necessary, for the benefit of those interested under the species of settlement that had been made. That being so, and finding that he had this large sum due to him, I varied the decree which had been made for foreclosure by directing a sale; and I have no hesitation in saying that I intended (and I am, therefore, glad of the course which has been pursued in chambers) that the sale should be immediate. It appeared to me quite plain that this gentleman had been long kept out of his money, and there appeared no intention on the part of those who are creating these difficulties, and no means on their part, to pay him. Therefore, the only course that was left was to give him the advantage of having his money paid within a reasonable time; and also, on the other hand, to give them the advantage of a chance of obtaining any surplus that might remain after payment of these very heavy debts.

One therefore approaches the case without any difficulty, founded on the idea of the decree having, by directing a sale, altered his position as trustee. Trustee he was and trustee he still continues to be. His having been replaced by a receiver of the property does not alter the position which he fills as trustee under the instrument. The point has been extremely well and ably argued by Mr. Freeling and Mr. Speed upon this part of the case; but it appears to me quite plain that the authorities bind me to this; nay, I may say more, I think that the nature of the case, the justice of the case, and what is proper to be done between all parties, would bind me to this, that this gentleman should not have liberty to bid until some attempt had been made at least to sell the property, and it had been shewn that that attempt was abortive. I think the authorities go to this extent, and there are dicta which go much further. There are authorities which go to this full extent, namely, that the Court in the first instance will set aside every purchase, or attempted purchase, that is made out of Court by a trustee. The Court even goes a step further than setting aside the sale, and says it will not set it aside at the instance of the trustee, but will fix him, if the cestui que trust so desires, with the price he has agreed by his contract to give; but it will also, if the cestui que trust desires, render it necessary for the trustee to submit to put up again the property for re-sale; it will take the property away from him if more be offered, and it will leave him fixed to the purchase if more be not offered. Then when the case comes before the Court, in several instances it has been asked that the person who had out of Court made an improper purchase should, now that the matter was in Court, be at liberty to bid, and the Court has, principally in bankruptcy cases, declined allowing that course to take place. In bankruptcy it has declined also to allow the solicitor to be admitted to bid in that case for reasons which are extremely sound, namely, that if he be allowed to bid, even on his offer at once to abandon the solicitorship of the estate, he, having been solicitor during the whole of the time, and placing only some new person in office as solicitor for the mere purpose of the particular sale, has brought himself within the reason which has led to this rule, on the part of the Court, as to purchases by trustees, viz., that he had acquired information which he was bound to convey to those for whom he acted; and that the Court could have no security that he would communicate the information to those who were now placed in the adverse position to him of vendors, in order that they might have the benefit of his knowledge to raise the price as against himself. Accordingly, the Court has laid down the principle, which is one of general application undoubtedly, viz., that it is hazardous in the extreme so to place the interests of a man in opposition to his duty as to make it impossible for the Court to exercise any control over him because it could not know what was passing in his mind, or the extent of the information which he had acquired; and that, therefore, it would be better for the interests and the safety of mankind that the Court should lay down the positive rule, that he should have no part whatever in bargaining in his own interest for the acquisition of the property; and in those cases the Court has refused to allow the solicitor to become a bidder, even though he may have offered at that time to lay down his functions as solicitor to the trust estate.

The application of this rule to trustees is as strong in principle though not in practice, because probably the solicitor knows much more about the estate than a trustee. But in this particular case before me, I have a stronger exemplification of it than I could have in any other case, because in this case, though this gentleman has a large debt, and I feel the great hardship he has suffered in not having his money paid at once, he must be acknowledged to be a person having a very large knowledge of the estate, and the estate is a very peculiar one. The whole question has been before me in chambers when Vice Chancellor many times. It is a case in which there is a canal, the trade of that canal depending a great deal upon the goodwill, so to speak, of the persons who may choose to send their goods upon it. This gentleman has been managing it, it appears to me, very skilfully and beneficially for many years. He has been doing all he could towards the improvement of the estate, and has an amount of knowledge with regard to the estate which it is difficult for any other person to possess. Therefore, these cestuis que trust have a right to say "Let us have the full benefit of your knowledge on this point without any motive in the shape of interest which would induce you to withhold it or to diminish aught of the value which you know the estate possesses, because you may fancy the price may be enhanced against yourself; let us have your advice as an utterly free and disengaged person, willing to give us the whole benefit of your information about the estate, and as to putting out the estate to the best possible advantage in the eye of an intending purchaser; do not, therefore, put yourself in the list or category of purchasers."

Then, again, taking it in the converse way, allowing him to bid, would it tend to damage on general principles the sale of the estate? Mr. Karslake has said once or twice, and his junior repeated, that the more bidders the better. That may be very true in one sense. On the other hand, it may well be, as was said in the case before Lord Eldon, that the appearance in the field of a bidder who has a knowledge which the other intending bidders do not possess, may very well keep out everybody else from the field, because they would say, We know exactly what will happen; he will bid me up to what he knows to be, and he knows far better than we, the exact value of the estate; and if we bid above that he will leave us in the lurch, and leave us fixed at a sum greater than the value which the estate possesses: this will be the probable course; as he knows intimately the exact value of the estate, he will be sure not to let us have it at a farthing below that value, and he will desert us when it comes above that sum; therefore, why should we go to the sale at all when everything is likely to be against us and nothing for us? In the first place, I hold the rule to be (I purposely avoid at present saying more) that if those interested in the estate say they believe it to be contrary to their interests that one who is their trustee should be allowed to bid, that estate not having been put up for sale, and no attempt having been made to dispose of it in any other way, the Court will certainly give weight to their objection, and say that until it is distinctly demonstrated to the Court that other ways of selling it have failed, it will not interfere with the reasonable right which they have to object to the trustee being allowed to come into competition as purchaser or bidder at the sale. It is not necessary to say more than that, since no attempt has yet been made to sell the estate. On the other hand, I should be very much startled to find it asserted that any authority has gone so far as to say, if a trustee has a right to have the estate sold because he has a charge on it, say by way of legacy, of 20,000*l*., then that, though no other way can be found of disposing of the estate, it shall be utterly impossible under the eye of the Court, and after the Court has satisfied itself that nobody else would buy, to constitute the trustee a purchaser. No authority, I think, has gone so far as that. I think a way may be found of getting over that difficulty, if such a difficulty should occur. It appears to me that the authorities go to this length, that the Court will not, adversely to those who are adult and who are interested in the estate in the first instance, allow the trustee to come as a bidder. I am therefore obliged to refuse this motion, and I think I must refuse it with costs. But at the same time, I do not think it was necessary for Dr. Trenchard to employ two counsel to say that he did not consent, for Mr. Pearson disclaimed any intention of arguing the case, and considering that Dr. Trenchard was not served with this notice of motion, I think those costs must not be included. The costs of Mr. Freeling's and Mr. Speed's clients will be allowed. The motion will be dismissed with costs as against their clients.

Covenant restrictive of User of Land—Exclusive Right to supply certain Goods—Restraint of Trade—Want of Mutuality—Injunction.

CONTRACT. INTOXICATING LIQUORS.—Upon a conveyance of land, made by the plaintiff (a brewer), a deed of covenant was executed by the grantees that the plaintiff, "his heirs and assigns, should have the exclusive right of supplying all ale, beer and porter which might be consumed in every house or other building which might be erected on any part of the said piece of land, and which should be opened or used as an inn, public-house or beer-shop." The defendant became a subsequent purchaser of the land with notice of the covenant; he afterwards opened a public-house upon the land and supplied it with ale, &c. of his own brewing:—Held, affirming the decision of one of the Vice Chancellors, that the covenant was not invalid either on the ground of uncertainty, want of mutuality, or as being in unreasonable restraint of trade. A demurrer to a bill stating the above facts and praying an injunction restraining the defendant from committing a breach of covenant was overruled.

This was an appeal from the decision of Stuart, V.C., which is reported 38 L. J. Ch. 401, where the facts and arguments of counsel are very fully stated.

Mr. Greene and Mr. Townsend, for the appellant, the defendant.

Mr. E. K. Karslake and Mr. Ayrton, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Greene, in reply.

SELWYN, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Stuart, overruling a demurrer to the bill for want of equity; and the appellant therefore comes before us having thrown upon him the burden of shewing that, under the circumstances stated in this bill, the plaintiff cannot be entitled to any relief whatsoever. Now the bill states that the plaintiff has for a considerable time carried on and still does carry on the business of a brewer, and that he was entitled to "certain land in the town of Brighton which was suited for building, and so capable of being and was intended by him to be dealt with in a manner to promote his business." It then states the purchase by a certain society of a portion of that land; it states the treaty which led to that purchase and the deeds which were then executed; and after stating the deed by which the conveyance was made, it states the deed of even date, which contains the covenant in question, which is a covenant, amongst other things not material to the present purpose, "that the said Charles Catt, his heirs and assigns, should have the exclusive right of supplying all ale, beer and porter which might be consumed in every house or other building which might be erected on any other part of the said piece of land, and which should be opened or used as an inn, public-house or beer-shop." It then states that "the defendant purchased the said lot with notice as a member of the said society, or with notice in fact, or, but for his neglect to make proper inquiry into title in his said purchase, would have had express notice of the hereinbefore-stated indenture of covenants, or the defendant became otherwise bound by the same indenture." It then states that "the plaintiff, in exercise of his exclusive right, has always been and now is ready and willing, and previously to the institution of this suit has offered to the defendant, to supply to the orders from time to time of the defendant for consumption in the said 'Duke of Edinburgh' beer-house, ale, beer and porter, all of good quality, in requisite quantities, and at market or fair and reasonable prices, as specified in the same offer; but the defendant refuses such offer, and denies the plaintiff's said exclusive right, and insists that the defendant has the right of supplying the said beer-house from breweries other than the plaintiff's." Then the prayer of the bill is in accordance with the paragraph which I have just stated, repeating the same offer and asking for an injunction in support of the exclusive right so set up. Now, in answer to that case, many objections have been raised to the legality of this covenant and to the jurisdiction of this Court to enforce such a covenant, or, at all events, as to the propriety of the Court interfering in such a manner as to grant the relief which is sought; and it has been said that, even if the plaintiff has any right, he ought to be left to assert that right in a Court of law. I think, in the first place, it is very material to consider the question which has been discussed as to whether covenants of this nature, or this covenant, actually do or does run with the land. We had occasion very recently[1] to consider the authorities applicable to this question, many of which have been cited to us to-day. The first is the case of Tulk v. Moxhay (11 Beav. 571; 18 L. J. Ch. 83: on appeal, 2 Ph. 774), before Lord Cottenham, who says: "That the question does not depend upon whether the covenant runs with the land is evident from this, that if there were a mere agreement and no covenant, this Court would enforce it against a party purchasing with notice of it; for if an equity is attached to the property by the owner, no one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from the party from whom he purchased." Then he went on to observe with respect to questions which have arisen with reference to devolutions of covenants of this kind having been decided upon certain definite principles as regards the covenants running with the land. In like manner, in the case of Wilson v.

(1) His Lordship was referring to the case of Keates v. Lyon (38 L. J. Ch. 357).

Hart (35 L. J. Ch. 569; L. R. 1 Ch. Ap. 463), which was decided by the then Lords Justices, where the owner of a freehold house entered into a covenant with the plaintiff who was a previous owner, that the building should not be used as a beer-shop, and the house was afterwards let to the defendant as tenant from year to year without express notice of the covenant, it was held, affirming the decision of the present Lord Chancellor, that although the covenant might not at law run with the land the defendant was bound by it in equity; and the late Lord Justice Knight Bruce, in the case of De Mattos v. Gibson (4 De Gex & J. 276, 282; 21 L. J. Ch. 165), put the matter as a matter of principle, not depending upon any such distinction. He says, "Reason and justice seem to prescribe that, at least as a general rule, where a man, by gift or purchase, acquires property from another with knowledge of a previous contract lawfully and for valuable consideration made by him with a third person to use and employ the property for a particular purpose in a specified manner, the acquirer shall not, to the material damage of the third person, in opposition to the contract, and inconsistently with it, use and employ the property in a manner not allowable to the giver or seller." Now it appears to me that upon the statements in this bill the defendant is clearly bound by notice of the present covenant; and that therefore, assuming the covenant to be otherwise unobjectionable, he cannot be heard to say that he, having purchased this property, and no doubt having purchased it at a smaller price in consequence of the title being incumbered with the restrictions contained in this covenant, can now openly disregard the provisions of the covenant. The objections which have been raised are, first, that this covenant is void for uncertainty; but I think the material question to consider is, what is it which the vendor here covenants for? In the first place, this is a covenant entered into as a part of a transaction which resulted in the sale and purchase of a piece of land; it is one of the covenants contained in the deed of even date contemporaneously with the conveyance of the land; it is a part of that transaction; and what the vendor covenants for is that he shall have the exclusive right of supplying all ale, beer and porter which shall be consumed in any building erected on this particular piece of land which shall be used as a beer-house. Now that is a right which, of course, is capable of being abused,—capable of being waived,—capable of being lost; and if at any time, either in the progress of this suit, or at any other time, it can be shewn that it has been so abused, so waived, or so lost, then there would be good ground for saying that this Court ought not to interfere in favour of a person who might otherwise be entitled to the benefit of it. But I am at a loss to see how it can be said that there is anything like uncertainty in this covenant. It might be said that the covenant is too wide, that it is too general; but how can it be said to be uncertain when it is the exclusive right of supplying all ale, beer and porter that might be consumed in this house? It appears to me to be impossible to say, with any reasonable chance of success, that this is a covenant in any degree uncertain. But then the authority of Collins v. Plumb (16 Ves. 454, 460, 461) is cited, and it is stated that is a clear authority for the proposition that a covenant of this kind is so uncertain that a Court of equity will not enforce it. I confess I entirely agree with the learned Vice Chancellor that the case of Collins v. Plumb does not in the least degree govern this case. Lord Eldon observed, as stated in the report, that it was very infirm in its terms. It was a covenant not to sell or dispose of water from a well to the injury of the proprietors of the waterworks, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns; and then Lord Eldon says, "I never met with such a covenant as this, upon which I must try in each instance whether the act of selling the specified quantity of water is a prejudice to the proprietors of these waterworks." He is there obviously referring to the very peculiar language of that particular covenant; and the question as to whether it was or was not to the prejudice of the proprietors of the waterworks was necessarily involved in the very terms, and expressed by the terms of the covenant itself; of course it must, therefore, have been expressed in the terms of the injunction; and therefore he said that a Court of equity could not have any jurisdiction which it ought to exercise upon such a covenant as that. But that covenant has no resemblance to the present covenant, because this is not a covenant not to sell ale, beer or porter to the prejudice of the plaintiff; it is a covenant that he shall have the exclusive right of supplying all ale, beer and porter consumed upon these premises. Therefore, the question as to whether it is to his prejudice is one that cannot be raised, because the extension of a man's trade is of course to his benefit, and the diminution of that trade must be to his prejudice. Therefore it clearly appears to me that the case of Collins v. Plumb has no application to the present case. Then it is said, secondly, that there is a want of mutuality. What I have already said with respect to the nature of this covenant, and the right which is acquired thereby by the vendor, and the circumstances under which that right was acquired, I think has disposed of that objection as to the want of mutuality. But I go even further than that, and I say that even supposing it had been expressed in terms as being a mere option, supposing there had been a covenant for a valuable consideration, being a part of the transaction of the sale and purchase of the land, that so long and so often as the vendor chose to exercise a particular right,—that is, the right of supplying all ale, beer and porter,—he should have that exclusive right, would it be said, because it was optional on his part, therefore there was a want of mutuality, and therefore it could not be enforced? I apprehend that, being for valuable consideration, such a covenant, although it was expressed to be only conditional upon the exercise of a volition on the part of one side or the other, that being expressed in the covenant would not be any objection to the validity of such a covenant. I think, therefore, there is no objection as to the want of mutuality. Of course, a right so acquired is one which, like all other rights, must be reasonably exercised; and of course, as Mr. Greene put it, if a man having a right to sell ale, beer and porter, were to sell some poisonous concoction which he chose to call ale, beer or porter, that would not be a reasonable exercise of that right; neither would it be so if he were to sell good ale, beer and porter at an unreasonable price. Then the third objection that has been urged is, that this is an unreasonable restraint of trade. Now, in the first place, I think the rule which is laid down in the leading case which has been cited, and which is always referred to, of Mitchell v. Reynolds (1 P. Wms. 181), is, that where the restraint is not general, but partial, and is for valuable consideration, then it cannot be said to be an unreasonable restraint. But here it is said that it is unreasonable in one respect, because it is perpetual. I think the rule upon that subject has been well settled by authority, and, as I understand, the rule is this, that where there is a restraint on a person from carrying on trade, when it is unreasonable in law, then the person carrying on trade can apply to the Court to have it removed. The restraint may be limited as to space, though general as to time, and falls within this rule, that a restraint preventing a person from carrying on trade within a certain limit of space, though unlimited as to time, may be good, and the limit of space may be according to the trade he carries on. As an instance of these covenants, I may mention also the case of Wilson v. Hart. It was a specific covenant entered into with a person, his executors and assigns. And then with respect to this particular covenant, it does seem to be one which the Court cannot fail to take judicial notice of as being a covenant which is extremely common; and every Court of justice has had occasion to consider these brewers' covenants: and therefore the Courts must be taken to be cognizant of the distinction between what are called free public-houses and brewers' public-houses, which are subject to this very covenant. Certainly, in my opinion, we should be introducing very great uncertainty and confusion into a very large and important trade if we were now to entertain any doubt, or suggest any, as to the validity of a covenant so extremely common as this is. I think there would be no ground for that sort of distinction which has been relied upon; namely, that such a covenant might be good for twenty-one, fifty or one hundred years, but that it is not good if it is entered into as part of a transaction where the fee simple of a property is conveyed; and in accordance with such conveyance the covenant is made with the vendor, his heirs and assigns. I think, therefore, that no such objections to the covenant can be sustained, especially when they are raised, as they are raised, at the present stage of this cause; because, although at some future period of this cause, upon a motion, as in the case of Hills v. Croll (2 Ph. 60; 14 L. J. Ch. 898), circumstances may be shewn which render it improper for the Court to interfere, or, as has been suggested, it may be shewn at some future time either that the right claimed by the plaintiff is one which he has placed himself in such a situation as that he ought not to be allowed to exercise it, or that the defendant had not notice of the covenant when he purchased the property. All of these things may be proper grounds of objection upon the hearing of the motion or upon the hearing of the cause, and then it might possibly be said that the case of Hills v. Croll might have some application to the question. But this raises the general abstract question, whether a person stated to have notice of such a covenant is to be bound by it or not? Then if we are to look at those cases, in my opinion, it is very difficult to reconcile the case of Hills v. Croll with the case of Lumley v. Wagner (1 De Gex, M. & G. 604; 5 De Gex & Sm. 485; 21 L. J. Ch. 898), which last-mentioned case has been repeatedly followed; and if Hills v. Croll is to stand with that case at all it can only be upon the particular circumstances of the case. What we have to deal with here is the general abstract question, and upon that I can only say, that I entirely agree with the conclusion at which the learned Vice Chancellor has arrived, and I think this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

GIFFARD, L.J.—The appeal in this case is from an order overruling a demurrer, and therefore the whole question to be decided is, whether upon the statements in the bill the plaintiff is entitled to any relief. One thing at least I think is certain, and that is, that if the plaintiff cannot sustain a bill in this Court he is without remedy altogether. It is pretty plain that this is a covenant which does not run with the land. Then with respect to the allegations in the bill: the transaction is a simple one; it is a sale by the plaintiff of land; and when he sold that land he stipulated for a particular covenant. The bill states that the plaintiff was at the date of the sale, and has been and still is, a brewer, carrying on a particular business at a particular place in Brighton, and it states that the defendant had notice of the covenant in question, and then it states this, which is very material, in the 14th paragraph of the bill, that "the plaintiff, in exercise of his exclusive right, has always been and now is ready and willing, and previously to the institution of this suit has offered to the defendant, to supply to the orders from time to time of the defendant for consumption in the said 'Duke of Edinburgh' beer-house, ale, beer and porter, all of good quality, in requisite quantities, and at market or fair and reasonable prices, as specified in the same offer"; and the terms of the covenant are, "that Charles Catt, his heirs and assigns, shall have the exclusive right of supplying all ale, beer and porter which may be consumed in every house or other building which may be erected on any other part of the said piece of land, and which shall be opened or used as an inn, public-house or beer-shop." And Mr. Catt himself is plaintiff, therefore we have nothing to do with what the state of things might be if he had assigned the deed, or if he had died, or anything of that description; but simply the question between Mr. Catt being vendor and this gentleman, who purchased this property with notice of the covenant in question. Now, first of all, upon that covenant it was said that the case was like Collins v. Plumb, which it certainly is not. If, in the case of Collins v. Plumb, the words had been left out at the end of the covenant, "to the injury of the plaintiff," then the case would have been very like it, because the covenant in Collins v. Plumb was not to sell to the injury of the plaintiff. but that they might sell water as long as they did not injure the plaintiff; and therefore on each occasion, as Lord Eldon said, it would have been necessary to try the question whether the sale was to the injury of the plaintiff or not. Nothing of that description would be necessary here; as I have already said, we must assume the 14th paragraph of the bill to be true, and therefore it must be admitted that there has been no breach of any kind on the part of the plaintiff in offering to make and making the requisite supply of that which it would be inferred he was bound to make from the contents of the indenture in question. Then, beyond that, it is said that this covenant is uncertain, which it clearly is not. I do not see how anything can be more certain than that a man is to have the exclusive right of supplying a particular public-house with ale, beer and porter. There undoubtedly is nothing uncertain about that. And again, it has been held in the case of Holmes v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (3 Kay & J. 675) that a grant of an exclusive right of that description contained in a covenant is equivalent to a negative covenant. That being so, it brings the case in principle completely within the cases which have been decided on negative covenants; the cases of Holmes v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company, Rolfe v. Rolfe (15 Sim. 88), and Lumley v. Wagner. With respect to the case of Hills v. Croll, there is great similarity between that case and the present. Lord St. Leonards, in his judgment in Lumley v. Wagner, said that he decided that case under the particular circumstances of it. If the principle in Hills v. Croll lays down this proposition, that wherever there is an allegation which the Court cannot enforce, therefore it is to decline to act upon a negative covenant, all I can say is, that the principle laid down in Hills v. Croll is distinctly opposed to Rolfe v. Rolfe, and is distinctly opposed to Lumley v. Wagner.

Then with respect to its being a covenant in restraint of trade. That again is clearly not so; and in point of fact it does not go beyond the ordinary brewers' covenant, except in this particular, that in the ordinary brewers' covenant you generally have the lessor and lessee, or the mortgagor and mortgagee, whereas this is a sale of a piece of land under different circumstances. If authority were wanted, there is abundance of authority on the subject that a covenant of this description is not void according to the principles which are clearly laid down in this Court.

Upon all these grounds I am clearly of opinion that the demurrer was properly overruled in the Court below, that there is no ground for this appeal, and that it must be dismissed with costs.

prising the whole of his property in favour of the five creditors. It makes no difference as regards the act 13 Eliz. c. 5. whether or not a deed executed in circumstances such as the above comprises all the property of the debtor.

The question on this appeal from a decision of Stuart, V.C. related to the validity of a deed of trust executed for the benefit of five creditors of the grantor.

T. L. Harrison, a nail-maker at Belper, was, on the 8th of June, 1868, by an order made in these suits, directed to bring into Court on the 2nd of November, 1868, to the credit of the causes, the sum of 1,327*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.* which had been found by the chief clerk to be due from him as a trustee. The order was served upon him on the 1st of October. At that time Harrison was considerably indebted to various persons.

On the 24th of October, the indenture in question was executed, by which Harrison conveyed to two trustees certain freehold property, and also assigned to them certain personal effects, subject to a proviso that if he should, on the 29th of April, 1869, pay to five of his creditors who were parties thereto the several debts mentioned in the schedule, the property should be reconveyed and retransferred. The creditors covenanted in the meantime not to sue; and it was provided that Harrison should be permitted to remain in possession of the property for six months, but so as not to let in or permit any execution, extent, sequestration, or other process against the real or personal estate comprised in the deed, or against Harrison, his heirs, executors or administrators, in respect thereof; and in case any such should be attempted to be enforced, the permission thereby authorized was to cease. A power of sale was given to the trustees in case default should be made in payment of the debts.

The deed was duly registered as a bill of sale. It substantially comprised all Harrison's property.

Harrison having failed to pay the money into Court in accordance with the order, a writ of sequestration was issued, under which, on the 23rd of December, 1868, the sequestrators took possession of the freehold property and seized the personal effects mentioned in the deed. On the following day the trustees gave notice of the deed to the sequestrators, and required possession to be delivered to them as owners of the property. A motion was then made in the suit by the trustees of the deed that the sequestrators might be ordered to withdraw from possession, and for an inquiry as to damages. The sequestrators also moved for leave to sell the property. On these motions coming on, an inquiry was directed as to whether the trustees had any and what interest in the property. The chief clerk having certified that the trustees had no interest in the property, they moved to vary the certificate, when the Vice Chancellor held that the deed was valid, and varied the certificate accordingly, by finding that the trustees were entitled to the property. The sequestrators appealed.

Mr. Mackeson and Mr. W. W. Cooper, for the appellants.—This deed was fraudulent within the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5. These cases all depend upon the intent. A debtor may at any time pay any one of his creditors in preference to others; but it must be a real payment in cash. A mortgage of all his property does not fall within that doctrine, and there is no case where such a mortgage has been supported. From Holbird v. Anderson (5 Term Rep. 235) to Wood v. Dixie (7 Q.B. Rep. 892), all the cases go to payment only, and not to such a sweeping mortgage as this. The very completeness with which all the property is included proves the intent to defraud all creditors except those specially provided for by the deed. See Evans v. Jones (4 L. J. Ex. 25; 3 Hurls. & C. 68). The words of the act of Elizabeth may be compared with the almost identical words in the Bankrupt Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 136. s. 67). It cannot and will not be contended that this deed would not have constituted an act of bankruptcy within the latter act. The like inference must be drawn that it comes within the earlier act—Stewart v. Moody (1 Cr. M. & R. 777; 4 L. J. Ex. 55); Goodricke v. Taylor (2 De Gex, J. & S. 135); Ex parte Foxley (L. R. 3 Ch. 515).

[GIFFARD, L.J.—The two acts have very different objects. I do not think that inferences can be drawn in the same way in both cases. We have nothing to do with acts of bankruptcy, and I cannot see any application of cases concerning bankruptcy. Have you not to satisfy me that the arrangement was one for the debtor's own benefit?]

We say that the circumstances apparent on the face of the deed and the facts which have been proved sufficiently demonstrate fraud. There is no case where a conveyance of this kind for the benefit of particular creditors has been supported—Nunn v. Wilsmore (8 Term Rep. 521).

Mr. Dickinson and Mr. Solomon, for the trustees of the deed, were not called upon.

GIFFARD, L.J.—There is no doubt that Harrison executed this deed at a time when he knew that a writ of execution would be issued against him for not obeying the order to pay in money. I think, however, that the law has been accurately laid down by the Vice Chancellor consistently with a large body of authority. His Honour says: "The question in this, as in all other cases, is, as to the bona fides of the transaction. If the deed of mortgage and bill of sale was executed by Harrison honestly for the purpose of giving a security to the five creditors, and was not a contrivance resorted to for his own personal benefit, it is not void, but must have effect." There is no doubt that under this deed these five creditors are to have the property, and are secured by means of it. Two arguments have been raised: first, from the proviso giving special powers to the trustees, under which the debtor obtains, it is said, a benefit; and, secondly, from the fact that the deed includes the whole of the property; and these, it is contended, prove the deed to be fraudulent. As to the proviso, I cannot infer from it that the deed is not intended to operate according to its tenor. It was a mortgage which was not to become absolute unless execution issued. If execution issued, then the mortgagees' powers were to become at once exercisable, and the trustees were to take possession. The evidence also shews that this deed was to have this effect. As to the second point, I may observe that we are not now dealing with the law of bankruptcy. I asked, during the argument, why proceedings in bankruptcy had not been taken. The answer was, that the appellants relied upon the invalidity of this deed. If this appeal succeeded, the only effect would be that the sequestrators would get paid in full whilst the other creditors would get nothing, a case exactly similar to that now complained of. I have no hesitation in saying that, if the deed is bona fide, it makes no difference, so far as regards the statute of Elizabeth, whether or not it includes the whole property. By bona fide I mean that the deed is intended to operate according to its tenor, and is not a mere cloak for providing something for the benefit of the person who makes it. In case of a bankruptcy it might be very different. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—The creditors of a woman remaining unpaid after her marriage in respect of debts incurred before the marriage, have a right to be satisfied out of her property, in priority to any equity to a settlement out of it which she may possess. Therefore the assignee of the bankrupt husband, against whose estate the wife's debts had been proved, has a right to set aside a post-nuptial settlement of the wife's property. And the wife's equity to a settlement can only arise when an amount equal to the amount of her debts has been provided out of her estate.

The plaintiff in the first of these suits, Augusta Barnard, was the wife of the defendant J. G. Barnard, and the object of that suit was to obtain the performance of the trusts of a post-nuptial settlement, dated the 17th of January, 1862, whereby an annuity of 300*l.* for Mrs. Barnard's life was settled to her separate use, subject to certain prior charges; the defendant Ford being the trustee. The annuity had been the property of Mrs. Barnard before her marriage.

At the time of the marriage (the 22nd of October, 1861) Mrs. Barnard was largely indebted to various persons, as also was Mr. Barnard.

On the 15th of November, 1862, Mr. Barnard was adjudicated a bankrupt.

Carrick, the plaintiff in the second suit, was the official assignee of the estate. He instituted the suit in his official capacity (no creditors' assignee having been appointed) for the purpose of setting aside the settlement, and obtaining possession of the annuity as part of the bankrupt's estate. It appeared that Mrs. Barnard's creditors, or a large number of them, were still unpaid as well as those of Mr. Barnard. Their debts were proved in the bankruptcy. The annuity, if recovered, would constitute the only assets belonging to the bankrupt's estate. Under these circumstances, the Master of the Rolls dismissed the bill in Barnard v. Ford, with costs, and in the second suit declared the settlement void as against the creditors of Mrs. Barnard before her marriage.

From these decrees Mrs. Barnard appealed.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. H. Smith, for the appellant.—This settlement is a marriage settlement, which, though post-nuptial, gives effect to the wife's equity to a settlement, and therefore cannot be set aside. At all events it cannot be wholly set aside, as her fair equity to a settlement must be provided for—Spirett v. Willofs (35 L. J. Ch. 755; L. R. 1 Ch. 520).

Mr. Southgate and Mr. Bevir contended that there could be no equity to a settlement as against the wife's creditors.

Mr. Jessel and Mr. W. W. Karslake, for Ford, the trustee.

Mr. H. Smith, in reply.

SELWYN, L.J.—There is no real difficulty in this case, and no dispute about facts. The only question which we have to deal with in a case like this is, whether the husband was at the date of the settlement so indebted that, according to the principles of this Court, the settlement ought to be set aside? This, in the present case, appears by Mr. and Mrs. Barnard's own evidence. It is clear that they both owed large sums at the date of the marriage, which are still unpaid, and it is admitted that he had not then, and has not now, any property of his own. It is clear that many of her debts are still unpaid notwithstanding some allegations to the contrary, for they are proved in the bankruptcy. The husband, then, in this state of circumstance, makes a settlement of property which would be his own during the coverture: can he do this as against his creditors? In my opinion certainly not. And I think that he was unable to do so, not only as against his wife's creditors, as the Master of the Rolls has thought, but as against his own creditors. I think the plaintiff Carrick is entitled to set the settlement aside entirely, and the decree must be slightly altered in form, so as to extend to the husband's creditors generally. The settlement being set aside, a question arises whether Mrs. Barnard is entitled to any equity to a settlement out of the property? That question, of course, can only have any substance if there be any property of the wife which can be settled.

It has been contended that if a lady at the time of her marriage owes more than the amount of all her property, she nevertheless has an equity to a settlement out of her property. To accede to this would be simply to convert this Court into an engine of fraud, and it cannot be entertained. The proper declaration should be, That Mrs. Barnard is entitled to no settlement until after provision is made from her property of an amount equal to the debts owing by her at the date of her marriage, which shall, previously to the chief clerk's certificate, be proved under her husband's bankruptcy. There will be an inquiry as to the amount of her property and that of her debts so proved; and a further inquiry whether Mrs. Barnard is entitled to any settlement, regard being had to the above declaration. The costs of all parties in the second suit may be paid out of the fund. The appeal in the first suit must be dismissed, with costs.

GIFFARD, L.J.—It was contended that this case was like Spirett v. Willows. It would have been so if the debts had all been originally those of the husband, but here we are asked to sustain a wife's equity against her own creditors. It would be contrary to good conscience to do so, and there can be no equity to a settlement till the wife's debts are provided for.

Debtor and Creditor—Acceptance of new Debtor in place of old—Change of Firms.

COMPANY. PARTNERSHIP.—A. lent to B. & C. divers sums of money to be expended in executing certain works for which B. & C. were contractors. B. & C. during the period in which these advances were being made transferred all their contracts to a company, which undertook to indemnify them against all liabilities incurred by them in respect of the contracts. The money advanced by A. was actually expended by the company in the manner contemplated. A. refused to acknowledge the company as the borrowers of the money, and required the promissory notes which were given for repayment to be made by B. & C, which was accordingly done. About a year later A. accepted from the company interest upon the loan up to date. Beyond a few letters relative to the amount of interest no communication took place between A. and the company:—Held, that, upon the company being wound up, A. could not claim to be a creditor of the company for the amount of the notes, as he had not accepted the company as his debtors.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, allowing a claim of G. S. Gibson to be a creditor of Smith, Knight & Co., Limited, for 5,791*l.* 19*s.*, in respect of six promissory notes, together amounting to 5,150*l.* and interest.

Messrs. Smith & Knight were in the year 1864 contractors for making the Saffron Walden Railway. In February of that year they obtained from Mr. Gibson, a banker at Saffron Walden, an agreement for an advance of money to enable them to carry on their works.

On the 8th of April, 1864, the above company was formed for the purpose of purchasing and carrying on the business of Smith & Knight, including the above-mentioned contract. The purchase was accordingly effected, and the company undertook to indemnify Messrs. Smith & Knight against all claims under their contracts as from the 1st of April, 1864.

Gibson was an original shareholder of the company, and Smith & Knight were among the first directors.

In accordance with his agreement Gibson made advances amounting altogether to 5,150*l.*, by giving credit to Messrs. Smith & Knight in their account at his bank. The advances were made at various dates ranging from the 2nd of April to the 29th of November, 1864. It was arranged that promissory notes should be given for the advances, to be payable in five years, with interest in the meantime at 5*l.* per cent.

On the 12th of August Mr. Gibson wrote to Mr. Smith as follows:—

"In reference to the notes for the advances made, I suppose they will be drawn jointly and severally in the names of Smith and Knight, not by the company, as our arrangement was with you as individuals, and we know nothing of the company in the transaction. They should be made payable five years after date, or on demand, with an indorsement stating that they are not to be called for before the expiration of the five years. The first should be dated the 1st of April, and the next the 1st of July. There is a third now required, as I see you have drawn for a further sum. They can be as well drawn in your office and sent down signed."

The notes in question were accordingly, after the date of the above letter, given by Smith & Knight, who drew upon Gibson's bank as occasion required for the amount advanced. The money was expended by the company in executing the works of the railway.

In November, 1865, an application was made by or on behalf of Gibson for interest then due; whether such application was made to the company or not did not appear, but it was proved that the secretary of the company wrote to Gibson, asking how the amount claimed, 305*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, was made up. To this a reply was sent to the company correcting a clerical error of the secretary, and stating how the interest was calculated.

On the 22nd of February, 1866, the secretary sent to Gibson's bank a cheque for the interest, and also a cheque upon Gibson's bank by Smith & Knight for 195*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*, the balance then standing to their credit upon their drawing account; and asking that this amount might be placed to the credit of the company upon a new account then to be opened. This was accordingly done, and Smith & Knight's account was closed.

On the 30th of November, 1866, a resolution to wind up voluntarily was passed by the company, which was, on the 18th of December, followed by a supervision order.

The Master of the Rolls, holding that Gibson had adopted the company as his debtors, and that they were bound to pay the debt, admitted the claim.

From this decision the liquidators appealed.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. Westlake, for the appellants.—There was certainly no adoption by Gibson of the company as his debtors. The letter of the 12th of August, 1864, is distinctly opposed to such a view; and nothing afterwards done had any effect in altering the position of the parties. Smith & Knight were not released. What consideration, therefore, did the company, as between themselves and Gibson, get for the adoption of this debt? The payment of interest is no such adoption: this was done merely as agents of Smith & Knight, though, as they were bound to indemnify Smith & Knight, it was a convenient arrangement. It had no effect upon the position of the parties—Liversidge v. Broadbelt (4 Hurls. & N. 603; 28 L. J. Ex. 332); In re the Commercial Bank Corporation of India and the East; Jones's case (16 W. R. 958).

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Chitty, for Gibson.—Mr. Gibson's money came to the hands of the company, and was spent by them knowing that it was borrowed from him. How can it be said that there was no consideration for the debt? The substance of the agreement between the company and Smith & Knight was to assume all the assets and the liabilities of the old firm. They did so in fact. They paid the interest, and there was no suggestion that they paid as agents, but they paid it as a payment to which they were liable. Moreover, Gibson knew that they were liable, and he adopted them in receiving from them the interest.—In re the Commercial Bank Corporation of India and the East, ubi supra, supports this view. Very slight knowledge and acquiescence on the part of the creditor will in these cases of transfers of business constitute an assent to the transfer of the liability and acceptance of the new debtor, when as here, the engagement to pay the debt is already in existence. But we do not contend that Smith & Knight ceased to be liable, but only that the company became liable also.—Rolfe v. Flower (L. R. 1 P.C. 27); Ex parte Williams (Buck, 13); Ex parte Jackson; In re Warwick (2 Mont. D. & D. 146); Ex parte Clowes (2 Bro. C.C. 595); Winter v. Innes (4 Myl. & Cr. 101).

[GIFFARD, L.J.—That case merely decides that in every case these are questions for a jury.]—Hart v. Alexander (2 Mee. & W. 484; 6 L. J. Ex. 129); Ex parte Peele (6 Ves. 602); Lindley on Partnership, vol. 1, pp. 393, 440-454.

Mr. Westlake, in reply.—There was no act of acquiescence here, therefore, cases deciding that slight acts are sufficient do not apply. The letter of the 12th of August is the only fact of importance, and that is clear beyond doubt.

SELWYN, L.J.—In the case of In re the Commercial Bank Corporation of India and the East, I believe it was not the intention of the Lord Chancellor, and it certainly was not my intention, to lay down any rule in opposition to the authorities cited to the Court. On the contrary, the Lord Chancellor referred to the case in the Privy Council (Rolfe v. Flower) as a sound authority, and I also accepted that case, as affording a proper test to apply to these cases, and I referred to the observations of Vice Chancellor Wigram in the case of Benson v. Hadfield (4 Hare, 32; 12 L. J. Ch. 89), to the effect that lapse of time and other circumstances may be most material, which entirely concur with the observation of Lord Cottenham in Winter v. Innes. Assuming that slight circumstances are in ordinary cases sufficient to prove the acceptance of a new firm as debtors, still I must remark that where these circumstances are controlled by express declaration the rule has no application. In applying those observations to the present case, and taking the test which is supplied by Rolfe v. Flower, I will assume in favour of the respondent that the company took over all the assets and became subject to all the liabilities of the previous firm. It appears that Mr. Gibson was an original shareholder in that company, and the company appears from its memorandum to have been formed having for one of its objects to carry into effect an agreement for the transfer by Smith & Knight of their business, goodwill and plant, including the lease held by them of the premises in Great George Street, and to execute the contracts comprised in the agreement. It appears that among the directors appointed were Mr. Smith and Mr. Knight, and that Mr. Knight was by the articles of association to be the managing director. It is obvious that Gibson, being a shareholder in the company, must be taken to have had not only constructive but actual knowledge of the transaction which was the very foundation of the company, and the letter of the 12th of August, 1864, shews that at and before that date his attention had been pointedly called to the distinction between Smith and Knight as individuals and the new company which had been formed. He then, on the 12th of August, 1864, that is to say, four months after the company had been formed and after he had become a shareholder, wrote to Mr. Smith, one of the two persons who had transferred their business to the company, this letter.—[His Lordship here read the letter above set out, dated the 12th of August, 1864.]—This is a letter written some considerable time after the original agreement for the loan had been made, at a less, but still at a considerable, time after the formation of the company, and it plainly refers to the distinction existing between the former partnership of two and the company. It is written with a full knowledge that all the business of the two had been transferred to and was being carried on by the company. But, notwithstanding that, it contains the express declaration, "We know nothing of the company in the transaction," there is no denial of that by the other parties to the original contract. In pursuance of the original contract, as enforced and explained in this letter, the promissory notes are given not in the name of the company or with any reference to the company, but in the names of Smith & Knight, and those notes so given are retained from that time down to the present in the custody of Mr. Gibson. I admit that, notwithstanding all this, it still was competent to the parties to enter into a new agreement and arrangement. But I cannot admit that, after such a declaration as that, slight circumstances would be sufficient to prove an entirely different arrangement. If this letter had been written before the company was formed, if it had been written at an earlier period, different considerations might have arisen. But having regard to the circumstances which had occurred before the date of this letter, and having regard to the position in which the parties stood at the time when the letter was written, and so the manner in which it was acted upon by both parties, I think very strong circumstances would be required to prove that an arrangement so entirely the opposite of the original one was subsequently come to. It is stated that the case need not be carried as far as that, and perhaps in that respect the respondents may be considered to have some weight in their argument. They say, "We do not insist upon the release of the obligation on the part of two original parties to the contract, but we say there was an agreement by which the company became liable." The only circumstances, however, from which that can be inferred are: first, a demand which was made for interest; secondly, the payment of the interest; and thirdly, the transfer of the account which was made in the books of the bank, though but very slight reliance was placed upon the last fact. First, with respect to the demand for interest, it must be remembered that the promissory notes were not yet due. One instalment of interest did become due, and the original letter demanding payment of that instalment has not been produced. On the one side it may be said, that in the absence of any evidence it may be presumed that Mr. Gibson would continue of the same mind he was in on the 12th of August, when he said he would have nothing to do with the company, and that he made the application for interest to the company merely as the agents of the persons whom he treated as his debtors. On the other hand, it is justly said that the letter having been written by Mr. Gibson to Mr. Smith, it is rather for the company than for Mr. Gibson to produce that letter. No doubt it does appear that the letter was answered by the officers of the company, and the subsequent correspondence is with the company. Therefore there is weight in that observation. One of the subsequent letters may be considered as an expression of a hope on the part of Mr. Gibson that the interest would be paid; that is a letter which is addressed to the company, and in pursuance of that the company pay the interest. Without deciding that, under ordinary circumstances that demand (if it be a demand) and that payment of interest would be sufficient, I think we must look at that payment of interest and that letter with the light derived from the letter of the 12th of August, 1864. I think that Mr. Gibson, having told the company distinctly that he did not know them at all in the transaction, cannot be said to have assumed a different position as between himself and them merely because the letter written by him was answered by the officer of the company in a letter containing an allusion to, and a promise to pay, the interest, and because Gibson acquiesced in that and wrote a letter referring to that interest and received the interest from the company. I think this is very properly described as a slight circumstance, and in my judgment entirely insufficient to outweigh the other matters to which I have referred.

What took place afterwards with respect to the accounts is a circumstance upon which no great reliance can be placed. It appears that there was an account in the books of the bank with Smith and Knight. The interest did not enter into that account at all on one side or the other, and the explanation given is that it was considered a separate transaction of Mr. Gibson's. That account shewed a balance of 195*l*. 12*s*. 7*d*., for which a cheque was drawn, and a new account having been opened with Smith, Knight & Co. (Limited), the 195*l*. 12*s*. 7*d*. was carried to the credit of that account. That is a transaction even more slight, I think, than the other, and one which may be safely disregarded in the consideration of the present case. Therefore, the conclusion at which, with great respect to his Lordship the Master of the Rolls, I arrive is, that being bound, as we are, sitting in the position of a jury, to decide upon these facts, there being certain facts which appear to me to be clear and distinct, and on the other side certain matters which are in themselves equivocal, I cannot hesitate to say that in my judgment the plain and distinct declaration contained in the letter of the 12th of August, 1864, has not been qualified by any of the subsequent transactions. I think, therefore, that the order which has been made by the Master of the Rolls must be reversed; I think the official liquidator who has succeeded in this matter should have his costs here and in the Court below out of the estate, but Mr. Gibson will not have any costs or be called upon to pay any either here or in the Court below.

GIFFARD, L.J.—In cases of this description there is no difficulty whatever about the law. In each instance the matter is a matter of fact, and in this case the real question is, whether there was or was not a contract between Mr. Gibson and the limited company, that the limited company should pay Mr. Gibson this debt. Of course, to a contract there must be two parties, and both parties must assent. As regards the cases which have been cited, there is no doubt whatever that if you have an old firm, and either a new partner is taken into it or a new firm constituted, and the assets are taken over by that new firm, and the customer, knowing all those circumstances, afterwards goes on and deals with the new firm, you infer from slight circumstances an assent on his part to accept the new firm as his debtors. That is not a doctrine that I dispute, nor do I dispute anything said by the present Lord Chancellor in Jones's case. No doubt all his Lordship intended to say was, that the facts there did not come up to what was requisite in order to constitute Mr. Jones a creditor of the new firm; that two things at least were necessary, knowledge of the arangement between the old and new firms and assent on the part of Mr. Jones. Now, here it is admitted that there is nothing in the sense of novation proper. It could not, in fact, be argued that the right to go against Smith and Knight individually had been given up. Therefore we start with that. Then we have the company formed in April and May, and the transaction in question completed in the month of August. The transaction is an agreement for a loan, not to be called in for five years, a loan to Smith & Knight. The agreement was that promissory notes should be taken from Smith & Knight. Besides that, a letter was written by Mr. Gibson to Mr. Smith, in which he says, "In reference to the notes for the advances made, I suppose they will be drawn jointly and severally in the names of Smith and Knight, not by the company, as our arrangement was with you as individuals, and we know nothing of the company in the transaction." There can be nothing, I think, more explicit than that, and this being the origin of the transaction, the knowledge of the arrangement between Smith and Knight and the company does not appear to me to be material, unless you can make out that there was some intention to vary the original agreement. Then, what happens afterwards? The advances are made to Smith & Knight, and placed in the bank, in which Gibson was a partner, to the credit of Smith & Knight. One payment of interest is made, and that by the limited company. The application for the payment of that interest appears to have been made to the limited company. Nothing more than that happened up to the time of the winding-up, except the transfer of the balance, which I will mention presently. The Master of the Rolls says, that at the outset of the transaction it was not intended that the limited company should be liable. He seems to have based his judgment upon the fact of the 195*l*. 12*s*. 7*d*. being transferred from the account of Smith & Knight with the bank in which Mr. Gibson was a partner into the account of Smith, Knight & Co. (Limited). But when you come to investigate the transaction, it amounts to nothing more than this: Smith & Knight drew a cheque upon their banking account. That cheque is accompanied by a letter from the limited company, in which they ask that that sum should be transferred to the account of the limited company, and that the account of Smith & Knight should be closed. That is the whole of the transaction, and in argument it was admitted, very properly, that that could not alter the liability. There is, after every fact is known, a distinct arrangement in which the liability of the company is altogether repudiated. There is nothing but an application for interest, and interest paid by the limited company, carrying on the business of Smith & Knight, carrying on that business in the very offices of Smith & Knight, and being in point of fact the very persons to whom Smith & Knight would refer anyone for the payment of interest. I cannot infer, nor do I think any jury could, from the mere payment of interest infer, either an offer on the part of the company to give security to Mr. Gibson, and still less any agreement by Mr. Gibson to accept that further security. The whole matter comes to this, that as between Mr. Gibson and the limited company there was no contract, and there being no contract, there can be no proof by him against the company.

Companies' Act, 1862, s. 38. — Past Member — Forfeiture of Shares — Liability for Past Debts.

COMPANY.—The holders of forfeited shares in a company limited by shares are liable to contribute in the winding-up as past members, although the articles of association do not expressly reserve the rights of the company against them.

This was an application by the official liquidator to put the name of Mr. Creyke on the list of contributories as a past member of the company.

Mr. Creyke's shares had been forfeited (for non-payment of a call) within a year from the commencement of the winding-up.

In the 50th clause of the articles of association were these words: "The forfeiture of any share shall involve the extinction at the time of the forfeiture of all interest in, and all claims and demands against the company in respect of the share, and all other rights incident to the share; but any member whose shares have been forfeited shall, notwithstanding, be liable to pay to the company all calls owing on such shares at the time of such forfeiture.

Since the winding-up began Mr. Creyke had paid all calls owing on his shares at the time of the forfeiture.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. Napier Higgins appeared for the official liquidator.

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Speed, for Mr. Creyke, argued from clause 50. of the articles of association, that after the forfeiture of the shares and payment of the calls then due upon them, all the rights of the company against the shareholder were satisfied, and that the creditors had no further right, since they had given credit to the company, subject to the power of the directors to declare the shares forfeited, and thus deprive the company of its rights against the shareholder. This distinguished the present case from The Accidental and Marine Insurance Corporation; Bridger and Neill's case (38 L. J. Ch. 201; L. R. 4 Ch. Ap. 266), in which the rights of the company against the holder of forfeited shares were expressly reserved by the articles of association. Moreover, the Companies' Act, 1862, s. 38. cl. 4, enacted, that no contribution should be required from any member exceeding the amount (if any) unpaid on his shares; and here nothing was "unpaid" since nothing could become owing. They also quoted the language of Lord Cairns in Stocken's case (37 L. J. Ch. 230; L. R. 3 Ch. Ap. 415).

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS (July 15) held, that the question was settled by Bridger and Neill's case, which determined that the forfeiture of shares did not put an end to the shareholders' liability to contribute in respect of the liability of the company existing at the time of the forfeiture.

Costs—Number of Counsel.

COSTS.—Costs of a brief to a second Queen's counsel on the hearing of the cause allowed, he having before he had been called within the bar been the defendant's junior counsel in the cause.

This was a summons to review a taxation of costs. The bill had been dismissed with costs. The defendant had retained a Queen's counsel. Before the hearing of the cause the junior counsel, who had prepared the defendant's answer, and had also cross-examined the plaintiff on his affidavits, had been called within the bar. On the hearing briefs were delivered to the Queen's counsel originally retained, to a junior, and to the Queen's counsel who had at first been the defendant's junior. The Taxing Master disallowed the costs of the brief to the last-mentioned counsel, certifying that there was nothing in the nature of the cause to take it out of the ordinary rule of the Court as to the allowance of the costs of two counsel only.

Mr. Southgate and Mr. Edmund James, for the defendant, asked that the costs of the third brief might be allowed. They referred to Betts v. Clifford (1 Jo. & H. 74, 78).

Mr. Locock Webb, for the plaintiff.—In Carter v. Barnard (16 Sim. 157; 17 L. J. Ch. 278), where the costs of a second Queen's counsel were allowed, the facts were difficult and intricate. In Green v. Briggs (7 Hare, 279; 19 L. J. Ch. 294), the costs of a second Queen's counsel were not allowed either on the ground of the difficulty and intricacy of the case, or because he had whilst without the bar settled the pleadings. He also referred to The Midland Railway Company v. Brown (10 Hare, App. xliv.; 22 L. J. Ch. 1092).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—There are cases both for and against the decision of the Taxing Master. If a brief had not been given to the counsel who had been called within the bar, he might have been retained by the other side with all the knowledge obtained by him in the suit, to the disadvantage of his former client. I think the costs of the brief to the second Queen's counsel ought to be allowed.

Practice—Ward of Court—Settlement upon Marriage after Majority—Payment out of Court.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. INFANT.—Where a ward of Court married the day after attaining her majority:—Held, that a small fund in Court might be paid out to her upon her separate examination.

The appellant, Mrs. Radclyffe, had been a ward of Court. She attained the age of twenty-one years on the 8th of August, 1866, and married the next day. During her minority the surplus income of some property to which she was entitled for life, for her separate use, had been paid into Court and invested, and at the date of her marriage consisted of 363*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* consols, and 53*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.* cash.

In January, 1867, she presented a petition for transfer and payment out of Court to herself of these sums. The Master of the Rolls refused to do this, but directed inquiries whether the marriage was a valid one; whether any settlement had been made upon her, and if not, directing a settlement to be made of her fortune.

On the 13th of July, 1867, an order was made in chambers, which stated that the Judge was of opinion that he could not restrain the anticipation by her of the income of her fortune, and ordered the costs of the petition to be paid out of the 363*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* consols, and directed the residue to be carried over to a settlement account, and ordered payment to her of the income upon her separate receipt, and also the sum of 53*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*

When the costs were taxed and paid the amount of the consols was reduced to 95*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.*

Another order of the 24th of July, 1867, directed a certain sum of 85*l.* 4*s.* 1*d.*, which was payable by other parties to the cause to Mrs. Radclyffe, to be also settled. From these orders for settlement Mrs. Radclyffe now appealed.

Mr. Speed, for Mrs. Radclyffe, asked that these sums might be paid to her. They were her separate property, and the Court had exceeded its usual jurisdiction in directing a settlement to be made of them. The marriage having been after the majority was no contempt of Court, which is the ground of the jurisdiction usually exercised in these cases. He referred to—Leeds v. Barnardiston (4 Sim. 538); Austen v. Halsey (2 Sim. & S. 123); Long v. Long (2 Sim. & S. 119; 21 L. J. Ch. 844); Money v. Money (3 Drew. 269; 24 L. J. Ch. 684); Biddles v. Jackson (3 De Gex & J. 544; 28 L. J. Ch. 40, 290); Longbottom v. Pearce (3 De Gex & J. 545, n.); Martin v. Foster (7 De Gex, M. & G. 102; 24 L. J. Ch. 519). As to separate examination, since the fund is now under 200*l.* it is unnecessary.

Mr. Campbell, for the husband.

SELWYN, L.J.—In this case there is a very small fund in Court. It is hardly necessary to keep it in Court, which must be attended with expense. I think that we have sufficient authority in Longbottom v. Pearce for paying out the fund to the wife. The lady should however attend to be separately examined, although the fund is under 200*l.*

GIFFARD, L.J., concurred.

Practice—Appeal for Costs.

COSTS.—The Court is not disposed to extend the exceptions to the general rule that there can be no appeal for costs alone.

Trustees, having been ordered personally to pay the costs of the suit, were not allowed to appeal on the ground that the costs ought to have been ordered to be paid out of the trust fund.

This was an appeal by the defendants, who were trustees, from so much of a decree of Vice Chancellor Malins as ordered them to pay the costs of the suit.

A preliminary objection having been taken that the appeal was for costs only, and could not therefore be entertained,

Mr. M. Cookson, for the appellant, contended that the case of trustees formed an exception to the general rule that there could be no appeal for costs alone. Angell v. Davis (4 Myl. & Cr. 360; 9 L. J. Ch. 3) was a case in which the costs formed the sole subject-matter of the appeal, and Lord Cottenham, after reviewing the authorities, said, "These cases seem to me to establish several propositions, any one of which is sufficient to support my jurisdiction on the present appeal; the costs are part of the relief specifically prayed; they are not mere personal costs, but are given out of the fund; and the whole of the facts, moreover, distinctly appear upon the face of the proceedings themselves, so that it is not necessary in determining the question to enter into any investigation of the merits." If the first reason stated by his Lordship must be taken to be overruled by the subsequent case of Lancashire v. Lancashire (2 Phil. 657, 662; 10 Beav. 26; 16 L. J. Ch. 48), at all events, upon the second ground the appeal would lie, for, if the order had been for payment of the costs out of the trust fund, the cestuis que trust could have appealed, and there would be no mutuality if the trustees could not appeal in such a case as the present.

He cited also Bagot v. Bagot (Daniell's Ch. Pr. 1349 (4th edit.); 10 L. J. Ch. 116).

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Graham Hastings, who appeared for the respondents, were not called upon.

SELWYN, L.J., after referring to Angell v. Davis and Lancashire v. Lancashire, and to Umpleby v. the Waveney Valley Railway Company (1 Jo. & H. 254), in which Wood, V.C. preferred the opinion expressed by Lord Cottenham in Lancashire v. Lancashire to that in Angell v. Davis, said the first ground upon which the right to appeal was rested might be considered to be entirely disposed of by the authorities; and with regard to the second proposition stated by Lord Cottenham, it was enough to say that in this case the costs were not given out of the fund. The third ground upon which Lord Cottenham entertained the appeal in Angell v. Davis was, that the whole of the facts appeared upon the face of the proceedings themselves, so that it was not necessary to enter into any investigation of the merits. In that case costs had been given to a trustee who had been guilty of a breach of trust, and the error manifestly appeared on the face of the proceedings; but that was not the case here, for the Vice Chancellor had exercised his discretion as to costs upon the merits of the case, and this Court could not decide whether that discretion was or was not properly exercised without going into the merits. Bagot v. Bagot was really the only case that was cited in support of the proposition. But in that case there was a substantial question to be tried on the appeal, which was not limited to the question of the payment of the costs of the suit, and the trustees, as representing all the persons entitled to the fund, had an interest in the subject-matter of the suit. That case, therefore, had no application to the present. If in every case where a trustee or a creditor asserted that he was entitled to have his costs paid out of a particular fund, he were to be allowed to appeal upon the question of costs alone, the exceptions to the general rule, that there could be no appeal for costs only, would be very much increased in number. His Lordship adhered to the opinion which he had recently expressed in Hope v. Carnegie (L. R. 4 Ch. 264), that the general rule prohibiting appeals for costs only was not only well established but a very wholesome rule; the present case formed no exception to it, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

GIFFARD, L.J. concurred.—He could not accede to the argument, that because if the costs had been ordered to be paid out of the fund, the persons interested in that fund might have appealed; therefore the trustees when ordered to pay them personally ought to have a similar right. If the present appeal were allowed, he did not see why there should not be an appeal for costs in every case. He was not disposed to extend the exceptions established by Lord Cottenham in Angell v. Davis; and Bagot v. Bagot was not a case of an appeal for costs alone. He agreed that the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Mutual Insurance—Unstamped Policy, 35 Geo. 3. c. 63.

COMPANY. MARINE INSURANCE.—S. made an application in writing to become a member of a mutual insurance association in respect of an insurance for 300*l. upon his ship; the ship was accepted, and an unstamped copy of a policy returned to him. By the regulations of the association he would have to contribute to losses upon the ships of other members. No stamped policy was ever received by him. He contributed to losses upon some ships of various members. His own ship sustained an injury, but before the amount of the loss could be estimated, the association was ordered to be wound up*:—Held (affirming the decision of one of the Vice Chancellors), that he was not a contributory, as the unstamped policy could not under 35 Geo. 3. c. 63. be received in evidence of his agreement to become a member.

This was an appeal from an order of Vice Chancellor James, removing the name of J. W. Smith from the list of contributories to the association.

It appeared that the association was composed of shipowners, and under its provisions the members agreed together to mutually insure their ships in proportion to the amounts for which they should respectively take shares. On a shipowner becoming a member the custom was as follows: he signed a written proposal or statement of the particulars of his ship and the amount for which he proposed to insure; after the acceptance of the proposal he signed a power of attorney authorizing the secretary of the association to underwrite policies on ships approved by the committee, and a policy was given to him.

Smith, on the 6th of September, 1864, made an application in writing in the usual form addressed to the secretary authorizing him to insure his ship the "Holyrood" for 300*l.*, and agreeing to abide by the rules of the society.

The ship was accepted and a form of policy was sent to Smith, which was unstamped and bore the heading "copy." Smith never received any other policy, nor did he sign any power of attorney, but he paid the usual entrance fee and also a call which was made in February, 1865, in respect of losses upon ships belonging to members of the association. Smith received no policy beyond the unstamped copy. The "Holyrood" was injured at sea on the 1st of February, 1865, upon which Smith made a claim upon the society, which was admitted by the secretary, subject to the amount being afterwards settled. This amount had not been finally settled when, on the 1st of July, 1865, the association was ordered to be wound up.

On the 26th of April, 1869, the order now under appeal was made by his Honour upon the ground that as no stamped policy had ever been executed upon his ship, there was no contract, receivable in evidence on Smith's part, to become a member of the association.

Mr. Eddis and Mr. Lindley, for the appellant, the official liquidator.—We contend that though we cannot tender the form of policy as a policy (35 Geo. 3. c. 63. s. 14), yet there is a good agreement for mutual indemnity contained in Mr. Smith's application, fortified by his subsequent conduct. The contract is not destroyed by the non-existence of the policy. They referred to several subsequent acts—54 Geo. 3. c. 144; 7 Geo. 4. c. 49; 7 Vict. c. 21; which refer to mutual insurance. Now, it is true that the act 30 Vict. c. 23. s. 7. enacts, that no contract for marine insurance shall be valid unless contained in a policy; we say that that act does not refer to mutual insurance. There is no express authority, but the following cases bear upon the subject—Taylor v. Dean (22 Beav. 429); Bromley v. Williams (32 Beav. 177; 32 L. J. Ch. 716); Harvey v. Beckwith (2 Hem. & M. 429); Mead v. Davison (3 Ad. & E. 303; 4 L. J. K.B. 183). Smith, moreover, is estopped by his conduct from denying that he is a member—Underwood's case (5 De Gex, M. & G. 677; 23 L. J. Ch. 943).

Mr. Macnaghten, for Smith, was not called upon.

SELWYN, L.J.—We entertain no doubt that the Vice Chancellor was right in ordering the name of Mr. Smith not to be included in the list of contributories. The question depends entirely upon the construction of the act 35 Geo. 3. c. 63. The case of the appellant cannot be put more favourably to him than by saying that a contract in writing was entered into, and for some time acted upon by both parties to it. What, then, was the contract? In my judgment it was a contract for insurance. Then, how is that contract affected by the Stamp Acts? Assuming that before the act of 1867 a policy of insurance was not necessary, still the question remains whether this was not a contract for insurance within the meaning of the act 35 Geo. 3. c. 63. Now, section 1. of that act provides that from and after the 5th of July, 1795, there shall be raised, levied, collected and paid for every skin or piece of vellum or parchment, or sheet or piece of paper, upon which any insurance upon any ship or ships shall be engrossed, printed or written the stamp duties thereinafter mentioned. A stamp duty is, therefore, imposed upon everything effecting an insurance, and this casts upon the appellants the duty of shewing that these contracts of mutual insurance are exempt from the act. Then section 11. enacts, that "every contract or agreement which shall be made or entered into for any insurance, in respect whereof any duty is by this act made payable shall be engrossed, printed or written, and shall be deemed and called a policy of insurance." Then we come to section 14, which is most material, as it contains an express reference to agreements for insurance. That section enacts, that "no insurance made or entered into in Great Britain in respect whereof any duty is by this act made payable, nor any contract or agreement for such insurance as aforesaid, shall be pleaded or given in evidence in any Court, or admitted in any Court to be good, useful or available in law or equity, unless the vellum, parchment or paper on which such insurance shall be engrossed, printed or written shall be stamped with the lawful stamp to denote the rate or duty as by this act is directed, or to denote some higher rate or duty in this act contained; and it shall not be lawful for the said Commissioners of the said Stamp Duties, or any of their officers, to stamp any vellum, parchment or paper with any stamp directed to be provided or used by virtue of this act at any time after such insurance as aforesaid, or contract for such insurance, shall be engrossed, printed or written thereon under any pretence whatever." That section plainly applies not merely to policies for insurance, but to any agreement or contract for such insurance. It is perfectly unlimited in its language, and there is no ground for the contention that the contract in the present case was not a contract for a policy of insurance, and therefore not within the words of the act. I agree with the Vice Chancellor that it is not the duty of a Court of law or equity to be astute to find out ways in which the object of an act of the legislature may be defeated. Some reliance was placed in argument upon the 18th section of the act, which provides that nothing in the act contained shall extend to subject any of the members, officers or servants of the corporation of the London Assurance and the Royal Exchange Assurance to any of the penalties by the act imposed for or by reason of their making any agreement, insure by any label, slip or memorandum in writing upon unstamped vellum, parchment or paper. The proviso, however, at the end of the section, "provided that in every such case a policy of insurance according to the agreement expressed in such label, slip or memorandum shall be made out according to one of the forms in the schedule to this act annexed, and duly executed and stamped within three office days from the time of making such agreement as aforesaid," puts an end to the argument, and shews that this section cannot operate to take a contract for insurance out of the provisions of the act. In the present case, therefore, the contract entirely failed, for by the act we are precluded from taking notice of it as having any effect whatever at law or in equity. The name of Mr. Smith was, therefore, rightly omitted from the list of contributories. Underwood's case, which was cited, has really no application, and there has been no such laches, on the part of Mr. Smith, as can disentitle him from now saying that there is no contract binding him to become a member of this company. The decision of the Vice Chancellor was right, and the appeal motion must be refused, with costs.

GIFFARD, L.J.—Mr. Smith cannot be made a member of the company unless it can be proved that he entered into a binding mutual contract for the insurance of ships. The contract, if there was any, was unquestionably a contract in writing, and I agree with the Vice Chancellor that, having regard to the act 35 Geo. 3. c. 63, there is no document which can be read as evidence of that contract. It is clear under that act that every contract in writing for the insurance of ships must be stamped, and cannot be used in evidence if it is not, and there is no difference between a Court of law and a Court of equity with regard to the evidence which can be used in support of such a contract. Then it was said that Mr. Smith is estopped from denying that he entered into this contract. But there is a complete answer to that argument in the fact that Mr. Henzell was the agent of the association as well as the agent of Mr. Smith. Moreover, with regard to laches, I can find nothing to say that Mr. Smith was too late in making his application to be removed from the list of contributories. The appeal must, therefore, be refused, with costs.

This was a motion for a decree in a suit seeking the conveyance of certain premises from the defendant, under the following circumstances. In February, 1868, certain messuages and land at Stanningley, in Yorkshire, stood limited (subject to a mortgage in fee simple) to the use of John Stringer and his heirs, for the life of Harriet Whitehead, with remainder to the use of John Stringer and Betty his wife, in her right in fee. John Stringer had also a prospective interest in the premises as tenant by the curtesy in case the remainder in fee should vest in possession during the coverture. On the 7th of February, 1868, John Stringer and the plaintiff respectively entered into and signed an agreement in writing, by which Stringer agreed to sell and the plaintiff agreed to purchase, free from incumbrances, the premises, including the fixtures, for 710*l.* At the same time the plaintiff paid a deposit of 50*l.* upon his purchase-money. At this time the plaintiff was in ignorance of Betty Stringer having any rights in the property of which he believed John Stringer to be the absolute owner. On the 28th of March, 1868, the abstract of title to the premises was delivered, and by his solicitor's perusal of it the plaintiff for the first time became aware of Betty Stringer's interest in the property. On the 21st of April, 1868, the solicitors of Mr. and Mrs. Stringer approved, on their behalf, of the draft conveyance to the plaintiff submitted to them by the plaintiff's solicitor, and at the same time they notified their readiness to comply with a request made by a memorandum in the margin of the draft by the plaintiff's solicitors, to the effect that the deed must be duly acknowledged by Mrs. Stringer. Thereupon the plaintiff's solicitors proceeded to engross the draft-deed so approved.

On the 22nd of April, before the deed to the plaintiff had been executed, the defendant, who was an innkeeper at Stanningley, and a neighbour of the plaintiff and the Stringers, and who had notice that the said John Stringer had entered into some agreement with the plaintiff for the sale of the premises to him, entered into a written agreement with John Stringer and his wife for the purchase of the same premises for 710*l.*, the fixtures to be taken at a valuation, and on the 25th of April the said Stringer and his wife executed to the defendant a conveyance of the premises in accordance with such agreement, and Stringer returned to the plaintiff his 50*l.* deposit, by coming to the plaintiff's house in the evening when he was in bed and leaving the money upon the bed. The same day the defendant received the rents of the tenants. On the 27th of April the plaintiff's solicitors tendered the draft conveyance to Messrs. Barstow, the solicitors of Mr. and Mrs. Stringer, and an appointment was made for the completion of the purchase on the 1st of May. On the 30th of April Messrs. Barstow wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors informing them that Stringer and his wife had already sold the property to another purchaser. Both the agreement for sale to the plaintiff and the conveyance to the defendant were registered in the West Riding Registry on the 1st of May, the defendant's deed being first upon the register. The plaintiff filed this bill against Wood alone, not making the Stringers parties, to obtain a declaration that the premises were purchased by and conveyed to the defendant subject in equity to the contract between John Stringer and the plaintiff for the purchase thereof, and that the defendant held the property bound by such contract either to the extent of the fee simple, or if not to the extent of John Stringer's interest therein, and for consequential relief.

The defendant, by his answer, stated that he never knew of Betty Stringer's interest in the property till the 15th of April, 1868, when John Stringer informed him that the bargain between himself and the plaintiff was off, and he was in a position to sell the property, and that his wife had an interest in the property, and refused to convey to the plaintiff, and he further stated that Mrs. Stringer had informed him and his solicitor that she refused to recognize the contract with the plaintiff or to convey the premises to him.

The defendant further insisted that J. Stringer was a necessary party to the suit.

Mr. Amphlett and Mr. Bagshawe, for the plaintiff.—The case of MacCormick v. Grogan (L. R. 4 E. & I. App. 82), proved that the defendant was a trustee for the plaintiff. The plaintiff was entitled to have a conveyance from the defendant of the whole estate—Nelthorpe v. Holgate (1 Coll. 203); Wilson v. Williams (3 Jur. N.S. 810).

Mr. Kay and Mr. Williamson, for the defendant.—The real question was, whether there was any binding contract with the plaintiff. The plaintiff claimed a right to take the husband's interest, but there was no contract which could have been enforced against him—Wilkinson v. Castle (37 L. J. Ch. 467); Maw v. Topham (19 Beav. 576); Thomas v. Dering (1 Keen, 729; 6 L. J. Ch. 267).

Mr. Amphlett, in reply.—We say there was a binding contract between the plaintiff and Stringer, and that the defendant had notice of it. If Stringer had obtained a conveyance from his wife he would have been a trustee of the whole estate for the plaintiff, and the defendant must stand in the same position. This case was not touched by the authority of Wilkinson v. Castle, ubi supra, for there the husband had nothing of his own in the estate. Murrell v. Goodyear (1 De Gex, F. & J. 432; 29 L. J. Ch. 425) shewed that a reasonable time must be given for the husband to obtain the consent of his wife. At all events, the plaintiff was entitled to a conveyance from the defendant of Stringer's estate pur autre vie, with compensation for the rest of the estate which he contracted to sell—Nelthorpe v. Holgate, ubi supra. Thomas v. Dering, ubi supra, had been disapproved of by Lord St. Leonards—Sugd. Vend. & Pur. (last edit.) 380. Stringer when he entered into the contract with the plaintiff was well aware that he had no title to the whole estate, and that made this a case of fraud.—He also referred to Mortlock v. Buller (10 Ves. 292).

JAMES, V.C.—In this case the plaintiff seeks specific performance of a contract entered into by Stringer. Stringer without question entered into a contract binding on himself. It turns out, however, that he was not owner in fee simple, his only estate being an estate pur autre vie, and the possiblity of an estate by the curtesy, the remainder being vested in his wife. The wife did not do any act by which she bound herself to ratify the contract. She had the power of assenting, but she did not adopt the means which the law gives her of so doing, and the husband is under no obligation which this Court can recognize to compel her to do so, for in the eyes of this Court the wife is a free agent, and can convey according to her own uncontrolled will. The question must, therefore, be decided just as if the vendor had been tenant for life, with remainder to any other person in the world with whom he had no connexion. In this state of things, Wood comes in, and with full notice of the contract between Stringer and the plaintiff, makes a new one, under which he becomes the purchaser of the interest both of the husband and wife. The plaintiff's first contention is, that the defendant is bound to give full effect to the first contract. I do not, however, think the purchaser of the wife's estate is bound to give effect to a contract which did not affect her estate, and since her estate was not bound by it, the purchaser from her has, as regards it, the same equity as if the first contract had not been made. But that is not the whole of the case, for the plaintiff says, "If I cannot get more from you than I would get from the husband, yet you took his estate, and I have the same equity against you as against him." I am of opinion that he has; and supposing that no purchase had intervened, and the same bill had been filed against the husband, the question is, whether the plaintiff would not have been entitled to a decree to the extent of the husband's interest, with compensation in respect of the interest of the wife. Upon that point two cases have been cited, one on either side, viz., Thomas v. Dering, where, for reasons which I confess I do not understand, specific performance with compensation was not decreed, and Nelthorpe v. Holgate, where relief was given under circumstances almost precisely the same as in the present case. The husband here represented himself to be the owner in fee. The plaintiff entered into a contract with him in ignorance of any defect in title. The husband therefore would be bound to convey whatever interest he had. The defendant is bound to the same extent; and it is for the Court to find out, in the best way it can, what compensation can be made. There must be a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to a specific performance of his contract to the extent of Stringer's interest, with a reference to chambers to inquire what compensation should be made for the interest of Mrs. Stringer.

Will—Construction—Charity—Trust or Condition.

CHARITY. TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—Devise of houses to the W. Co. "for this intent and purpose and upon this condition," that they should make certain annual payments, the greater part of which were charitable. The surplus income was thus disposed of: "The rest of the profits of the said houses and tenements I will shall be bestowed upon the reparations of the said houses and tenements":—Held, having regard to the whole scope of the will, that the devise was for the intent and purpose of making the payments, and upon the condition of keeping the property in repair; and that the company was beneficially entitled to the surplus income after affecting these objects.

This was an information seeking to establish that the defendants were trustees for charitable purposes of the whole income of certain property, after satisfying a specific annual payment of small amount.

The will of William Kendall, dated the 31st of January, 1558, contained the following devise:

"Also I give unto William Kendall, my son, all my houses and tenements in Old Change, in the parish of Mary Magdalen, in London, at Old Fish Street; and to have and to hold unto the said William and to the heirs of his body lawfully begotten, and for default of such issue I will that the Master and Wardens and Commonalty of the Mystery of the Waxchandlers, of the city of London, and their successors, shall have the said houses and tenements for this intent and purpose, and upon this condition, that they shall yearly distribute eight pounds of lawful money of England after this manner (that is to say), to the poor inhabitants of the parish of Mary Magdalen aforesaid, at Old Fish Street, four pounds lacking two shillings in gowns for men and women, and coals, at the discretion of the churchwardens of the said parish to be given and delivered unto the said poor inhabitants in the month of December yearly, and the said two shillings to the churchwardens of the said parish for their painstaking; and to distribute yearly to the poor inhabitants of the parish of Bexley, in the county of Kent, thirty and eight shillings of good and lawful money of England, to be given and delivered yearly about the third and fourth days of November yearly, by the discretion of the churchwardens and chief inhabitants of the said parish of Bexley then being, and two shillings to the churchwardens of the said parish of Bexley for their great pains; and thirty and five shillings to be distributed unto the poorest men and women of the Company and Mystery of the Waxchandlers of London, and the other five shillings to be distributed to the Master and Wardens of the Waxchandlers for the time being equally; and the rest of the profits of the said houses and tenements I will shall be bestowed upon the reparations of the said houses and tenements. And if the Master, Wardens and Commonalty of the Mystery of the Waxchandlers of London and their successors do leave any of these things undone above rehearsed, then I will that the next-of-kindred unto me, the said William, shall enter into the said tenements, and them have and hold unto him and unto his heirs for ever, upon condition that he and they, and every of them, do all these things above rehearsed, in all points as it is above rehearsed by me."

The testator's son, William Kendall, died without issue. From a period shortly after the testator's death the surplus rents of the property comprised in the devise, after deducting the 8*l.* charged upon them, had been more than sufficient for the repair of the houses, and at the date of the present suit they amounted to about 330*l.* a year.

There was no evidence as to the mode in which the surplus rents had been dealt with.

The information prayed a declaration that the defendants were not entitled for their own benefit to the whole income of the property, subject to an annual charge of 7*l.* 15*s.*; but that they were trustees of the property, and of the whole income thereof for charitable purposes, subject to the specific payment of 5*s.* annually given to the Master and Wardens, and to such increased allowance (if any) as might be proper in respect of that payment.

Mr. Jessell and Mr. F. Vaughan Hawkins, for the informant.—A gift for repairing a charity house is a charitable gift, and, if the exact purpose of a charitable gift fails, the Court applies the money to other charitable purposes. This gift is upon trust, not upon condition. Although the specific gifts do not exhaust the whole income, the general intention that the whole should be applied to charitable purposes must prevail—The Attorney General v. the Coopers' Company (3 Beav. 29). This is in accordance with the rule laid down in The Corporation of Beverley v. the Attorney General (6 H.L. C. 310; 27 L. J. Ch. 66), that if the whole rents are apportioned among charitable objects so as to exhaust them, any increase of rent must be devoted to the same charitable purposes.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. C. Browne, for the defendants.—The intention of the testator was to benefit the defendants. The fact that the specific gifts do not exhaust the income is evidence of this—The Attorney General v. Trinity College (24 Beav. 383); The Attorney General v. the Dean and Canons of Windsor (24 Beav. 679; on appeal, 8 H.L. C. 369; 27 L. J. Ch. 320: on appeal, 30 L. J. Ch. 529); The Attorney General v. the Cordwainers' Company (3 Myl. & K. 534); The Attorney General v. Brazenose College (2 Cl. & F. 295; 1 L. J. Ch. 66); The Mayor, &c., of South Moulton v. the Attorney General (5 H. L. C. 1; 23 L. J. Ch. 567).

Mr. Jessel, in reply.—In The Attorney General v. Trinity College the will shewed the testator's intention that the devisee should take beneficially, and there was no trust of the property devised. It differs from the present case in both these points. An early decision on the subject is Eltham Parish v. Warreyn (reported in Duke on Charitable Uses, 641).

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS (Aug. 6).—The construction of the will raises a point which, so far as I am acquainted with the cases on the subject, is new. It is this. A testator, possessed of real property producing more than 8*l.* per annum, gives it to the Waxchandlers' Company and their successors, "for this intent and purpose and upon this condition," that they pay divers sums for charitable purposes, amounting in the whole to 7*l.* 15*s.* He then gives 5*s.* to the Master and the Wardens of the Company and goes on thus: "And the rest of the profits of the said houses and tenements I will shall be bestowed upon the reparations of the said houses and tenements." Does this direction infer a benefit to the company? If they perform the obligation of keeping the property in repair, is the company entitled to take the rest? or to whom does it go?

This is clear, that if it had been given to the company or to any stranger limited merely with a condition of keeping the premises in repair, the whole would go to that person provided he performed the condition. It is clear also that more than is required for the purpose cannot be expended in repairs, though it may be wasted; and it is, therefore, to my mind, evident that I must read this trust, or this condition, whichever it may be, as if these words, "so far as may be necessary," had been introduced into the will with reference to it. It is clear also that, at the time of the death of the testator's son, when the income of the property was 16*l.* per annum, clear of all reprises, the surplus income was far more than was necessary for the repairs of the houses.

There are three sets of persons who may claim this surplus. The first claim is that of the charities; the second claim is that the surplus is undisposed of and belongs to the heir of William Kendall; and the third claim is that of the company itself.

I am of opinion that the charities cannot claim more than the specified annual payment given to them. I have searched in vain for a case of this description:—A devise in these words: "I give my farm of Whiteacre to A. and his heirs for ever, upon trust out of the rents to pay 100*l.* per annum to the St. George's Hospital, and to apply the rest of the rents in repair of the farmhouse"; the rents far exceed the sums required for these purposes; is there any disposition of the residue? A. clearly cannot take it, as the devise to him is in trust. Is the heir of the testator disinherited? If it had not been that the surplus is given in trust to repair the farmhouse, it is clear that the heir would take the estate subject to the payment of the rentcharge to the hospital. Can the charity say, we are entitled to the whole? Does the charity stand in any better position in this respect than a private individual? I apprehend not; but if it does, I am unable to discover on what principle; and if so, must the whole or the principal part be given to charity? For it is to be observed that, in the present case, the whole is not, properly speaking, given to charity. How does the gift of 3*l.* 18*s.* to the poor of St. Mary Magdalen and 1*l.* 18*s.* to the poor of the parish of Bexley differ from the 5*s.* given to the Master and Wardens of the company? It is true that the first two payments are charitable, and that the last is a personal gift to the persons who, from time to time, fill the offices of Master and Warden (for it is important to observe that the 5*s.* is not given to the company; the commonalty are nowhere mentioned as partaking in it; it is a personal legacy to be divided annually amongst the persons who fill those offices). If the whole income is now to be distributed pro rata, the Master and Wardens annually must take such a share of the increased income as 5*s.* at the date of the testator's death bore to the then existing income of the property. I think that it is impossible, when the testator says that the rest shall be bestowed upon the reparation of the houses, to hold that this is a gift to charity. It would be impossible, even if all the other part of the income were devoted to charity, which it is not. I am of opinion that I must read this residuary gift in one of two ways: either, first, as if the testator had said, "I give what may be required for the repairs of the property, and the rest to nobody"; or, secondly, as if he had said, "I require, as a condition inseparable from the devise I have made, that the devisees shall, out of the rents, keep the property in repair": and I am of opinion, for various reasons, that the proper mode of reading the will is to treat the words in question as expressing a condition appurtenant to the devise already made, and not as a separate and independent devise.

My principal reasons are to be found in the will itself. It is obvious to me from the whole scope of the will that the testator intended to benefit the company. In the beginning of the will he recites that he is himself a member of the company. In the next place, the devise to the company is complete: it is to the master, wardens and commonalty, and their successors. If it had gone on and simply said "upon this condition," no question would have arisen, and the company would have taken the whole; but the will says, "It is for this intent and purpose and upon this condition." I am as little entitled to convert the whole devise into a trust under the first two words as I am to reject the first two words, and treat it as an absolute devise solely on condition. I think that the fair way of reading it is either by examining the whole scope of the will to see which words were intended to predominate, or to read the words distributively, and to hold that the devise is for the intent and purpose of making the payments after stated, and upon the condition, after stated, that you keep the property in repair, and that on failure in the performance of the trusts and conditions you are to deliver it over to my kindred.

Another proof of the testator's wishing to benefit the company is that he gives 35*s*. to the poorest men and women of the company, and a third proof is the gift he makes to the Master and Wardens. Observing all this in the will, I observe also that in express words he gives no benefit at all to the Company qua company unless it is to be obtained by the surplus rents being included in the general devise. That the testator considered that the person who performed his wishes or carried his bequests into execution ought to receive some return is obvious from his gift of 2*s*. to the churchwardens of the parish of St. Mary Magdalen and of the parish of Bexley, yet he gives the Company in express words, as I have observed, nothing.

Another consideration also impresses me strongly. Unless some benefit were to be derived from doing all that the testator required, what inducement was there to the Company to undertake the trust, or what terror was there in the threat of forfeiture if the Company did not perform these duties? And, further, what motive could be found in his kindred to undertake a troublesome trust that would do them no good if they were to be in the same situation? The Company would lose nothing. The 35*s*. to the poor men and women of the Company would be paid by the kindred and the 5*s*. to the Master and Wardens exactly the same as before. But the circumstance which presses most strongly on me is this: I think that it is to be inferred from the will that the testator intended that if the Company failed to perform his wishes his kindred should stand in the place of the Company. Were the kindred to take the property on trust, or were the Company to take the property beneficially? The kindred, in my opinion, clearly take the property beneficially, not only because unless they did so they could not be induced to undertake gratuitously an onerous burthen, but also because the property is expressly given to them upon condition that they do the things above cited in all points. What possible reason can be assigned for the testator intending the charities to take the whole of the property if the Company administered the estate, but only the exact sum specified by him if his kindred administered it? What appearance is there that the testator preferred the unknown kindred to his own Company in the matter? The testator gave the property to the Company, subject to a trust and upon a condition. The condition is clearly expressed when the gift over to the kindred takes effect. My opinion is, that the kindred are merely substituted for the company, and that the Company and the kindred have both alike the same powers and interests. If the Company do not perform the matters entrusted to them, then the kindred, as the testator doubts not, will do so.

It is always to be remembered in these matters that it is a question of intention, to be gathered from the whole of the will; and the question on this will is, Did the testator intend the whole of the property, which, judging from the accounts of the rental, must have produced a surplus at the date of his will, after providing for the repairs, to be divided amongst his legatees, or did he intend that his Company should derive some advantage from his devise? I think the latter. I think the information fails, and that it must be dismissed.

Curtesy, Tenancy by—Equitable Seisin of Wife—Separate Use—Legacy—Words of Limitation—" And " for " or "—Lapse.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—Freeholds were devised to trustees upon trust to hold the same unto and to the use of A, her heirs and assigns for ever, for her separate use. A. died, leaving a husband and child surviving, without having made any disposition of the property:—Held, that the husband became tenant by the curtesy.

WILL.—Testator directed real estate to be sold, the proceeds to go in equal moieties between A. and B, as tenants in common, and their respective heirs or representatives:—Held, that these words were words of limitation, and that the share of A, who predeceased the testator, lapsed.

This was the further consideration of a suit for the administration of the trusts of the will of Samuel Duffield.

Testator, by his will, made in 1843, gave all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for his wife for life, and after her death (or during her life with her consent), as to a lot of sixteen freehold houses therein specified, to sell the same and invest the proceeds; and after charging the said sixteen houses with the payment of certain legacies, he gave the surplus proceeds in equal moieties between Sarah Gaywood and Alice Key, as tenants in common and their respective heirs or representatives. Then as to five other freehold houses, upon trust, after the death of his wife, to hold the same unto and to the use of Alice Key, her heirs and assigns, free from the control, intermeddling, debts or engagements of any husband with whom she might intermarry, her receipt alone to be sufficient discharge to the trustees for the time being for all purposes and upon all occasions, with a gift over in the event of her dying without having any child or children. And as to the residue, upon trust for his wife Alice Duffield, her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns absolutely. The testator added a proviso that every gift to or devolving on a female by that his will should be deemed to be for her sole separate use, and not subject to the debts or power of her husband, and should be settled upon her in such manner as if she were a feme sole, with power to her to give receipts.

There was a codicil to the will, but not affecting the questions now under consideration.

The testator died in 1858, in which year Alice Key intermarried with Robert Appleton, and by her the present suit was instituted after the death of the testator's widow, in 1864.

Since the institution of the suit, however, Alice Appleton had died intestate, leaving her husband and one of three children by him surviving.

The question which now came on for argument was, whether Robert Appleton, the husband, was entitled as tenant by the curtesy to the five freehold houses of which his wife had died equitably seised in fee, the same having been devised to her in fee to her separate use.

Mr. C. Hall, for Robert Appleton, argued in favour of the curtesy.—As at law the husband would hold by curtesy such estates as the wife was legally seised of at the time of her death, so in equity the curtesy must attach to those estates of which the wife died equitably seised. The separate use clause only operated during the coverture to exclude the husband as against the wife.—He referred to Lewin on Trustees (5th edit.), p. 524, and the cases there cited, pointing out the several conflicting decisions upon the point. He also cited

Taylor v. Meads (34 L. J. Ch. 203); Lechmere v. Brotheridge (32 Beav. 353; 32 L. J. Ch. 577); Harris v. Mott (14 Beav. 169); Moore v. Webster (36 L. J. Ch. 429; L. R. 3 Eq. 267).

Mr. Bazalgette and Mr. Horsey, for the surviving child, contra, argued that as the expressed intention of the testator was to exclude entirely the husband's marital interest in the property, there could be no right to the curtesy; the essential principle of that tenure was, that the husband should have an inchoate right during the lifetime of the wife. Moreover, the decision of Lord Hardwicke in Hearle v. Greenbank (3 Atk. 716), overruling his previous dictum in Roberts v. Dixwell (1 Atk. 609), was distinct upon the point, and was regarded as the law by Vice Chancellor Stuart in Moore v. Webster, ubi supra.

MALINS, V.C. (without calling for a reply).—This question arises in respect of the husband of Alice Key, as to whether he is entitled to curtesy out of the five freehold houses which were devised by the testator to the trustees of his will to stand possessed thereof unto and to the use of Alice Key, her heirs and assigns, for ever, for her sole and separate use. The devise, therefore, is to her in fee simple with a direction that the property shall be for her separate use.

The effect of such a devise was to give her power to alienate the property without the concurrence of her husband. If she had conveyed it by deed or devised it by will the trustees would have been bound to convey the legal estate to any person taking under such deed or will. Now, why should not the husband have curtesy in this property as to which the wife at the time of her death had the whole equitable estate in fee?

The separate use clause is for the protection of the wife, and would have entitled her as against her husband to make an alienation. She has died without making any disposition of her property, and was seised of the equitable estate in possession. My opinion is that the estate is subject to curtesy. It would, I think, be contrary to every principle that a clause introduced solely for the benefit and protection of the wife should exclude the husband from his right to curtesy?

No doubt the authorities are conflicting. In Roberts v. Dixwell, where the testator directed trustees to convey a fourth part of his property to the use of his daughter for life for her separate use, so that her husband should not intermeddle therewith, and after her decease in trust for the heirs of her body, Lord Hardwicke thus expresses himself: "The next question will be, whether the devise to the wife for her separate use will bar the husband of his tenancy by the curtesy? I am of opinion it will not, because here is a sort of seisin in the wife." On the other hand, we have the contrary opinion expressed by Lord Hardwicke in Hearle v. Greenbank, where the rents of the estate were to be applied to the separate use of the wife, and the trustees who had the fee in all the real estate were to permit the wife to dispose of it. Lord Hardwicke decided that the husband could not hold by curtesy, because the whole legal estate of inheritance was in the trustees. But in the case of Follett v. Tyrer (14 Sim. 125) where property was conveyed to trustees in trust for the separate use of the wife for life with remainder as she should appoint, and in default of appointment to her right heirs for ever, and the wife had died without exercising the power, Sir L. Shadwell held that her husband was entitled to the curtesy. Then there is the recent case of Moore v. Webster, where the real estate was limited to the separate use of the wife, to be assigned and disposed of as she might think fit by deed or will. Vice Chancellor Stuart held, that the husband was not entitled to curtesy, on the ground that he was totally excluded from any marital interest. I am unable to concur in that decision, for there the whole equitable fee was given to the wife. The true criterion is, whether the wife was seised of an equitable estate of inheritance. From a review of the cases, and upon the sound principles of law, I think that wherever a wife at the time of her death is seised of an estate in fee simple or fee tail in possession, whether legal or equitable, the husband cannot be excluded from the curtesy; he will therefore, in this case, be entitled to this estate for life by the curtesy.

A further question was then argued, whether the share of Sarah Gaywood (who had predeceased the testator) in the surplus proceeds arising from the sale of the sixteen houses had lapsed, or whether her children or their representatives took by way of substitution, the terms of the bequest being that the surplus should go " in equal moieties between Sarah Gaywood and Alice Key as tenants in common, and their respective heirs or representatives."

Mr. Whitehorne, for the children and grandchildren of Sarah Gaywood, argued that the gift must be regarded as substitutional. If necessary, the Court would read " and their respective heirs, &c." as if it were " or," in order to effectuate the testator's obvious intention.

He cited In re Porter's Trust (4 Kay & J. 188; 27 L. J. Ch. 196); Salisbury v. Petty (3 Hare, 86); In re Newton's Trust (L. R. 4 Eq. 171); The King v. Cleaveland (4 De Gex, & J. 477; 28 L. J. Ch. 835); Gittings v. M'Dermott (2 Myl. & K. 69; 4 L. J. Ch. 217); Crawford v. Trotter (4 Madd. 361); Wilson v. Vansittart (Amb. 562).

Mr. J. Humphrey, for persons in the same interest.

Mr. J. T. Pearson, Mr. Langley and Mr. Grenside, for parties interested in the event of the legacy having lapsed, were not called upon.

MALINS, V.C.—The general rule upon this point is, that where personal property is given in terms that would carry the fee simple in land, the gift is absolute, and in such gifts the use of the word " or " prevents a lapse. If in the present case the gift had been to Sarah Gaywood and Alice Key, or their heirs or representatives, I should have followed the cases which have been cited, and held that the children or representatives took by way of substitution; but here unfortunately it is " and their heirs or representatives." If Sarah Gaywood had survived the testator no doubt she would have taken an absolute interest. The testator seems to have had some doubt whether in using the word " heirs " he was employing the right word, therefore he adds " or representatives," so the bequest is to them and their heirs, or to them and their representatives,—the word " representatives " being used as a substitute for heirs, but not as a substitute for the original donees. I am of opinion therefore that these words are words of limitation, and Sarah Gaywood having died in the testator's lifetime there is a lapse as to her share, and there must be a declaration to that effect. Crawford v. Trotter is scarcely applicable to the present case: that was not a gift to a person and her heirs simply, but to her " and her heirs (say children)," that is, to her and her children. My doubt is whether she should not have taken jointly with her children.

allowed by her trustees for sixteen years after her death to remain invested on the same mortgage; and, secondly, moneys which had been advanced by E. F. on mortgage, and on the mortgage having been paid off after her death had been received by one of her trustees as agent for T. O.

SPECIAL CASE. Elizabeth Furness, by her will, dated the 16th of March, 1841, bequeathed to John F. Ogle and J. Watson 3,000*l.*, upon trust for her sister Martha Ogle, for her life, with remainder for her five nieces and their children as therein mentioned; but if all her said nieces should die without leaving issue, then on trust for her niece Thomasin Ogle. And after bequeathing 4,000*l.* to her said trustees on trusts for the said Thomasin Ogle and her children, or her nephews and nieces as therein mentioned, and bequeathing other pecuniary legacies, the testatrix bequeathed all her residuary personal estate to Thomasin Ogle, and she devised all estates vested in her as mortgagee to her said trustees, and appointed Thomasin Ogle sole executrix of her will. The testatrix died on the 17th of November, 1843, and her will was proved by Thomasin Ogle. By her will, dated the 11th of May, 1857, Thomasin Ogle bequeathed to the defendants, William Ogle and William Lawton, "all my money and securities for money of every description," upon trust for her sisters Elizabeth Ogle, Harriett Ogle and Hannah Jane Ogle, for their lives, with remainder to her nephews therein mentioned absolutely, and she bequeathed her residuary personal estate to her said three sisters, whom, with her trustees, she appointed executrixes and executors of her will. Thomasin Ogle died on the 12th of March, 1859. At the death of Thomasin Ogle all the legacies and debts of Elizabeth Furness had been paid except the said legacy of 3,000*l.*, and the personal estate of Elizabeth Furness then consisted of the following particulars:

1. 3,025*l.* stock of the Bank of England, standing in the name of J. Watson, the surviving trustee of E. Furness's will.

2. Three shares in the Barnesley Canal Company, value about 230*l.*, standing in the name of E. Furness.

3. 670*l.* secured on mortgage advanced in 1845, by J. F. Ogle and John Watson, in their names, with Thomasin Ogle's approbation, out of moneys belonging to the estate of E. Furness.

4. A sum of 600*l.*, advanced by Elizabeth Furness on mortgage in her own name, and which remained on the same mortgage until after the death of Thomasin Ogle.

5. A sum of 1,200*l.*, formerly secured to Elizabeth Furness on a mortgage in her own name. This mortgage, in 1857, was paid off to Thomasin Ogle as the executrix of E. Furness, and with her approbation was received by John Watson, and at her death remained in his hands awaiting re-investment.

6. A sum of 130*l.* advanced by J. Watson on mortgage out of E. Furness's estate.

The estate of Elizabeth Furness had been managed with the approbation of Thomasin Ogle, first by John F. Ogle and J. Watson, and after the death of J. F. Ogle, which occurred in 1850, by J. Watson alone.

Thomasin Ogle's personal estate at her death comprised, amongst other things, the residuary estate of E. Furness, subject to the 3,000*l.* legacy, which had not been paid.

This special case was stated by Elizabeth Ogle and Harriett Ogle, who had survived Hannah Jane Ogle, to determine among other questions, which of the above moneys and securities passed under the bequest in Thomasin Ogle's will of all her money and securities for money.

Mr. Amphlett and Mr. Chitty, for the plaintiffs, contended that the Bank stock and canal shares did not pass under the words "money or securities for money." In Bescody v. Pack (1 Sim. & S. 500), the question as to Bank stock was raised, but not decided. They further contended that the outstanding residuary estate of Mrs. Furness did not pass under these words. As to what would pass under the words "money or securities for money," they referred to Dicks v. Lambert (4 Ves. 725); Lowe v. Thomas (Kay. 369; 23 L. J. Ch. 616: on appeal, 5 De Gex, M. & G. 315); Slingsby v. Grainger (1 De Gex, M. & G. 385; on appeal, 7 H.L. C. 273; 28 L. J. Ch. 616; 25 L. J. Ch. 573). Hudleston v. Gouldsbury (10 Beav. 547), which was a case of canal shares. They contended that where a specific gift was followed by a residuary gift, the specific gift should be construed strictly.

Mr. Everitt, for the defendant, contended that the Bank stock and canal shares, and all the outstanding personal estate of Elizabeth Furness to which Thomasin Ogle was entitled as above mentioned, passed under the words " money and securities for money."

He cited Parker v. Marchant (1 You. & C. C.C. 290; 1 Ph. 356; 11 L. J. Ch. 223); Williams on Executors (1072); Vaisey v. Reynolds (5 Rus. 12; 6 L. J. Ch. 172); Manning v. Purcell (2 Sm. & G. 248; 7 De Gex, M. & G. 55; 7 L. J. Dig. 418); Mangin v. Mangin (16 Beav. 300).

Mr. Babington and Mr. Nalder, for the other defendants.

Mr. Chitty replied.

JAMES, V.C. said: It appeared to be utterly impossible to hold that Bank stock, which was after all nothing but a share in the capital stock of a company incorporated by act of parliament for the purpose of carrying on a banking business, was any more a security for money than a share in any other partnership whatever. It was merely a share in an incorporated partnership, with certain privileges with regard to discounting and drawing bills, and so on. That could not alter the character of it. It was really as much a share in a company as any co-partner's share in a brewery was. Therefore, clearly the Bank stock did not pass as a security for money. Accordingly, he must hold that the first and second items in the list above stated, comprising the Bank stock and the canal shares, did not pass under the words money and securities for money in Thomasin Ogle's will. The 670*l.* mortgage, mentioned as the third item in the list, was a sum of money invested on mortgage by the trustees of Mrs. Furness's will in their own names, and they were bound to pay the legacy of 3,000*l.* bequeathed by the will of their testatrix. It was clear, therefore, that this item did not pass under the words in Thomasin Ogle's will. As regarded the fourth item, that also was a mortgage in the names of the trustees; but the equitable interest was in Thomasin Ogle. The trustees could not have interfered with the receipt of it by her, and they had abundant assets to meet the unpaid legacy under Mrs. Furness's will. They had allowed it to remain invested for sixteen years; but it was the property of Thomasin Ogle, and she had a right to deal with it as part of her estate. He was of opinion that it passed as one of her securites for money. The moneys comprised in the fifth item were moneys arising from the payment to Thomasin Ogle, as the executrix of Mrs. Furness, of a mortgage-debt owing to Mrs. Furness. These moneys had, with the assent of Thomasin Ogle, been received by J. Watson, as her agent, and had remained in his hands; but she had a right at any moment to call for them, and they accordingly passed under the specific gift in her will. Item No. 6. was subject to the same considerations as No. 3. Therefore, the Bank stock and the two mortgages which were in the hands of the trustees of Mrs. Furness's will as trustees for the persons entitled to the legacy, did not pass by Miss Ogle's will.

Voluntary Settlement—Power of Revocation, Omission of—Solicitor and Client.

SETTLEMENT.—It is the duty of a solicitor in preparing a voluntary deed of gift to protect his client by inserting a power of revocation; and in the absence of such a power will invalidate the deed, unless those who claim under it shew that the donor deliberately, and with full knowledge of the consequences, refused to have the power inserted.

The object of this suit was to set aside a voluntary deed of settlement made in August, 1853, by Mercy, then Mrs. Harvey (afterwards the wife of James Russell Brenchley), whereby she appointed the capital of 3,000*l.*, of which she was tenant for life with a general power of appointment under her father's will, in favour of Joseph Acworth, her only sister's husband.

At the time of the execution of the deed Mercy Harvey was fifty-three years of age, and living apart from her husband; she was also on bad terms with her son-in-law, the surviving husband of her only child. In this state of circumstances, being desirous of making some appointment of the 3,000*l.*, so as to free herself from the importunities of her husband and son-in-law, it appears that she was introduced by Joseph Acworth, in whose house she was temporarily residing, to his cousin George Acworth, a solicitor practising at Rochester; and by him the deed in question was prepared containing (without any power of revocation) an irrevocable apointment by Mrs. Harvey of the fund to herself for life, with remainder to Joseph Acworth absolutely.

The evidence did not shew whether George Acworth received his instructions for this deed from Mrs. Harvey herself or from Joseph Acworth; but it was proved that the legal expenses were defrayed by Joseph Acworth, and the deed after its execution remained in his possession, nor was any copy of it shewn or delivered to Mrs. Harvey.

In 1861, her first husband being then dead, Mrs. Harvey married Brenchley, and she thereupon executed a second deed purporting to be a settlement of the 3,000*l.*, appointing the same in favour of Brenchley for life with remainder to her sister's children by Joseph Acworth. Upon this occasion she informed Mr. Ward, the solicitor acting on her behalf, that she had previously executed a will appointing the fund in favour of Joseph Acworth. Acworth, however, on being applied to for the document, declined to give it up, and remained silent as to the facts of its being not a will but a settlement, although he was served with formal notice of the second settlement; nor was any intimation of the existence of the first deed ever made by him till after Mrs. Brenchley's death, which took place in July, 1862.

In the meantime, shortly before her death, Mrs. Brenchley executed a will, whereby she revoked the appointment of the fund in favour of her nephews and nieces, and appointed 1,000*l.* to her husband and 2,000*l.* to the plaintiff Coutts, who was then acting as her spiritual adviser, and with whom she was on intimate terms. She also appointed Coutts her executor.

Probate to this will was taken out by Coutts, whereupon Joseph Acworth in October, 1862, for the first time brought forward the original deed of 1853, and threatened proceedings thereunder in respect of his claim to the fund.

After some delay caused by the bankruptcy of Coutts and the inability of Brenchley, who was a man of slender means, to prosecute any suit in this Court, the present bill was filed to set aside the deed of 1853 on the ground that it had been prepared, without any independent professional advice; that it contained no power of revocation; and that the settlor executed it in the belief that she was signing a will only, and not an irrevocable instrument.

There was some attempt to shew by the evidence of the only surviving witness to the deed, that at the time of its execution the attention of Mrs. Harvey was pointedly drawn to the words "irrevocably appoint," and that she deliberately told George Acworth the solicitor (who was now dead) that she meant the appointment to be irrevocable; it will be seen however that the Vice Chancellor came to the conclusion that she was allowed to remain in ignorance of its real effect, and that the future embarrassments which might arise by reason of the appointment being irrevocable were not sufficiently pointed out to her.

Joseph Acworth died pending the suit; some attempt had been made on the part of the plaintiff to compromise the matter; Acworth's children, however, the present defendants, absolutely declined the terms proposed by the plaintiff, and the cause now came on for hearing.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Bagshawe, for the plaintiff, referred to—Huguenin v. Baseley (14 Ves. 273, 296); Cooke v. Lamotte (15 Beav. 234; 21 L. J. Ch. 371); Toker v. Toker (31 Beav. 629; 32 L. J. Ch. 322); Dent v. Bennett (4 Myl. & Cr. 269; 8 L. J. Ch. 125); Philipson v. Kerry (32 Beav. 628).

[The VICE CHANCELLOR also mentioned the case of Nottidge v. Prince (2 Giff. 216; 29 L. J. Ch. 857.]

Mr. Fooks and Mr. Bevir, for Brenchley, in the same interest.

Mr. Cole and Mr. Dixon, for the trustee of the deed.

Mr. Cotton and Mr. A. E. Miller, for the children of Joseph Acworth.—In this case there is no evidence of fraud, undue influence, intimidation, or coercion. The settlement is good, and must be supported in this Court. At the time of its execution Mrs. Harvey, as she then was, had separated from her husband and quarrelled with her son-in-law; the only relatives for whom she felt an interest were to be found in her own sister's household; and what more natural or reasonable than that she should appoint this fund after her own death in favour of that sister's husband, in whose house she was then residing, and whose wife and children she desired to benefit? She wished to put the money out of her own control. She could not at her time of life and in her then position anticipate a second marriage or the formation of any new relations in life. She was fully alive to all the circumstances of the case, and the effect of the deed was just that which she intended to bring about; nor was it an improvident step; she robbed herself of nothing. In all its aspects the case is distinguishable from any of those in which the Court has interfered; and it will not be held that the mere absence of a power of revocation is fatal to an appointment deliberately executed, and in other respects good as this was. They referred to—Hunter v. Atkins (3 Myl. & K. 113); Anderson v. Elsworth (30 L. J. Ch. 922; 3 Giff. 154); Forshaw v. Welsby (30 Beav. 243; 30 L. J. Ch. 331).

MALINS, V.C., without calling for a reply, stated the facts at length, and commented upon the position in which Mrs. Harvey was placed at the time she executed the deed; observing also that for the purposes of this suit Joseph Acworth must be regarded as an entire stranger to her in blood; for, although it had been argued that her intention was to benefit the appointee's wife and children, the Court could make no such assumption, seeing that under this appointment to the husband only, any such intention might have been frustrated, either by his bankruptcy or voluntary alienation of the property.—His Honour then proceeded: I think the circumstances here are so extraordinary as to bring it under that class of cases of which Lord Eldon says the person ought not to be permitted to execute such a deed. If a case like Toker v. Toker occurs—an aged woman desirous of providing for her nephew,—a deed prepared by her family solicitor, who says "Will you not reserve to yourself a power of revocation," and the woman deliberately says, " I will not have it; I have made up my mind to have this as the final mode of disposing of my property;" then the Court—seeing it was her deliberate intention carried into effect, not by the solicitor of the nephew, but by her own solicitor, and coming to the conclusion that it was her deliberate act after full advice,—decides that there is no ground why it should set aside that which she had so deliberately done. But how was this poor lady protected? Had she any solicitor? Can anyone doubt that Mr. George Acworth was the solicitor of the man who was to have the advantage of the appointment? What benefit did she derive from it? How was her condition better after the execution of the deed than before? If the solicitor had only applied the principles of this Court, and felt that it was his duty to protect the lady on whose behalf he ought to have considered himself as acting, he would have left the property under her own control to enable her to meet the demands which might arise in future life. If this had been done and the appointment made subject to a power of revocation, the only object which there could have been would have been just as effectually attained. That power it was not thought fit to insert; and I am bound to come to the conclusion that this solicitor and his cousin deliberately abstained from inserting it, because their object was finally and for ever to secure the possession of this 3,000*l.* to Joseph Acworth after the lady's death. It was a deed which she ought never to have been permitted to execute, and it was a most improvident arrangement. —His Honour then commented on the position in which Mrs. Brenchley found herself at the time of her second marriage, and her belief at that time that the instrument she had already executed, whether a will or not, was at all events a revocable instrument; whereas the conduct of Joseph Acworth in keeping back the document in his possession, and declining to produce it when called upon by the lady's solicitor, and more especially in concealing the fact of its being an irrevocable appointment in his own favour, could only be accounted for on the ground that he purposed to take an improper advantage of his position[1].—His Honour then continued: But now, on the law of the case, I apprehend all agree in the principle which is to be deduced from Huguenin v. Baseley: it is this, that wherever a voluntary settlement or gift of property is made it is incumbent on the defendant, and he has it thrown upon him, to prove that the transaction was fair and proper, and was understood by the person who was the donor.

In the first place, was this transaction fair, was it proper, was it understood by Mrs. Harvey? It was not fair; it was most unfair to deprive this lady of her property. Was it explained to her? Clearly not, for the deed would never have been executed in these terms if it had been. Has then the defendant discharged himself of the burden thrown on him? My opinion is, that he has failed in every respect to do so. It is scarcely necessary to refer to the authorities. I have stated the result of Huguenin v. Baseley: the same principle was distinctly laid down by the Master of the Rolls, not as anything new, but as following authority, in Cooke v. Lamotte. Then the cases of Anderson v. Elsworth and Forshaw v. Welsby, in my opinion, carry it much further, because they go to shew that where the circumstances are such that the donor or settlor ought to have been advised to retain a power of revocation, and a power of revocation is not inserted, it is a thing fatal to the deed. It is so treated by Lord Eldon in Huguenin v. Baseley. It is true that in that case there were many other circumstances which led to the conclusion that the deed was invalid, and it was not necessary to rest it on that ground; but it is, I think, impossible to address oneself to that case without seeing that Lord

(1) Amongst other evidence as to the motives and intention of Joseph Acworth in withholding all information as to the existence of the deed until after Mrs. Brenchley's death, the following items produced from the bill of costs furnished by Messrs. Acworth & Sons to Joseph Acworth in 1862, were here particularly referred to by the Vice Chancellor:

" Attending on you and conferring with you on the approaching decease of Mrs. Brenchley, and consulting as to what proceedings should be taken on the deed."

" Attending and conferring with you, when you informed us that Mrs. Brenchley had made a will and settlement, and advising you to keep quiet, which you promised to do."

Eldon's strong opinion was that if in a voluntary deed of this kind a power of revocation is not inserted, the defendant is called upon to explain the reason. He says, referring to Lord Hardwicke's reasoning in an earlier case (14 Ves. 296), "There was in that deed a power of revocation, but it was a power to revoke in the presence of three persons, who perhaps never could be got together, which was therefore considered as if there had been no power of revocation; and the want of such power was considered strong evidence that the party did not understand the transaction, whence arose a strong influence of an undue purpose." He then goes on to speak of the case before him, in language every word of which is applicable to this case.—[His Honour continued to read from Lord Eldon's judgment.]—Was it not too much for this solicitor to allow this lady to be surprised or "himself to be surprised into" the execution of a deed which would deprive her in middle life—for she was not on the verge of the grave, when it might be hardly possible for her to form many future relations in life—of all control over her property? Every word of Lord Eldon in that case is applicable to this, and it has been carried much further in the cases of Anderson v. Elsworth and Forshaw v. Welsby. If I had the power, I should lay it down as a rule that wherever a voluntary gift of a material part of a person's property is made (unless, as in Toker v. Toker, it is prepared by an independent solicitor, and the donor distinctly repudiates and refuses to insert a power of revocation) it is the duty of the solicitor to insist that there shall be, and almost to go to the extent of refusing to execute such an instrument unless there be, a power of revoking and altering that which is done, so as to meet the various exigencies that may arise in future life. In my opinion, the fact of there being no such power of revocation is all but a conclusive reason for setting aside the deed; and I believe in saying so I am not going further than the cases have already gone; but if I am I have no hesitation in saying it, for no case can shew the extreme danger of omitting such a power more clearly than this, where the donor was putting the bulk of her property out of her own reach. Unless it is proved to demonstration that there was a distinct intention on the part of the donor to do so, it is the duty of the solicitor in preparing such an instrument to see that there is a full power of revocation or right of reservation inserted.

Therefore, upon these grounds, I am of opinion that this deed is open to almost every objection that can be brought against a deed of this kind, and was from the moment of its being signed, sealed and delivered a void deed. It must be set aside; it must be delivered up to be cancelled; and I see no ground on which I can relieve those who, instead of accepting the reasonable terms offered by the plaintiff, have persisted in their endeavour to uphold the deed, from paying the costs of this litigation.

Company — Payment of Dividend — Profits — Jurisdiction under the Companies' Act, 1862, to order Shareholder to refund Dividend.

COMPANY.—There is jurisdiction under the Companies' Act, 1862, s. 101, upon a summary application in a winding-up, to order a shareholder to refund a dividend improperly declared; and, a fortiori, under section 165, such an order may be made against a director.

Circumstances considered under which a balance-sheet shewing profit is to be held delusive.

Digitized by Google

Where a company was engaged in a highly hazardous course of trade (that of running a blockade), under which large profits had been realized, a balance-sheet in which the assets were honestly estimated, although so situated as to be in great danger of loss, was held to be a proper balance-sheet, and a dividend, declared upon the basis of the balance-sheet, upheld, although through the occurrence of subsequent events the assets were destroyed or became worthless. An application to make a director refund the dividend was therefore refused upon the merits.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Malins, made in the course of winding up the company, by which his Honour refused to order Mr. Stringer, a shareholder and director of the company, to refund a dividend which he had received during the existence of the company.

The company was established, in the year 1863, for the purpose (according to the articles of association) of trading with America. The true object of the company was to establish a special trade with the Confederate States of America, then blockaded by the United States.

The articles of association provided, in the usual terms, that no dividend should be paid except out of profits, and they also provided that the directors should declare a dividend on the subscribed capital as often as the profits of the company in hand should suffice for the payment of a dividend of 5*l.* per cent., subject to the resolution of general meetings. The capital of the company was of the nominal amount of 150,000*l.*, of which upwards of 110,000*l.* was paid up. All the shares were fully paid up.

Shortly after the establishment of the company, they entered into an arrangement with the Confederate Government under which the latter were to become co-owners with the company of a number of ships, and were to join in the risk of running the blockade with cargoes of goods. Several adventures were thus made, of which some were successful and others unsuccessful; but the profit upon each successful trip made by a ship was very considerable.

In May, 1864, a balance-sheet of the affairs of the company brought down to the end of the preceding February shewed a profit of 42,718*l.* In this balance-sheet credit was taken for a large quantity of cotton, valued at 17,000*l.*, then in Charleston, which had been appropriated by the Confederate Government for the payment of the company for their share of the ships; also for a debt of 51,589*l.* as due from the Confederate Government, valued at its full nominal amount. Upon the balance-sheet so made out the directors proposed a dividend of 25 per cent. upon the shares, which proposition was adopted by a general meeting of the company held on the 17th of May. In order to pay the dividend an application was made to the Agra Bank, now represented by the Agra & Masterman's Bank, for a loan of 20,000*l.*, in addition to 4,000*l.* then overdrawn upon the company's account. The balance-sheet and a statement of the affairs of the company were submitted to the bank, who after the same had been examined by their accountant, made the required advance, and the dividend was accordingly paid, principally by cheques upon the bank. Mr. Stringer, who was managing director, received 3,560*l.* as his dividend.

When the civil war in America was terminated by the defeat of the Confederates, the cotton in Charleston was destroyed, and the debt from the Confederate Government became worthless. The company therefore was ruined, and was soon afterwards ordered to be wound up. The bank constituted, however, the only creditors to any substantial amount. Some further details as to the circumstances of the company will be found in the judgment of Lord Justice Selwyn.

The application made to the Vice Chancellor was refused by him upon the ground that he had no jurisdiction to make such an order in a winding-up. His Honour expressed his opinion, however, that the circumstances were such that upon a bill filed he would certainly make a decree against Mr. Stringer, as he held that the dividend had been improperly declared and was in fact a dividend out of capital.

From this decision the official liquidator appealed.

Mr. Cotton and Mr. Higgins, for the appellant.—The alleged profits upon which this dividend was declared were wholly delusive. The company was engaged in a most hazardous course of business, and it was therefore very probable, as in fact the event proved, that their engagements at the date of the balance-sheet would ruin them. The valuation of cotton whilst it was in America was clearly unjustifiable, and so was the valuation at its full nominal amount of the debt of the Confederated States. No dividend was to be declared out of any profits unless in hand. How could they be said to be in hand when the company had to borrow the money to pay the dividend? The dividend then ought to be refunded. They cited on this branch of their argument Evans v. Coventry (8 De Gex, M. & G. 835; 25 L. J. Ch. 489); Turquand v. Marshall (37 L. J. Ch. 582; L. R. 6 Eq. 112); Kearns v. Leaf (1 Hem. & M. 681); Maclaren v. Stainton (3 De Gex, F. & J. 202; 26 L. J. Ch. 332); Macdougall v. the Jersey Imperial Hotel Company (2 Hem. & M. 528; 34 L. J. Ch. 28); Corry v. the Londonderry and Enniskillen Railway Company (29 Beav. 263; 30 L. J. Ch. 290); The Society for Illustration of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott (2 Beav. 559). Next, as to jurisdiction under the Companies' Act, 1862. There is ample power under the act to make the order asked for; either section 101. or section 165. will be sufficient. Such orders are often made—In re the Cardiff Coal Company (11 W. R. 1007); The Cardiff Preserved Coal Company v. Morton (35 L. J. Ch. 646; 36 L. J. Ch. 451; L. R. 2 Ch. 405); In re the Agra and Masterman's Bank; Shipman's case (unreported, before Vice Chancellor Giffard, 7th December, 1868); In re the London and Provincial Starch Company (unreported, before Vice Chancellor James, 22nd April, 1869).

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Jackson, for Mr. Stringer.—The dividend was perfectly regular. The balance-sheet was made out in the usual way, and the assets were fairly estimated; there is no pretence for saying that any fraudulent statement or concealment was made. The directors of the bank, which is the only creditor, were themselves fully cognizant of every fact relating to the affairs of the company, and knew when they lent the money how it was to be applied. The bank, therefore, cannot complain; yet there is no one else for whom the official liquidator raises this contention. They also contended that there was no jurisdiction. The Winding-up Acts were not intended to meet cases of great difficulty, where special and difficult equities affect the parties—In re the Royal Hotel of Great Yarmouth (L. R. 4 Eq. 244); In re the State Fire Insurance Company (1 De Gex, J. & S. 634; 33 L. J. Ch. 123; 32 L. J. Ch. 300).

Mr. Cotton, in reply.

Lord Justice Selwyn.—This case has been conveniently divided by the learned Vice Chancellor into two separate and distinct points. He says, in his judgment, "Being on the first point entirely with the applicant, that this is a dividend most improperly made and a return of one-fourth of the capital, the next question is, have I power under the act of parliament in this summary manner to make an order upon the shareholders, and Mr. Stringer in particular, the managing director, to return it?" I think it is convenient to take the second of those two questions, that which the Vice Chancellor refers to, as the question whether he has this power under the act of parliament, in the first instance; for it is a question involving very important considerations with respect to the practice of the Court, and it is also one of very general application. It appears that different opinions have been entertained by different Judges upon it in this Court, and under those circumstances it appears to me to be the duty of this Appellate Court to form and express its own opinion as speedily, as clearly and as decisively as possible upon that question. This is a question which has been agitated more or less almost ever since the passing of the first Winding-up Act, in the year 1858; but the power which was given by the old Winding-up Acts is expressed in them in a very much less stringent and comprehensive form than the clauses which appear in the present act of 1862; but even under the old Winding-up Act this summary jurisdiction was very frequently and usefully exercised. I believe that one of the earliest instances of its exercise was in the case of the Madrid and Valencia Railway Company, which was wound up before Master Blunt, and where very large sums of money had been misappropriated by the directors of the company. Without any bill being filed, and in the course of the winding-up of the company, proceedings were taken to enforce the restitution of that money by the directors, and, as appears by the report in 15 Jurist, some of those proceedings before the Master were brought before Lord Justice Knight Bruce when Vice Chancellor, and approved of by him. Another case, which came before another Judge of great eminence, is the case of Carpenter's executors (6 De Gex & Sm. 402; 21 L. J. Ch. 855), which came before Sir James Parker. In that case the directors had employed moneys belonging to a company in purchasing the shares of the company. There, without bill filed, proceedings were taken, and it came before the Master, who was then the Judge of first instance, for the purpose of recovering those moneys. There the Vice Chancellor says, at page 414, "If the act now complained of had been done by these gentlemen at their own instance I cannot entertain a doubt that the Master would have properly charged them under the act on the present proceedings." That is, upon summary proceedings which had been instituted without any bill. He however goes on to say, "The vice of the Master's order lies in this: that it assumes that the five individuals where there is no cheque forthcoming, or three of them where there are cheques, are the parties who as between the persons signing and the company are solely and ultimately chargeable with the moneys misapplied." Then he goes on to say he thinks there was that which, in substance, was an objection for want of parties. That case appears to me to be of importance in two respects: first, as shewing the clear opinion of so eminent a Judge as Sir James Parker, that in such a case the Master had jurisdiction without any bill being filed; and, secondly, that in those summary proceedings every objection is just as open to the person sought to be charged as it would have been if a bill had been filed.

I need not multiply instances of the exercise of the summary jurisdiction. Another of which is found in Ex parte Johnson (5 Jurist, 519). But it is perfectly true that, notwithstanding those proceedings and those opinions so expressed by several Judges, the doubt as to the propriety or the competency of the Court to exercise this jurisdiction was very frequently expressed by the late Lord Justice Turner. The matter very seldom came before him without his taking the opportunity of saying that, in his judgment, such proceedings were, if not unlawful, at all events inexpedient; and I believe it was in consequence of the doubt so frequently expressed by that eminent Judge, that the clauses were introduced into the subsequent act of parliament, and made so comprehensive and stringent as they now are. We find them expressed in the most wide and general terms. It is true they are permissive, but they are proceedings to be taken under the authority of the Court. They are to be taken by the official liquidator, who is the officer appointed by the Court, under the advice of solicitors appointed with the sanction of the Court; and, under those circumstances, I think it may be assumed that proceedings so instituted would be properly conducted, that is to say, that they would be so conducted as to afford to the persons sought to be charged a full knowledge of all the points of the case intended to be brought against them, and it would give to them the fullest opportunity of defending themselves in any legitimate way; and the able counsel who have argued this case on the part of Mr. Stringer have entirely failed (although requested by the Court to do so) to point out any substantial difference or disadvantage in the position in which the present respondent, Mr. Stringer, stands from that which he would have occupied if a bill had been filed containing the same statements as those found in the affidavit filed by the official liquidator, and concluding with a prayer in the precise words of the present notice of motion.

The summary power which has been given by the recent act of parliament has been very frequently exercised; and in a case before the Master of the Rolls, of The Cardiff Preserved Coal Company v. Norton, there is a very strong expression of his Lordship's opinion as to the propriety of such proceedings; for he there says, at page 563, " It is said that the shares taken by them in exchange from the Crown Company belong to and form part of the assets of the Cardiff Company. If this be so, the proper mode of getting at the assets of the company in the hands of contributories is by a proceeding in the Court in which the company is being wound up,"—that was in the Court of Bankruptcy, which, under the peculiar circumstances of that case, was the Court having the conduct of the winding-up. Therefore that amounts to an expression of opinion by the Master of the Rolls that a bill was not the proper proceeding, but that a proceeding in the Court of Bankruptcy under the winding-up was the proper proceeding in such a case. It appears that this power has been very recently exercised, particularly in Shipman's case, which came before the Lord Justice when Vice Chancellor, and still more recently in a case mentioned at the bar, but which has not yet been reported, decided by Vice Chancellor James. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that we should be doing something which is entirely inconsistent with the provisions of the act of parliament, so general as they are, if we were to introduce any such qualification as that said to have been laid down by the Master of the Rolls in the case of The Yarmouth Hotel Company (L. R. 4 Eq. 248). His Lordship is there reported to have said, at page 248, " that where there is really a question to be tried then I do not think this 165th section enables you to dispose of it in this way "; and at page 249 he says, " The Court can only do so in plain and straightforward cases where there is no point of law to be determined." I am much disinclined to doubt whether those are not the words of the Master of the Rolls, but, having regard to what I have always understood to be his opinion upon this subject, and to his own decision in the case to which I have referred of the Cardiff Coal Company, I cannot help thinking that there must be some error in that report; if not, I feel bound to say that I do not think there is to be found, either in the words of the present act of parliament or in the conclusion which is justly to be drawn from the decisions upon this subject, any such qualification or limitation as that which is there expressed by his Lordship; and, if we were so to hold in all these cases, we should be inducing the person against whom the charge is made to endeavour to make out that there was some question to be tried, or that the matter was not so plain or straightforward as it was represented to be; and there are very few cases indeed in which some such attempt as that might not be made with some reasonable hope of success. The result would be to occasion the necessity for a double mode of proceeding and unnecessary expense and delay. Applying, then, these observations to the present case, and assuming with reference to this one part of the case that the Vice Chancellor was right when he said that " this was a wholly delusive and improper dividend, in effect a return of one-fourth of the capital, and a return of capital in violation of every rule of propriety,—a return of capital in violation of the general provisions of the act, that dividends are not to be declared out of capital, and, above all, an extraordinary violation of their own rule which prescribes that they are not to pay dividends except out of profits; " or, as it is more concisely put in another passage in the same judgment, that this is a dividend most improperly made, and a return of one-fourth of the capital; under those circumstances, has this Court jurisdiction, under the 101st and 165th sections of this act, to order the return of money so improperly paid without the necessity of having a bill filed? In my judgment, there is no doubt that the Court has that power under either of these sections, for, under the 101st section, " The Court may, at any time after making an order for winding-up the company, make an order on any contributory at the time being settled on the list of contributories, directing payment to be made in manner in the said act mentioned of any moneys due from him, or from the estate of the person whom he represents, to the company." Under the circumstances stated by the Vice Chancellor, can it be doubted that the amount of such a dividend so improperly paid, of capital so improperly returned, would be a sum of money owing from the contributory, who receives it, to the company? If so, there is in that act of parliament the clearest authority, under the Winding-up Act, without bill filed, to order a return of the money so received. The 165th section is, if possible, even clearer. That is, in particular, the section framed in this very comprehensive form in order to meet and obviate the doubts expressed by Lord Justice Turner. That section says, " Where, in the course of the winding-up of any company under this act, it appears that any past or present director, manager, official, or other liquidator, or any officer of such company, has misapplied or retained in his own hands or become liable or accountable for any moneys of the company, or been guilty of any misfeasance or breach of trust in relation to the company, the Court may, on the application of any liquidator or of any creditor or contributory of the company, notwithstanding that the offence is one for which the offender is criminally responsible, examine into the conduct of such director, manager or other officer, and compel him to repay any moneys so misapplied or retained or for which he has become liable or accountable, together with interest after such rate as the Court thinks just, or to contribute such sums of money to the assets of the company by way of compensation in respect of such misapplication, retaining, misfeasance or breach of trust, as the Court thinks just." There is no such limitation to be found in the words of either of these sections as is reported to have been considered to be included in them by the report of The Royal Hotel Company of Great Yarmouth case, but, on the contrary, the Court is empowered to examine into the conduct of the director, and that necessarily implies deciding the question whether he has been guilty of any misfeasance or breach of trust, which, of course, it would be open to him to deny, and therefore there would be a question to be tried in every such case. It is open to the Court to examine into his conduct, to compel him to repay any moneys so misapplied, or to contribute such sums by way of compensation as the Court shall think fit. It appears to me that if we had now to draw a clause in the widest and fullest manner, it would be very difficult to conceive anything more large or comprehensive than the words of the 165th section. Under these circumstances, it appears to me perfectly clear that if this was a wholly delusive dividend and an improper return of capital, this money so received by the managing director of the company in respect of that delusive and improper dividend, and in respect of that improper return of capital, would be most clearly a sum of money for which the managing director would be accountable, and which consequently the Court might under this jurisdiction order him to refund. I must therefore entirely differ, though most respectfully, from the conclusion at which the learned Vice-Chancellor has arrived upon this part of the case, and I consider that in so doing I am acting in accordance with a long series of authorities and many decisions which have taken place in this Court. There remains, however, the question upon the merits of the case, and that question may be shortly stated thus: whether the dividend in question (that is, the devidend of 25 per cent. which was declared and paid by the directors in this case) is to be considered, as the learned Vice Chancellor has considered it, so wholly delusive and improper, or in substance such a return of capital as to justify the Court in making Mr. Stringer pay the amount of 25 per cent. on the nominal value of the shares standing in his name. Now, I quite agree with the argument which has been addressed to us on behalf of the official liquidator to this extent, that the act which confers on these companies the privilege of limited liablity, imposes upon them at the same time certain conditions which they are bound to observe, and which may be considered as the price of that privilege, and if it is made to appear that, for the purpose of defrauding creditors or for any other improper motive, a company has declared and paid a wholly delusive and improper dividend, and has thereby in effect taken away from their creditors a portion of the capital which was answerable for the debts of those creditors, I entertain no doubt that the Court would have full jurisdiction, and would exercise it by ordering the repayment of the money so improperly paid. But, of course, in the present case, we have to consider whether this dividend was in truth a dividend declared under such circumstances. I think we may dismiss from our consideration some of the minor items, upon which considerable discussion has arisen, such, for instance, as the question relating to the cargo of the "Love Bird." For, in the first instance, it is apparent on the face of the balance-sheet in question that the whole sum there represented as being profit is 42,718*l*., and the dividend declared, amounting only to 28,000*l*., leaves a balance of 14,718*l*., which renders it unnecessary to enter into the consideration of any small or minute questions, because we have in any event that large balance remaining over and above the dividend actually declared. With respect to this question of the "Love Bird," it appears that a cargo of rifles was purchased and sent out, and the company have entered that cargo at the sum it actually cost, including and adding to it the amount of the insurance and the expenses connected with the shipment of the cargo. It appears that item was at all events justified to this extent, that it being set down at the value of 29,000*l*., there has been actually realized in respect of that cargo a sum of 28,000*l*.; though if you have regard to subsequent expenses, there may have been a total loss upon the entire transaction of a sum of about 4,000*l*. I think that and the other question about the "Ida" may be disregarded, having regard to the large amount of the admitted surplus. But the substantial question in the case depends upon the consideration of three items in this account. Those are, first, the ships which were actually lost; secondly, the debt due from the Confederate Government; and, thirdly, the cotton which was in the Confederate States at the time when the balance-sheet was made out. It is very material to observe in this case that no fraud on the shareholders can be or is attempted to be alleged in argument, because in this case a full and fair dividend was declared, and was paid or intended to be paid to all the shareholders equally, without any preference or priority. Neither was there any fraud upon the public intended or practised, nor even upon that part of the public who might be expected to become purchasers of the shares, because it is admitted that the shares of this company were not sold at all, but were held from the beginning to the end by the same persons. Neither is it, I think, possible to say with justice that any attempt has been made in this case to commit any fraud upon the creditors, for though it appears at the time when this balance-sheet was made out that a very large debt was owing from the company to the Agra & Masterman's Bank, and that a very large debt is still owing to that bank from the company now being wound up, it does not appear (with the exception of one claim recently made by a creditor at New York) that there are now any other debts existing at all against this company. The singularity of this case is, that this balance-sheet discloses on the very face of it all facts relating to profit and loss, for the very first thing we find with respect to the first of the three matters I have mentioned, namely, the ships lost—that the names of the four ships which had been lost are stated. So also with respect to the debt due from the Confederate Government. The experience which we have unfortunately had in this Court of this sort of statement put out by companies shews how very easy and how very common it is to dissemble in these balance-sheets and to put forth other statements instead of the real truth of the transactions with respect to the assets and debts and liabilities. We find commonly in a case of this kind, where there is an asset of a doubtful character, it is mixed up with others that are good in such a manner as to render the one undistinguishable from the others. Here the debt owing from the Confederate Government is plainly stated as being a debt owing from that Government. It stands by itself, and is not attempted to be dissembled or cloaked in any way. In like manner with respect to the third item, the cotton in the Confederate States. Nothing would have been easier than to mix up the cotton in the Confederate States with the larger amount of cotton which appears to have been either on the way or actually in England; but so far from that being the case, an amount of cotton to the extent of more than 17,000*l.* is plainly stated upon the face of this balance-sheet as being cotton in the Confederate States, as distinguished from cotton in England or on the way. Then, this balance-sheet, containing these plain and fair statements, is actually produced to the principal creditors of the company, who had had very large dealings with the company, who had several accounts with the company, who had advanced them money generally and upon special undertakings and securities, and who had the fullest knowledge of all the transactions of the company. It was produced to those creditors for the purpose of inducing them to advance a still larger sum, and what renders this matter still more singular is, in order to induce them to lend this sum for the express purpose of paying this dividend, so that this application, which is substantially an application made at the instance of the Agra & Masterman's Bank, is an application which asks the Court to treat as delusive and improper that dividend which was in fact made and paid with the money advanced by the Agra & Masterman's Bank, and advanced by them with full knowledge or with the means of knowledge of all the transactions of the company, and which was money advanced for the very purpose of paying this dividend, for it appears that a new account was opened with the bank, intituled "The Dividend Account." The question with respect to the dividend is mainly rested upon the provisions in Table A, with respect to the payment of dividends, and the fifth article of this company, which qualifies and adds to the rule laid down in Table A. The expression in Table A. is in the negative form: "That no dividends shall be payable except out of the profits arising from the business of the company." The first clause provides, "That all the articles of Table A. to the said act shall be deemed to be incorporated with and to apply to these articles and the said company as near as may be and circumstances will permit, except as hereinafter modified or altered." Then the fifth clause says, "That the directors shall declare a dividend on the subscribed capital of the company as soon and as often as the profits of the company in hand are sufficient for payment of a dividend of 5*l.* per cent. on such capital, subject to the resolutions of a general meeting." I agree, again, with the argument which was adduced by the official liquidator to this extent, that if it could be shewn that this dividend was declared in fraud, either of the negative provisions of Table A. (which is incorporated with the articles of this company), or in fraud or violation of the provisions of their own articles, so far as they relate to creditors, namely, the fifth article, it would be then a matter which this Court would be competent to set aside, and all moneys paid in respect of such dividend ought to be returned. But the first question we have to determine is, whether the conclusion at which the learned Vice Chancellor arrived with respect to this matter is correct, which, I think, is shortly summed up by him in his judgment in these words: "It was obvious to all the world that the consumption of life and property was such that it (that is, the war), must necessarily come to an end within a reasonable time, be it one, two or three years, and the company, according to my judgment, could only then for the first time ascertain whether its operations had been profitable or unprofitable." Now, if the learned Vice Chancellor is correct in that view of the case, of course it puts an end to any further consideration of the question with respect to future profits or profits in hand, because it is obvious that, according to that view of the case, there could be neither profits nor profits in hand until the termination of the war, and until all the operations had been concluded, because he says until that time it could not be ascertained whether the operations of the company had been profitable or unprofitable. I think, in order to test the soundness of that conclusion, we may take for instance the figures which appear in Mr. Stringer's affidavit; assume that by reason of the successful voyages of some of these ships the two sums mentioned of 32,000*l.* and 24,000*l.*, making in all 56,000*l.*, had been actually realized and received in respect of profit upon adventures and cargoes actually landed and sold; and suppose that no ship had been lost at all, still the whole of the ships belonging to this company would be subject to the very hazardous adventure in which they were engaged, they had cost more than 100,000*l.*, and they were liable to destruction at any time; and according to the Vice Chancellor's view until the war was determined, and the safety of those ships was ascertained, it could not be ascertained whether the transactions of the company had been profitable or unprofitable. Therefore, in that view of the case, even if the company had had this sum of 56,000*l.* in their hands in respect of realized profits inasmuch as they would be subject to the possible loss of 102,000*l.*, being the value of the ships they had, in the event of those ships being lost—and the great majority of them were lost—of course the whole of that profit would be swept away, and consequently no dividend could be paid by the company. I should say, having regard to the provisions of Table A, and clause 5. of the Articles, which contain no negative clause at all, in my judgment the company would have been perfectly justified at that time, in the case I have assumed, in declaring a dividend out of the profits so received, provided that they had put a fair, and no more than a fair, value upon the ships, and the assets which they actually had. Taking it one step further, and assuming the case that several of the ships had been lost, that the company were bound to put down, as they did put down, their proportion of that loss as being a loss upon this balance-sheet, the other two-thirds of the loss was to be covered by the responsibility and guarantee of the Confederate Government, and, according to the view of the learned Vice Chancellor, inasmuch as until the end of the war the value of that guarantee could not be ascertained, no dividend could be declared. I confess I am unable to agree with that view. I think, under those circumstances, the company was fully justified in putting a value on the Confederate debt, and if it be necessary to put some estimate of value on the ships and upon the Confederate debt, inasmuch as it is clear, so far as the ships are concerned, having regard to the extremely hazardous nature of the operations in which they were engaged, no insurance of the ships could be effected except at the most unreasonable rate,—in fact no insurance could be effected at all; therefore the valuation of the ships became a matter of mere valuation and estimate, and so also with respect to the value of this obligation on the part of the Confederate Government. Upon what principle are we to say that that was to be valued? It depended upon the views which different persons might take, and we know well what different views were taken by most eminent persons with respect to the probable conclusion of that great struggle. Under those circumstances, I think the company was justified in doing that which in truth is done in almost every business, namely, taking the facts as they actually stood and forming an estimate of their assets as they actually existed, and then drawing a balance and seeing what was the result in the shape of profit or of loss. Again, if it could be shewn that that estimate had been made in any fraudulent way with any intention or purpose of deceiving anyone, or that in point of fact anyone was deceived by it, very different considerations would arise. I have already shewn that no fraud was intended or attempted against either the shareholders, or the public, or the creditors of this company. If we were to lay down as a rule that there must be actually cash in hand or cash at the bankers of the company to the full amount of the dividend declared, we should be laying down a rule which, in my judgment, would be inconsistent with what I understand and believe to be the custom of all companies of this description, and also inconsistent with mercantile usage, and we should be laying down a rule which would open the door to and encourage a very great amount of litigation, because there are very few dividends indeed which would not be open to more or less question if such a rule as that were laid down; and I think that in the absence of any fraudulent intent as against the shareholders, or as against the creditors or the public, this Court ought not to be astute in searching out minute errors in calculations in an account honestly made out and openly declared, especially as in the present case, where the account was submitted to and the dividend consequent upon it was ratified by the general meeting so long ago as 1864, long before the winding up of this company, and more especially where, as here, that account is now attempted after that lapse of time to be impeached substantially at the instance of persons to whom all the items of the account were fully and fairly made known, who themselves were the principal actors in, and mainly assisted in, the payment of the very dividend they now seek to impeach. I think the item of the ships is fairly stated. I think that the debt due from the Confederate Government is also fairly stated, and that although some proper allowance should be made by way of deduction from that debt, still it is not such a deduction as would be sufficient to vitiate this balance-sheet and the dividend declared upon it; and with respect to the cotton in the Confederate States I think the allowance that was made by taking it at 5*d*. per lb. in value when it had been actually taken by the company at 6*d*., and when it is proved, and not disputed, that its real value if delivered here in England was from 2*s*. 1*d*. to 2*s*. 4*d*. per lb., is a valuation which, if it be not strictly accurate, is at least fair and bona fide, and cannot be made the foundation for impeaching the dividend, or asking that the dividend declared and received should be ordered to be paid back as having been improperly declared. I think, therefore, for these reasons that the claim originally made against Mr. Stringer fails upon the merits, and that the application which was made in the Court below ought to have been made there, and must now be refused, with costs; and I think, also, that the present appeal must be dismissed, with costs. Those, therefore, will be the terms of our order; but in accordance with our usual practice we shall leave to the decision of the Vice Chancellor any question which may arise as between the official liquidator, and those whom he represents, with reference to the costs so ordered to be paid by the official liquidator.

GIFFARD, L.J.—If I could have concurred in this case in the view which the Vice Chancellor has taken of the construction of the articles of association, and with the conclusion at which he has arrived, namely, that what has been done in this case amounts to a return of capital, I should not have hesitated to say that this Court had clear jurisdiction, not only under the 101st section against any contributory, but under the 165th section as against any director. I think that those clauses were introduced in order that by means of proceeding under the Winding-up Act, without any double process or double set of proceedings, complete justice might be done between the parties, and a complete winding-up effected; and I think the instances are very rare indeed where the jurisdiction ought not to be exercised. No doubt there are some cases, as, for instance, where you have parties concerned, some of whom are not amenable to the jurisdiction of winding-up, and it is not right and just to have a piecemeal litigation, then it is proper that a bill should be filed, and there may be some, but they are very rare instances indeed, where it may be necessary to have the facts stated upon the record: but wherever upon notice of motion and upon affidavits and due examination of witnesses, you can properly arrive at a conclusion, I can see no reason at all why a bill should be filed. It only adds to the expense, and upon notice of motion and affidavits and examination of witnesses complete justice can be done, the evidence can be taken under the winding-up just in as many ways as it can be taken upon bill filed; and what is more important, there are the same means of hearing in the Court below and the same means of appeal to this Court and to the House of Lords. Therefore I can see no reason why any narrow construction should be put upon those words, and I think it would be to the disadvantage of the public that a narrow construction should be put upon them. Now, with regard to this case, the first important matter that we have to consider is the effect of these articles of association, and I quite agree that if the effect of these articles was that you could have no division of dividends until all the transactions were wound up, that you could have no legal dividend except out of what is termed profits in hand, there might be a great deal to be said in this case; but if we look at the articles of association as compared with Table A., it is clearly manifest that the articles of association amount to nothing of the kind. First of all, the articles of association incorporate Table A. The first article is "That all the articles of Table A. to the said act shall be deemed to be incorporated with and apply to these articles, and the said company, as near as may be and circumstances will permit, except as hereinafter modified or altered." Then, when we come to dividend, the first part of Table A. as regards that is this: "The directors may, with the sanction of the company in general meeting, declare a dividend to be paid to the members in proportion to their shares." The next is, "No dividend shall be payable except out of the profits of the business of the company." The next is, "The directors may, before recommending any dividend, set aside out of the profits of the company such sum as they think proper as a reserve fund to meet contingencies." Then we have imported into that the 5th clause of these articles; and the 5th clause of these articles is this: "The directors shall declare a dividend on the subscribed capital of the company as soon and as often as the profits of the company in hand are sufficient for payment of a dividend of 5*l.* per cent. on such capital, subject to the resolutions of a general meeting of the company called with reference thereto." I have no hesitation in saying, especially if you compare the word "may" in Table A. and the word "shall" in this 5th clause, and consider that there are negative words in Table A., and that there are none in this clause, this clause was intended simply to have this effect, and no other, namely, that when the directors had in their hands profits they should not be able to set them aside for a contingency fund, and they should be compellable to make a dividend. It did not prevent their making a dividend, but I agree it must be out of profits—out of profits, although those profits were not profits in hand. I consider that when Table A. and this clause are put together there really can be no doubt upon this question. Then, we come to the facts themselves, and I will not again go through those facts, for they have been gone through at very considerable length, not only in argument, but by my learned Brother, but it certainly never was argued that there was a fraud committed upon anybody; it was not argued nor suggested, nor could be argued or suggested, that it was intended that this thing, though in terms a dividend, should cover what was not really a dividend transaction. The mode in which the matter was done was fair enough. The books were put into the hands of an accountant, calculations were made, and a certain conclusion was arrived at; and true it is, no doubt, that these proceedings are full of risk; but although, on the one hand, there may be a great loss, everyone knows that whenever there was any success, the profits were something very enormous, and upon the balance-sheet as taken from the books it did appear that there was a profit, I think, of 42,000*l.*, and it was proposed out of that to divide somewhere about 28,000*l.*, the profits I agree not being profits in hand. Then the fault that is found with that is this, that the estimate was an erroneous estimate, that too sanguine a view was taken of the prospects of success, and that there ought to have been a very much less sum put upon the face of this balance-sheet as assets than really was put there; but still I do not think that anyone can say it was not at this date possible for honest persons carrying on this trade entertaining the view which they did entertain as to their prospects—that it was not possible for them honestly to make out such a balance-sheet as this, and honestly to believe that those were profits fairly divisible between them. As I have said before, this was not done in any underhand proceeding whatever: the whole thing was patent; the whole thing was open; it was known, or capable of being known, by every shareholder; and all I can say is that if the Agra and Masterman's Bank did not know anything about it, they neglected their duty most shamefully, and behaved most shamefully to their own shareholders, whose money they lent; for the balance-sheet was put in their hands, and they had accounts of every description, and they must have known perfectly well that it was neither more nor less than a blockade-running company; the very nature of the accounts shewed it; and so far from there being any concealment, the very balance-sheet itself was put into the hands of the auditors in order that they might see what the balance-sheet was; and no person who knew what the business of the company was could look through that balance-sheet, which would not take a person five minutes to do, without seeing at once that the full value was put upon the Confederate Government debt, and without seeing at once that the four ships had been lost, and without knowing at once that if things turned out adversely that which was profit might from subsequent events become a great loss. But that is not the state of things which, when one considers that this dividend was declared in March, 1864, and was actually paid in June, 1864, and I cannot forget that it was actually paid by the Agra and Masterman's Bank, who advanced the money, not only knowing the affairs for that purpose, but who paid the dividends through the medium of cheques drawn upon them by the shareholders,—I say I think it would be a most monstrous proposition if, at this distance of time, when a dividend has been made and paid in this way so long ago as the year 1864, if these things turn out adversely afterwards and the company is wound up in 1867 at the instance of a creditor, such a dividend should be repaid. I quite agree that where there has been what can be termed fairly a misappropriation of assets, that is, as against a creditor, that the creditor has a right in the winding-up to have those assets recouped; but I cannot think that such a dividend as this was in any sense a misappropriation as against either the Agra and Masterman's Bank or any other creditor, or that it was in any sense delusive, or in any sense a fraudulent transaction, or that it was any other transaction than this, namely, that mercantile men were engaged in transactions which might result in very great loss,—total loss; and which might also result in very great profit, taking a sanguine view of what the value of the assets was, looking at what at that date was the actual profit made, acting upon that bona fide, and not intending to defraud in any way whatever. Therefore I am of opinion that this application should have been dismissed with costs in the Court below, and will be now; and the appeal will be dismissed with costs.

Trustee Relief Act (22 & 23 Vict. s. 35.)—Unnecessary Payment into Court —Executor's Release—Legacy to Married Woman—Costs.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—An executor is not entitled to call for a release and indemnity from legatees, their receipt alone being sufficient discharge.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—Trustees are not justified, as a matter of course, in paying a married woman's legacy into Court; but it will be liable for costs if such payment appear vexatious and unnecessary.

In re Swan (2 Hem. & M. 34) questioned.

Testator dying in 1851, bequeathed the sum of 1,200*l.* (then in the hands of and due to his estate from his son) to the trustees and executors of his will, upon trust, to pay the income to his widow for life, and after her decease to divide the capital equally between his two grandchildren, one of whom was now a married woman. The income was paid to the widow for seventeen years; on her death the grandchildren applied for payment of their legacies, but the trustees refused to pay over the fund to them without a release and indemnity, alleging that some claim had been made by other beneficiaries under the will. The legatees refused to execute any release, and the trustees thereupon paid the fund into Court, under the Trustee Relief Act, deducting 33*l.* on account of costs, and stating in their affidavit that two of the testator's general legatees had set up a claim to part of the fund on the ground that his general estate was insufficient to pay their legacies in full.

Mr. H. R. Woodhouse, for the grandchildren, now petitioned for payment out, and asked that the trustees might be ordered to pay all costs.

Mr. Owen, for the alleged claimants, repudiated any interest in the fund, and asked for costs.

Mr. E. C. Willis, for the trustees, submitted that under the circumstances of an adverse claim having been made, they were entitled to a release and indemnity; and were also justified in paying the fund into Court, by the fact of one of the legatees being a married woman, and therefore entitled to an opportunity of asserting her equity to a settlement—In re Swan (2 Hem. & M. 34).

MALINS, V.C.—It was the duty of these trustees to pay over the 1,200*l.* immediately after the widow's death, and they had no right to call for any deed of release or indemnity, the receipt of the legatees being quite sufficient discharge. It is quite a mistake, but not an uncommon one, for executors and trustees to require or consider themselves entitled in all cases to a formal deed of release. Such a requisition in the present instance was quite unreasonable. After paying the income to the widow for seventeen years, there could be no question as to the title of these specific legatees, nor was there, in fact, any substance in the alleged claims. The payment into Court, under the circumstances, was, in my opinion, unnecessary and vexatious. It is now sought to justify the conduct of the trustees upon the authority of the decision in In re Swan. But I cannot accede to the proposition that it is the duty of trustees, in all cases of legacies to married women, to incur the expense of paying the fund into Court, merely to obtain the lady's formal consent to the payment of the money to her husband. I wish to be understood as declining to follow that decision. In the present case it appears there has been no application whatever by the trustees to the lady on the subject, although she was ready at any time to give her consent. The attempted justification, therefore, is a mere afterthought, and cannot be sustained. There must be an order for payment of the fund to the petitioners, and the trustees must pay the costs of this petition, together with the 33*l.*, and all other costs occasioned by their payment of the fund into Court.

NOTE.—This petition was afterwards taken on appeal before the Lords Justices, but their Lordships declined to hear the appeal, on the ground that it was in substance only an appeal for costs.

Vendor and Purchaser—Prematurely paid Purchase-Money—Lien.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—A purchaser of an estate under a decree of the Court was improperly kept out of possession by the plaintiff for more than a year after he had paid his purchase-money into Court:—Held, that the purchaser was entitled to have paid to him out of the purchase-money sums in respect of the following particulars, viz., first, an occupation rent for the period during which he had been improperly kept out of possession; secondly, arrears of tithes which he had paid; thirdly, damage to the estate by improper management; and fourthly, the costs of obtaining possession.

The testator in the cause by his will devised to a trustee an estate called Mellingye, upon trust to sell and invest the proceeds of such sale and to pay the income therefrom arising to the plaintiff for life. The estate was put up for sale under the decree of the Court, and was purchased by the applicant, John Jose, for the sum of 1,305*l.*

By an order dated the 29th of June, 1867, the purchaser was ordered, on or before the 6th of August, 1867, to pay into Court, to the credit of the cause, his purchase-money together with 7*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.* for interest thereon from the 24th of June, 1867, and upon such payment being made the purchaser was to be let into possession of the rents and profits from the 24th of June, 1867; and all proper parties were to join in executing a proper conveyance to the purchaser. The purchase-money was duly paid into Court. The plaintiff, who was in possession of the estate, refused to let the purchaser into possession. By an order, dated the 10th of June, 1868, the plaintiff was ordered within seven days after the service upon him thereof to give up possession of the property to the purchaser. The plaintiff, however, refused to obey this order, and on the 22nd of July, 1868, the purchaser was put into possession by the sheriff, acting under a writ of assistance. The plaintiff had since become bankrupt.

The purchaser now applied to have paid to him out of the purchase-money the following sums, viz., first, 34*l.* 7*s.* for occupation rent from the 24th of June, 1867, to the 22nd of July, 1868; secondly, 2*l.* 4*s.* 7*d.* for tithes which had become due before the 24th of June, 1767, and had been paid by the purchaser; thirdly, 40*l.*, the estimated amount of damage to the estate from improper management during the period aforesaid; and fourthly, the costs of the proceedings to obtain possession and of that application.

Mr. Cookson, in support of the application, contended that the purchaser having paid his purchase-money before he had got possession had a lien upon the money for the sums in question—He referred to Wythes v. Lee (3 Drew. 396; 25 L. J. Ch. 177).

Mr. Rowcliffe, for the trustee, did not oppose the application except so far as it related to the costs of obtaining possession, the orders as to which had been obtained ex parte. He asked for an inquiry as to the amount of the alleged damage. The sums to be now allowed ought to be a charge upon the plaintiff's life interest.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I think the purchaser is entitled to what he asks. If you cannot agree as to the damage there must be an inquiry.

Winding-up of Company—Interest on Debts—Dividends.

COMPANY.—When a company has been ordered to be wound up, the interest upon debts which carry interest ceases to run from the commencement of the winding-up, unless the estate is sufficient to pay all debts in full, in which case alone subsequent interest can be claimed.

In the case of a solvent estate, the accounts between the company and creditors must be ultimately adjusted as if no winding-up had taken place.

This was an appeal by the official liquidator of the above company from an order of the Master of the Rolls.

The company was ordered to be wound up compulsorily on the 13th of March, 1866, at which time the Warrant Finance Company was a creditor for a principal sum of 25,000*l.*, upon which, if it should not be paid at a certain date, interest at 20*l.* per cent. per annum was to be payable. The date in question occurred shortly after the winding-up.

The assets of the company had not been realized, but it was doubtful whether they would suffice to pay the principal of all the debts owing at the date of the winding-up. The question, therefore, arose whether any dividend should be now paid in respect of interest on the debt of the Warrant Finance Company. The Master of the Rolls held that the dividends should be declared both upon the principal and upon the interest that had accrued at the time of declaring the dividends respectively, and that these dividends should be separately applied in reduction of the principal and interest. It appeared that there was a difference of practice in the various branches of the Court, and as will be seen from the jugdment of Lord Justice Selwyn, the Judges had been unable to agree upon a general rule.

Mr. Southgate and Mr. Wickens, for the appeal.—The rule which is invariably adopted in bankruptcy, viz., that when there is a deficiency of assets dividends should only be made upon the principal and the interest that has accrued at the date of the bankruptcy, ought to be adopted in the analogous case of a winding-up. Where there is no deficiency of assets no necessity for a rule arises, for in that case all interest must, no doubt, be paid. The winding-up ought not to relieve the shareholders of their liabilities. There was, therefore, no contest between creditors whose debts bore interest and those whose debts did not, in the cases of In re the State Fire Insurance Company (2 Hem. & M. 722; 34 L. J. Ch. 58); In re the Herefordshire Banking Company (36 L. J. Ch. 806; L. R. 4 Eq. 250); and In re the East of England Banking Company (38 L. J. Ch. 121; L. R. 4 Ch. 14); because in those cases there were assets for the payment of debts.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. Eddis, for the Warrant Finance Company.—The rule in Chancery is the rule which ought to be followed here, and not the rule in bankruptcy. Dividends ought therefore to be calculated upon all interest as well as principal, and should be applied in reducing interest first and then in reducing principal. They referred to The Companies' Act, 1862, s. 170; The Orders of the 11th of November, 1862, r. 72; Kellock's case (L. R. 3 Ch. 769); and In re the Xeres Wine Company (L. R. 3 Ch. 769).

Mr. Westlake, for other creditors.

Mr. Southgate, in reply.

Lord Justice Selwyn.—We have several times considered this case, for a meeting of the Judges was held with a view if possible of laying down a general rule. But, as it appeared that there was no uniform practice, no final decision was arrived at, it being thought advisable to leave the matter to be decided in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. It is matter of surprise that after the number of years during which winding-up proceedings have taken place the question has never arisen for judicial decision. It now comes before us upon the recommendation of the Master of the Rolls, that we may decide, so far as the authority of this Court can decide, what rule is to be applicable in these cases. It is some satisfaction to us that, in forming a rule upon the point, we are not fettered by any rule which obliges us to depart from what appears to be the justice of the case.

Digitized by Google

The case is, I believe, unaffected by any previous decision, for the cases which were alluded to—Kellock's case and In re the Xeres Wine Company—relate to an entirely different point, and the effect of the decisions in those cases is only this, that the right of a creditor having a mortgage security to proceed upon all his remedies at once was not taken away from him by any of the provisions of the Companies Act.

In the present case, what we have to consider is the position of the several creditors of the company, some of whom have a right to receive interest, others having debts not bearing interest. In the first place, as it seems to me, we must consider the case under two aspects, according as there is or there is not a surplus. I apprehend that in whatever manner the dividends may have been made, whether originally in respect of capital or in respect of interest, still, inasmuch as they will all have been made in process of law, and not under any new contract or agreement between the parties, the account ultimately must, supposing there should prove to be a surplus, be taken as between the company and creditors in the ordinary way, that is, in the manner pointed out in Bowen v. Morris (Cr. & Ph. 351; 10 L. J. Ch. 356), by treating the dividends as ordinary payments on account, and applying them, in the first place, in payment of the interest due at the respective dates of declaring them, and next in reduction of principal. This disposes of all question where there is a surplus, and there is no doubt or difficulty about it.

The doubtful question is when the estate is insolvent. Now it has been admitted, very properly, that, as to interest due at the date of the winding-up, there can be no doubt. Suppose, at the date of the winding-up, a creditor has 1,000*l*. due to him for principal and 100*l*. for interest, he would prove for 1,100*l*., and if a dividend of 10*s*. in the pound were declared immediately, he would be entitled to 550*l*., because his interest due at the date of the winding-up is just as much a debt as the principal. Suppose, at the same time, a creditor has a debt of 1,000*l*. which, like that of the respondents in this case, has no interest due upon it, although it carried interest, and a dividend of 10*s*. in the pound were declared, he would, in my opinion, be only entitled to 500*l*. That would obviously be the case if the Court could do what it would wish to do, namely, to realize all the assets immediately and distribute them among the creditors. It is perhaps difficult to suppose that in any case the assets could be realized so immediately, but if they consisted merely of a sum of money in the banker's hands which could be paid the next day, that would be the course of proceeding. Justice, I think, requires that that course of proceeding should be followed, and that no person should be prejudiced by the accidental delay which, in consequence of the form and proceedings of the Court and other circumstances, actually occur in realizing the assets, but that all the money of an insolvent estate, being realized as speedily as possible, should be applied equally and rateably in payment of the debts as they existed at the date of the winding-up. I think, therefore, that nothing should be allowed for interest from that date. Consequently, in the present case, this debt of 25,000*l*., which had no interest due upon it at the date of the winding-up, should stand as a debt for that sum, and for no more. I have already guarded myself from being supposed to say that the Court takes upon itself to alter the right of the creditors to any further extent, or to deprive the respondents of their right to interest at the full rate of 20*l*. per cent, if and when there is a surplus to pay it. I think that as the tree falls, so it must lie. It must be ascertained what are the debts which existed at the date of the winding-up, and all dividends in the case of an insolvent estate must be declared in respect of the debts so ascertained. It will, of course, be understood that the rule we now lay down is applicable to all cases under the recent act where creditors' actions are stayed.

GIFFARD, L.J.—I think it quite clear that the 170th section of the Companies' Act has no reference to the matter before us. Nor can I consider that there is anything in Kellock's case which at all affects the present question.

Digitized by Google

The only argument of any force which has been adduced in favour of computing interest subsequently to the winding-up is that it has been the rule which has been adopted as to dead men's estates. For some reason or other, dead men's estates have always been assumed to be solvent, and they have been wound up on that footing; but so unjust has that been found that it has been necessary to have a positive enactment to give interest from the date of the decree to simple contract creditors whose debts do not bear interest. I think therefore that the reason of the thing is rather against the rule which has been adopted as to dead men's estates than in favour of it. As to the rule which my learned Brother has laid down, it is the rule in bankruptcy. That rule was, it has been said, Judge-made law; but it was made after great consideration, and no doubt because it works with equality and fairness between the parties; and if we are to consider convenience, it is quite clear that where an estate is insolvent, convenience is all in favour of stopping the computation of interest at the date of the winding-up. For these reasons, I am of opinion that dividends ought to be paid on the debts as they stood at the time the winding-up commenced, for when the estate is insolvent, this rule has the effect of distributing the assets in the fairest way. When the estate is solvent, the rule works with equal fairness, because as soon as it is ascertained that there is a surplus, the creditor whose debt carries interest is remitted to his original right under his contract; and on the other hand a creditor who is not entitled by his contract to interest does not get any. Another reason may be added. I do not see with what justice interest can be computed in favour of creditors whose debts carry interest when other creditors are stayed from recovering judgment and so obtaining a right to carry interest.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.—Where securities are deposited for the purpose of securing bills, the parties may afterwards at any time, before both are insolvent and their estates are in a state of forced liquidation, deal with the securities as they please, notwithstanding that the bills have been in the meantime negotiated, if the bill-holders have no notice of the existence of the securities.

Semble—The principle of Ex parte Waring (19 Ves. 345) applies not only where there are two estates being wound up in bankruptcy, but also where the insolvent estates are those of a company in course of winding-up, and of a deceased person.

The R. S. Co. advanced to M. a sum of money, in consideration of which M. accepted bills to the amount of 21,000*l.*, and deposited shares with the company to secure payment of the bills. Shortly before these became due, it being intended to extend the period of the loan, the company wrote to M. requesting him to accept a new set of bills to replace the former set. M. accordingly accepted the new set, and gave them to the company. The former set remained outstanding and unpaid in the hands of third parties by whom they had been discounted without notice of the securities. The company was afterwards ordered to be wound up, and its estate was insolvent, as also was that of the acceptor, who had died in the meantime:—Held, that the holders of the former set had no claim upon the securities; though (semble) they would have had a claim if the second set had never been accepted.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Master of the Rolls (reported 38 L. J. Ch. 151), whereby the Alliance Bank were held not entitled to have certain securities applied in payment of their claims upon bills accepted by the company.

The facts are stated in the former report, to which we may here add that the fifth set of bills for 21,000*l.* was accepted by L. Murray, in accordance with an application made to him by the secretary of the Rolling Stock Company by a letter, dated the 8th of September, 1864, as follows:

"I beg to inclose you drafts for your acceptance for 21,000*l.*, being in place of those falling due on Monday next, the 12th inst., and at the same time urge upon you the necessity to duly accept and return them per return of post. Hoping you will not fail to do so," &c.

L. Murray, in returning the bills accepted, stated that he did so in accordance with the above letter. At that time, it will be seen, the bank held the 16,000*l.* of bills of the fourth set, upon which they founded their present claim. It was stated, though not proved, that Murray's estate was substantially insolvent, and it was admitted that the Rolling Stock Company would pay but a very small dividend on their debts.

The Alliance Bank appealed.

There was no application before the Court by any other party than the Alliance Bank.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. Eddis, for the Alliance Bank, contended, as in the Court below, that the case of Ex parte Waring (19 Ves. 345) was decisive in their favour, so as to give them the right to have the proceeds of the securities applied in payment of the fourth set of bills; and that it was not necessary that both the estates of drawer and acceptor should be in bankruptcy —Powles v. Hargreaves (3 De Gex, M. & G. 430; 23 L. J. Ch. 1).

Mr. Jessel and Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Wickens, Mr. Davey, and Mr. Lawrance, for various holders of the fifth set, opposed the claim of the Alliance Bank upon the ground that the transaction of the 8th of September, 1864, had the effect of transferring the security of the shares, &c. from the fourth set to the fifth set. They argued, equally with the appellants, that Ex parte Waring applied, but, as they contended, it was in their favour, and not in favour of the appellants. The doctrine of that case was first laid down by Lord Eldon to meet a dead lock which arose in deciding the equities between two bankrupt estates. That dead lock existed with exactly the same force in such cases as the present. They cited Trimmingham v. Maud (38 L. J. Ch. 207; L. R. 7 Eq. 201).

Mr. Roxburgh, for Murray's representatives, was indifferent whether the Alliance Bank or the holders of the fifth set of bills obtained the benefit of the securities, so long as one of them, and only one, had it; but in other respects supported the contention of the appellants.

Mr. Southgate (Mr. Bagshawe with him), for the official liquidator of the Rolling Stock Company, contended, that as there was not a double bankruptcy, Ex parte Waring (ubi supra) had no application. Rules in Bankruptcy had no application in winding-up cases. Neither the Alliance Bank nor the holders of the fifth set had any right to the securities. They supported the order of the Master of the Rolls; and relied on Laycock v. Johnson (6 Hare, 199; 16 L. J. Ch. 350); In re the Joint-Stock Discount Company; Loder's case (L. R. 6 Eq. 491; 37 L. J. Ch. 846); Inman v. Clare (John. 769); In re Barned's Bank; Ex parte Stephens (L. R. 3 Ch. 753).

Sir R. Baggallay, in reply.

SELWYN, L.J.—The Master of the Rolls did not in his judgment in this case question the authority of the case of Ex parte Waring. On the contrary, he referred to it as still governing all cases which fall within the scope of its authority. It certainly was not the intention of the Lord Chancellor and myself, in Ex parte Stephens, to question its authority in any way. The principle upon which Ex parte Waring proceeds appears very clearly from Lord Eldon's judgment, and particularly from two short passages to which I may refer. He says (p. 349), "If these bill-holders are to have payment in preference to other creditors, it must be by the effect of an equity between the two houses rather than by any demand directly in their own right upon any fund in the hands of Brickwood & Co." Again, he adds (p. 350), much in the same spirit, "Having regard to the demands of all the creditors and the bankrupts, in this circuitous way, I think the bill-holders must be paid, not as having a demand upon these funds in respect of the acceptances they hold, but as the estate of Brickwood & Co. must be cleared of the demand by these acceptances, and the surplus, after answering that demand, must be made good to Bracken & Co."

We see, then, that in these cases the claims of the bill-holders depend not upon any contract to which they are parties; for, in the case of Ex parte Waring, as in this case, the bill-holders had not, when they took the bills, even any notice of the existence of the securities the benefit of which they claimed; but their right depends upon the accidental concurrence of circumstances giving rise to such a complication as that which existed in Ex parte Waring, one which can only be solved by one particular application of the securities or their proceeds. To give rise to such a state of things there must be two insolvent estates, and there must be a forced administration of both estates. Until these circumstances concurrently exist the two persons, parties to the original contract, have a perfect right to deal with the securities, which one of them has deposited with the other, in any manner they think fit. That is what was intended to be decided, and, as I think, was decided by the Lord Chancellor in Ex parte Stephens, when he said, "The bill-holder might have raised an equity, but even then he could not raise it till he had given the person who gave the guarantee notice of his claim, and until that time they might deal with all the rights as between them and the acceptors in any way they thought fit."

Applying, then, these principles, which seem to me clearly established, to the facts of the present case, we find, in the first place, that there was here a contract between Mr. Murray and the Rolling Stock Company originally for a loan of 12,000*l.* and a bonus of 2,000*l.*, which by means of the sum of 3,000*l.* (which has been called a fine) and some subsequent bonuses of 1,500*l.* and 2,500*l.* became raised to the sum of 21,000*l.*, a sum which was secured by the fourth and fifth sets of bills.

Under the original contract of the 13th of March, 1863, for the 12,000*l.* and bonus of 2,000*l.*, Mr. Murray agreed to give his acceptances, and to deposit as a collateral security for their payment certain railway shares and other property. That is to say, the shares were a collateral security for the loan which was primarily secured by the acceptances. I need not go through the details of the subsequent transactions in respect of which the subsequent bonuses were agreed upon; but, applying the principle of Ex parte Stephens, it seems to me clear that Mr. Murray and the Rolling Stock Company, the parties to that contract, were at liberty at any time to deal with the securities, the subject-matter of the contract, as they thought fit, wholly irrespective of any claim by holders of the bills. The question which we have now to decide is, whether they have so dealt with the securities as to constitute at the date of the insolvencies a state of circumstances which can support a claim such as that which is raised upon the present occasion."

The whole question seems to me to depend upon the construction which ought to be put upon the letter of the 8th of September, 1864. That letter—[which his Lordship read]—contains a plain statement that the bills, the particulars of which are stated in the letter, were to be accepted by Mr. Murray in the place of those falling due on the 12th of September. The parties being at that time fully entitled to deal with the securities as they thought fit, and without regard to any interest existing in any bill-holder, entered into an arrangement the substance of which, I think, clearly was this: Mr. Murray was to accept (and he did accept) the fifth set of bills for 21,000*l.*, and they were to replace the fourth set of bills. The Rolling Stock Company after this could not possibly have a right to say that they could retain the securities as security for the fourth set of bills, for the very essence of this transaction was that they should put an end to Mr. Murray's liability on the fourth set, and they were bound in good faith and honour to do so. The agreement, if it had been put into a formal shape, would have been, that the fourth set of bills should be cancelled and should be delivered over in the cancelled state to Mr. Murray. In that case clearly it could not have been said that the security was a continuing security in respect of those bills, for they would cease to exist; and the fact that Mr. Murray subsequently failed to pay the fifth set cannot, in my opinion, revive any right in respect of the fourth set. The appellants are holders of some of the fourth set, the security in respect of which was entirely put an end to by the transaction between Mr. Murray and the company at a time when those parties were fully at liberty to deal with the security as they thought fit. Consequently, the state of things with regard to the securities, which alone could bring them within the principle of Ex parte Waring, never could arise so as to benefit the appellants.

I think, therefore, that the Master of the Rolls was quite right in refusing the claim of the appellants. That is the only point before us; and I think it would be dangerous to go further in this case, particularly when I consider the mode in which proceedings in these winding-up cases are necessarily conducted. I therefore only decide the case of the Alliance Bank and nothing more. This appeal must be refused, with costs.

GIFFARD, L.J.—The order of the Master of the Rolls must be affirmed, although I confess I do not accede to the reasons which seem to have led his Lordship to the conclusion at which he arrived. The simple ground upon which I found the affirmance of the order is this, that the Alliance Bank ought not to be paid out of the proceeds of the security, because as between the two estates there is no contract authorizing the application of the proceeds of these securities in payment of the bills which the Alliance Bank holds. Now, I certainly have no hesitation whatever in saying that Ex parte Waring and Powles v. Hargreaves apply to such insolvencies as exist in the present case, as between the insolvent estate which is being wound up and the insolvent estate of Mr. Murray, whose personal representative appears here admitting insolvency and submitting to be bound. I possibly should have thought that the decision of the Master of the Rolls could not stand if the matter rested entirely upon the state of things which existed when bills of the fourth set were drawn; but that state of circumstances does not exist. The letter of the 8th of September, 1864, in my opinion, created an entirely new contract. After that letter the state of facts was such that as between Mr. Murray and the Rolling Stock Company, the latter had no right to apply these securities otherwise than in payment of the bills, which were accepted on the footing of that letter. I consider that to be the only contract which affects the deposit of securities. It was made at a time when these parties were both in a position to enter into any contract they might think fit without regard to the bill-holders, and I am of opinion that it excludes the Alliance Bank.

BROWN v. OAKSHOTT.

38 L. J. Ch. 717.

Sale by Auction—Opening Biddings—30 & 31 Vict. c. 48. s. 7.

AUCTIONEERS AND VALUERS. VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—Neglect on the part of an auctioneer to ascertain the reserved price before the commencement of a sale, is not such "improper conduct in the management of the sale" as will authorize the Court to open the biddings.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application under the 7th section of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 48, which forbids the Court to open biddings except on the ground of "fraud or improper conduct in the management of the sale."

On a sale by auction one of the lots was knocked down at 9,000*l.*, the exact amount of the reserved price. It afterwards came to the knowledge of the persons interested in the property sold that there were persons who would have offered a much higher sum if they had known that the reserved bidding had been reached. They now sought therefore to open the biddings on the ground of improper conduct and undue haste in the management of the sale.

It appeared that the auctioneer had received a note of the reserved bidding in a sealed envelope, which he was instructed not to open "until the time of sale." He knocked down the lot at 9,000*l.*, after going through the usual forms and allowing the usual time to pass before the fall of the hammer, and then proceeded to open the envelope and ascertain whether the reserved price had been reached.

Sir R. Baggallay and Mr. Briggs, in support of the summons, argued that the auctioneer ought to have ascertained the reserved price before the commencement of the sale, and then exercised his discretion whether to state when the reserved price was reached, for such an announcement was often an encouragement to bidders.

Sir Roundell Palmer and Mr. Higgins, for the purchaser; and

Mr. Southgate and Mr. W. W. Karslake, Mr. Roxburgh and Mr. Lindley, for various parties to the suit, were not called upon.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, it was clear that the act meant only to provide for the case of grossly improper conduct. If, for example, persons intending to bid had been deceived as to the time when the sale was to commence, that would be a reason for opening the biddings. There was no ground for impeaching the management of the sale in the present case, and the summons must be dismissed.

Specific Performance—Statute of Frauds—Contract in Writing—Agreement by Agent, Allegation of—Demurrer.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE. VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—A bill for specific performance of a contract for a twenty-one years' lease alleged to be entered into by defendant P, as agent for the plaintiff, with the other defendant S, stated that P. had informed the plaintiff that S. had written him a letter constituting the contract, and further stated that P. had entered into "the said" contract as agent for and on behalf of the plaintiff:—Held, on demurrer, affirming the decision of Malins, V.C., that the bill contained a sufficient averment of a contract in writing to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and that it was not necessary that the agency of P. should be constituted by writing.

Bartlett v. Pickersgill (4 East, 557, n. b) doubted.

The bill was filed against William Pilley and Samuel Sugden, praying for a declaration that Pilley had entered into an agreement with Sugden for a lease of premises, No. 91, Fore Street, in the city of London, as the agent for and on behalf of the plaintiff, and for specific performance of the said agreement.

The bill stated that the plaintiff had from time to time purchased leasehold and other property for the purpose of selling or letting the same at a profit, and that Pilley had on one occasion assisted him in negotiating and effecting such purchases; that Pilley, in his character of property-tax collector for the wards of Cripplegate Within and Without, had become acquainted with the terms on which the lease of the premises in question was held; and on the 22nd of September, 1868, had called upon the plaintiff and stated to him that the unexpired lease, a year and a half, would be sold for a very trifling sum, and that he had ascertained from Sugden, the owner, that they would be let for 200*l.* per annum, and that they would underlet for an advanced rent, and he offered to obtain an agreement for a lease from Sugden, and to purchase the interest of the present lessee of the premises as agent for the plaintiff.

The fourth paragraph of the bill stated, amongst other things, that the plaintiff on the 8th of October authorized Pilley to offer 200*l.* per annum to Sugden for the premises for twenty-one years, and on the 20th of October Pilley informed the plaintiff that Sugden had written and sent to him a letter, dated the previous day, accepting the offer, and agreeing to let the premises to him for twenty-one years from the expiration of the existing term, at the rent of 200*l.* per annum.

The plaintiff also authorized Pilley to offer Robert Brown, the tenant, 100*l.* for the premises, and such offer was afterwards made to Brown and accepted by him, and an agreement in writing to that effect was entered into and signed by and between Brown and Pilley, dated the 21st of October, 1868.

The bill also contained the following paragraphs:

5. The said William Pilley entered into the said agreement with the said Samuel Sugden and Robert Brown respectively, as the agent for and on behalf of the plaintiff, and he afterwards paid the said sum of 100*l.* to the said Robert Brown, on the understanding that the same would be repaid to him by the plaintiff.

8. Before the said William Pilley entered into the said agreement with the said Samuel Sugden as such agent as aforesaid, the said James Rowe Heard (the plaintiff) asked him why he did not take a lease of the said premises himself, and the said William Pilley stated that he had not capital to speculate with, as the said J. R. Heard well knew, and that he had not disclosed the name of the said J. R. Heard as his principal, because he found he had some personal influence in the negotiations, and that he thought he should better succeed for the said J. R. Heard by using his own name, and that they could easily make arrangements to transfer the premises to him afterwards.

9. After the said W. Pilley had obtained a letter from the said S. Sugden, agreeing to let the said premises to him, as aforesaid, he had a conversation with Alfred Heard, a brother of the said J. R. Heard, upon the subject, and he then, after giving the said letter to the said Alfred Heard to read, said, "Tell your brother, as he will be glad to hear it." meaning thereby that the said agreement was entered into for the benefit of the said J. R. Heard, and not for the said W. Pilley.

The bill further stated, that Pilley now threatened, and intended to deal with the premises as his own, and that Sugden refused to recognize the plaintiff in the matter, and it therefore prayed in the terms already mentioned.

The defendants Pilley and Sugden demurred severally, and the demurrers came on for hearing before Vice Chancellor Malins, who, on the 22nd of February, 1869, overruled both demurrers. The defendants severally appealed from his Honour's decision.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Jolliffe, for the defendant Pilley, and

Mr. Lawrence, for Sugden, supported the appeals.—They contended that there was in the bill no sufficient allegation of a contract in writing to satisfy the Statute of Frauds; and, further, that there was no allegation that the appointment of Pilley to act as the plaintiff's agent, was in writing. They cited—Bartlett v. Pickersgill (4 East, 577, note (b); 1 Cox, 15; 4 Burr. 2255; 1 Eden. 515); Sug. Vend. & Pur. 703 (14th ed.)).

Mr. Cotton and Mr. Berkeley, for the plaintiff, were not called upon on the first point.—On the second they contended that Bartlett v. Pickersgill had no application. In that case the defendant had bought the estate in his own name, and it had been conveyed to him, and after the conveyance was executed the plaintiff filed his bill to compel him to convey the estate. They referred also to—Willis v. Willis (2 Atk. 71); Lees v. Nuttall (3 L. J. Ch. 124; 2 M. & K. 284); Taylor v. Salmon (4 Myl. & Cr. 142).[1]

Mr. Jolliffe was heard in reply.

SELWYN, L.J.—In this case two questions have been raised: first, whether there is any sufficient allegation in the bill that an agreement was in fact entered into by the defendant Pilley in writing, so as to constitute it an agreement which could be enforced, having regard to the provisions of the Statute of Frauds; and, secondly, as between the plaintiff and the defendant Pilley, whether there is any such allegation of agency as is consistent with the provisions of that statute, and can be enforced. With regard to the first point, we did not think it necessary to hear the respondent's counsel; but it appears to me, that, although there has been in this bill an unfortunate departure from the common forms of pleading, still there is a statement in the fourth paragraph relating to a letter, though it is so stated as not to amount to a positive allegation. Then, in the fifth paragraph, it is stated, "The said William Pilley entered into the said agreement with the said Samuel Sugden and Robert Brown respectively as the agent for and on behalf of the said James Rowe Heard." And coupling that statement with what is afterwards stated in the eighth and ninth paragraphs, I think there is sufficient allegation of an agreement and an agreement constituted by the letter written and signed by the defendant Sugden, so as to render it impossible for him to set up a case that there is no contract in writing relating to this property. Then, with regard to the agency of Pilley. In the first place, the fact of the agency of Pilley is distinctly stated: "The said William Pilley entered into the said agreement with the said Samuel Sugden and Robert Brown, respectively, as the agents for and on behalf of the said James Rowe Heard, and afterwards paid the sum of 100*l.* to the said Robert Brown, on the understanding that the same would be repaid to him by the said James Rowe Heard." Now, although it may be true that he afterwards disputed or questioned that agency, the fact must be taken as clear and indisputable. Then this bill is brought into the category of those very common bills—a bill for specific performance alleging a contract entered into by the owner of the property, a contract by letter or agreement, but that the person with whom he entered into it was the agent of the plaintiff, and filed by the principal against the agent, and against the person with whom that agent has entered into the contract. That is a bill of a very ordinary description, and it is a startling

(1) See Coles v. Trecothick (9 Ves. 250).

proposition to say that, unless the bill alleges that the agency was constituted by writing, such a bill cannot be sustained.

The only authority which has been cited in support of that proposition is Bartlett v. Pickersgill. It appears to me that that case does not govern the present one, because that is a case in which the conveyance was executed, and in which it appears, from the short statement of the case, in a note in 4 East that the bill was a bill by the plaintiff seeking for a conveyance to the plaintiff as against the defendant, to whom that conveyance had already been made. The statement is, "That the defendant bought an estate for the plaintiff, but there was no written agreement between them, nor was any part of the purchase-money paid by the plaintiff. The defendant articled for the estate in his own name, and refused to convey to the plaintiff, so this bill was brought to compel a conveyance." That is, after the conveyance had been executed, the bill was filed by the plaintiff, by one person on one side, and only one, and the defendant on the other, seeking for a conveyance of that estate from the defendant to whom the conveyance was made. That entirely distinguishes that case from the present, which is an ordinary suit by a principal, bringing before the Court an agent and the person with whom the contract had been entered into. Assuming the case of Bartlett v. Pickersgill to be good law, it cannot, I think, be considered as laying down any such general proposition as is contended for by the defendants. At all events, it would be subject to qualifications, especially to those which are mentioned by Lord St. Leonards, in page 118 of his book; and it is also subject to the qualification established by Lord Hardwicke in the case referred to of Willis v. Willis, where his Lordship says, "There is another way of taking a case out of the statute, and that is by admitting parol evidence, within the rules laid down in this Court, to shew the trust from the mean circumstances of the pretended owner of the real estate or inheritance, which make it impossible for him to be the purchaser." It is not altogether unworthy of remark, that the very passage Mr. Jolliffe referred to in his reply tends to shew something like that state of circumstances existing in the present case, for he says the bill shews in the eighth paragraph that Mr. Pilley said, "that he had not capital to speculate with, as the said J. R. Heard well knew." I think, therefore, in this case we must take it that there is a clear and express allegation of the agency of Pilley. I cannot at all accede to the argument urged in reply, that under those circumstances when the agent goes to the principal and says, "I will go and buy an estate for you," it is not a fraudulent act on his part afterwards to buy the estate for himself, and then deny the agency. I think that would be an attempt to make the Statute of Frauds an instrument of fraud; therefore I agree with the judgment of the Vice Chancellor, and I think that both of these demurrers were properly overruled, and both petitions of appeal must be dismissed with costs.

GIFFARD, L.J.—In this case, although the fourth paragraph of the bill would not amount to a sufficient allegation of agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant, I am satisfied that when you take in connexion with that the fifth, eighth, and ninth paragraphs, there is a clear allegation of an agreement in writing signed by Sugden. That being so, the only other question is that which is raised by the case of Bartlett v. Pickersgill; and certainly I must say, there having been no conveyance from Sugden to Pilley, the whole object in point of fact of the bill is to enforce specific performance between Heard, the plaintiff, and Sugden; and Pilley is brought here simply to be bound, and for nothing else, and no conveyance is sought from him. I cannot help saying, as regards the case of Bartlett v. Pickersgill, that it seems to be quite inconsistent with all the authorities of this Court, which proceed on the footing that it will not allow the Statute of Frauds to be made an instrument of fraud. Therefore, the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Mortgage—Policy of Assurance—Premiums—Priority.

INSURANCE. MORTGAGE.—S. being entitled to a bond and judgment, mortgaged them to V. A policy of insurance was afterwards assigned to S. to secure the judgment debt and other moneys, and the premiums to be paid on the policy. S. paid the premiums on the policy till his death, after which his legal personal representative continued to pay them, under an order of Court made in an administration suit, till the policy fell in:—Held, that the premiums paid by the legal personal representative, together with interest (but not those paid by S. himself), must be repaid out of the policy money in priority to the debts secured.

In February, 1846, Mr. Lalor, who owed Mr. Sadleir 900*l.*, gave him a bond to secure that sum and interest at 6*l.* per cent. per annum, together with the further security of a judgment; and in 1847 Mr. Sadleir, being indebted to Mr. Vincent Scully in 8,000*l.*, gave him an equitable assignment of the bond and judgment as security for that debt.

In April, 1850, the administratrix of Mr. Lalor (who had died intestate in 1846) assigned to Mr. Sadleir a policy of assurance granted by the Caledonian Insurance Company for the sum of 5,000*l.* less one shilling as security for satisfaction of the judgment debt, and for the repayment with interest of the balance of certain other accounts, and of the premiums to be paid by him to keep up the policy, and Mr. Sadleir covenanted to keep up the policy. The premiums were paid by Mr. Sadleir up to the time of his death, and after that by his legal personal representative.

Mr. Sadleir died in February, 1856, and the present plaintiff (Mr. Norris) became his legal personal representative, and instituted a suit in Ireland for the administration of his personal estate. In that suit the payment of the premiums was ordered to be continued, and Mr. Vincent Scully was declared to have a lien on the policy to the extent to which it was a security for satisfaction of the bond and judgment.

Mr. Norris continued to pay the premiums until the policy fell in. This took place in September, 1867; and in February, 1868, the money due upon it, amounting (after deduction of the expenses of the insurance company) to 4,716*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.*, was paid into Court.

This amount was insufficient for the payment of the various sums secured on the policy; and the question now argued was, whether all these sums should abate rateably, or whether the premiums should be fully repaid with interest, in priority to the other charges.

Mr. Benjamin Hardy and Mr. Napier Higgins, for the plaintiff, argued that money paid to prevent the policy from dropping was in the nature of salvage, and ought to be a first charge on it. They cited—Clack v. Holland (19 Beav. 262; 24 L. J. Ch. 13); West v. Reid (2 Hare, 249; 12 L. J. Ch. 245).

Mr. Smart appeared for the Caledonian Insurance Company.

Mr. Bird and Mr. Ramadge, appeared for other parties interested.

Mr. Mackeson and Mr. Wellington Cooper, for Mr. V. Scully, argued that what a mortgagor paid for the benefit of the mortgaged premises could not be charged on them in priority to the mortgage debt, and that the legal personal representative of the mortgagor could not be in a different position from the mortgagor himself. They cited—Otter v. Lord Vaux (2 Kay & J. 650; 26 L. J. Ch. 128). The cases of Drydale v. Piggott (8 De Gex, M. & G. 546;

25 L. J. Ch. 878); Frazer v. Jones (5 Hare, 475; 17 L. J. Ch. 353); Hill v. Trenery (28 Beav. 16); and Beresford v. Beresford (28 Beav. 292), were also referred to.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS (May 25), after stating the facts, said: On the part of Mr. V. Scully, it is argued that moneys paid by a mortgagor to keep up the mortgaged property cannot be claimed against the mortgagee; that a prior mortgage paid off enures for the benefit of the subsequent mortgagee; and that the payment of ground-rent, quit-rents and the like can never be claimed against the mortgagee; and I assent to those propositions. Although I do not think that this is exactly the same case, I am of opinion that the premiums paid during the life of Mr. Sadleir cannot now be charged on the policy money. But I think that in this case the legal personal representative does not stand in the same situation as Mr. Sadleir himself did; and I also think that the rights of the parties are in a great degree settled by the proceedings in Ireland. When the plaintiff became the legal personal representative of Mr. Sadleir, he was not compellable to keep up the policy of assurance and pay the premiums out of his own money, or even out of the estate of Mr. Sadleir. Indeed, he could not properly, without the sanction of the Court in which he had instituted proceedings, take the assets belonging to the general creditors for the purpose of keeping on foot a security which was specifically mortgaged to others. He was in the position of a trustee, and the trusts were, in the first place, to keep up the policy, and then to distribute the proceeds amongst the persons who had charges upon it according to their priorities. He might have borrowed money on the security of the policy for the purpose of paying the premiums; but the persons to whom or for whose benefit the policy was assigned could not require that the money so raised should be paid out of the general estate of Mr. Sadleir. The matter seems to me to have been thus settled by the ruling of the Master in the Irish suit, which bears date the 30th of May, 1860. That order contains a direction in these words: "Continue to pay the premiums until further order." Assuming that Mr. Norris might have given a preference to one class of creditors over another (which, after the suit was begun, appears to me to be very doubtful), it is certain that this is never done by the Court. Consequently, the order of the Master under which Mr. Norris paid the premiums till the policy fell in cannot be considered as altering the rights of the parties, or giving any advantage to Mr. V. Scully over the other creditors of Mr. Sadleir which he did not already possess.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the first charge on the policy moneys is the repayment of the premiums paid for its maintenance by the plaintiff, together with interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum.

Will—Bequest to build for Charitable Purposes—Tendency to bring Land into Mortmain.

CHARITY.—A bequest of money for the purpose of building involves the acquisition of land whereon to build, unless the contrary is expressly ordered in the will, and is therefore void.

A testator bequeathed a fund to his executors "to be used towards the erection of a new chapel instead of the one now in use when such erection shall take place ":—Held, that these words did not exclude the acquisition of land, and that the gift was void.

The Rev. Abraham Watmough, of St. Helen's, Wesleyan minister, by his will gave all his personal property into the hands of his executors for the use of his wife for her life, " and the rest of my property I leave in the hands of my executors to be given, used or employed by them towards the erection of a new Wesleyan chapel, in the town of St. Helen's, instead of the one now in use when such an erection shall take place." Testator died in 1863, and his wife in 1868. The executors paid a sum of 534*l.* into Court. This was a petition by the trustees of the chapel for payment to them of the said sum. The evidence shewed that at the date of the will there was no actual scheme for the erection of a new Wesleyan chapel, though the necessity of building one had been discussed by the testator and others; that in 1867 a site had been purchased, and a new chapel had been since erected thereon. The petitioners submitted that they were entitled, as trustees of the new chapel, to the said sum of 534*l.*, " to be applied by them towards payment of the amount then still owing for building the said new chapel."

Mr. Glasse, for the petitioners.—This is a good bequest; the trusts of the will do not involve the necessity of acquiring land, and so bringing it into mortmain—Booth v. Carter (L. R. 3 Eq. 757); Sewell v. Crewe-Read (L. R. 3 Eq. 60; 36 L. J. Ch. 136); Philpott v. St. George's Hospital (6 H.L. C. 338; 28 L. J. Ch. 657; 27 Beav. 107); Dixon v. Butler (3 You. & C. Ex. 677). Where executors have the option between two courses, one of which invalidates their testator's bequest and the other confirms it, they must choose the latter—The Attorney General v. the Bishop of Chester (1 Bro. C.C. 444).

Mr. Rowcliffe with him.—How could money be applied to the purchase of land when it is directed to be used only " when the erection of a chapel shall take place "? Such a course would be inconsistent with the trusts of the will. —He cited—Castle v. Green (3 Kay & J. 591; 26 L. J. Ch. 845).

Mr. Wickens, for the Attorney General.—If this be a good gift, but the machinery for putting it into effect bad, I claim it on behalf of the Attorney General according to the doctrine of cy-près—Martin v. Maugham (14 Sim. 230; 13 L. J. Ch. 392). It is true that if the gift be void under the Mortmain Acts the property will go to the next-of-kin. But this gift can only be brought within those acts by the doctrine, that a bequest is void which has a tendency to bring land into mortmain. This " tendency " doctrine was exploded by Philpott v. St. George's Hospital (ubi supra), in which the Court below held the gift void, in conformity with Trye v. the Corporation of Gloucester (14 Beav. 173; 21 L. J. Ch. 81). But the House of Lords laid down, on appeal, the new doctrine that a bequest of money for building purposes was good if accompanied by a direction that none of it should be laid out in the purchase of land.—Trye v. the Corporation of Gloucester (ubi supra) would have been appealed upon this expression of opinion, but that the estate in that suit had been already distributed. But a direction that all the money be laid out in building is equivalent to one that none be laid out in buying land, and equally satisfies the condition laid down by the House of Lords; and it is a fair and probable construction of the present words to read them as meaning " to be expended for building purposes, and not otherwise." But if there are two ways of construing the words, one of which makes the gift good and the other makes it bad, the Court will uphold the gift—Sorresby v. Hollins (9 Mod. 221); The University of London v. Yarrow (23 Beav. 159; 1 De Gex & J. 72; 26 L. J. Ch. 70, 430); Edwards v. Hall (11 Hare, 1; 22 L. J. Ch. 1078; 6 De Gex, M. & G. 74; 25 L. J. Ch. 82). There being already land on which the old chapel was built, the gift would be good for building a new chapel on that site; or, the trustees might sell the old site and buy a new one with the proceeds, and the gift would still be good for building on that—Carter v. Green (ubi supra).

Digitized by Google

Mr. Cole and Mr. L. Bird, for the next-of-kin.—The gift is bad. It was not till long after the testator's death that it was decided to buy a new site. They cited—Giblett v. Hobson (3 Myl. & K. 517); Mather v. Scott (2 Keen, 172; 6 L. J. Ch. 300); The Attorney General v. Hull (9 Hare, 647).

Mr. Glasse, in reply, referred to Tatham v. Drummond (10 Jur. N.S. 557; 33 L. J. Ch. 438); Hartshorn v. Nicholson (26 Beav. 58; 27 L. J. Ch. 810).

Mr. Badnall, for the trustees of the will.

MALINS, V.C. said it was established that a mere naked bequest to build for charitable purposes necessarily carried with it a direction to purchase land, and was therefore void under the Statutes of Mortmain; and this had never, until recently, been called in question. Lord Eldon's words in The Attorney General v. Davies (9 Ves. 635), had been cited over and over again: "It is now clearly established that unless the testator distinctly points to some land already in mortmain the Court will understand him to mean that an interest in land is to be purchased, and the gift is not good." This was followed in Pritchard v. Arbouin (3 Russ. 456), and again in Giblett v. Hobson, which was a strong case. There the words were "5,000*l.* towards building almshouses for the said institution." The bequest was held void by Shadwell, V.C. (5 Sim. 651), and his decision was confirmed by Lord Brougham, who said (3 Myl. & K. 530), "The onus of shewing that the intention of the testator was restrained within lawful limits is upon the party seeking to take the bequest out of the statute; and in one way or another, but especially where it is to be by matter dehors, that is, by considering to what circumstances the instrument was applied, the intention must appear absolutely certain and clear to exclude the employment of the fund in purchasing land, and must not be a matter of speculation or conjecture." That was to say, if the will did not forbid the employment of the money in the purchase of land, the bequest was void. The doctrine was again so stated in Mather v. Scott (2 Keen, 172; 6 L. J. Ch. 300). He was surprised then to hear that the House of Lords had set aside all these decisions in their judgment in Philpott v. St. George's Hospital. In that case Lord Cranworth reviewed all the previous authorities, including Pritchard v. Arbouin, Giblett v. Hodson and Mather v. Scott, with approbation, and the doctrines therein laid down were confirmed. Lord Wensleydale's judgment was to the same effect. The same principles were asserted, by Lord Westbury, in Tatham v. Drummond, and by the present Lord Chancellor when Vice Chancellor, in Dunn v. Barnas (1 Kay & J. 596). The principle therefore was undoubted; and the only question in Philpott v. St. George's Hospital was whether Lord Beauchamp's bequest, although it expressly forbade the purchase of land, could be construed as having a tendency to bring land into mortmain. The Master of the Rolls held it could, and the House of Lords reversed the decision. If, in the present case, the testator had similarly forbidden the purchase of land, it would have fallen within that principle. But it was necessary that he should do so expressly, and that parties should be able to decide on the face of the will whether the bequest was good or not. As the testator had not done so, the bequest must be held to be void; and he should not have called on counsel to oppose it but for the case of Booth v. Carter. He could not distinguish that case from the present. There the words were "to be applied towards the erection of a new chapel," which were identical with those of this will. But with all respect to the Master of the Rolls, he could not follow him in his decision, which was opposed to all authority and principle, and calculated to introduce much embarrassment. His Lordship admitted that his judgment went beyond the cases cited, and seemed to have allowed his opinion to be influenced by circumstances outside the will. This was exactly what Sir L. Shadwell and Lord Cranworth had refused to do; and he (Vice Chancellor Malins) must follow their example. He should adhere to the rule that a bequest for the purpose of building involved the acquisition of land whereon to build, unless the contrary was expressly stated, and was therefore void. The fund must go to the next-of-kin, after providing for the costs of all parties to the petition.

COMPANY.—Where a person's name has been improperly placed upon the list of contributories, his right to have it removed is not affected by the fact that there is no person in existence who ought to be put upon the list in his stead.

The question on this appeal was, whether Dr. Fyfe's name ought not to be removed from the list of contributories upon which it had been placed by the official liquidator.

It appeared that Dr. Fyfe's name was upon the register of shareholders at the time the company was ordered to be wound up, and therefore his name was included in the list of contributories. He, however, established a case similar to Nation's case (36 L. J. Ch. 112) and Shipman's case (37 L. J. Ch. 193; L. R. 5 Eq. 219), by which, as his Lordship held, one Strawbridge ought long previously to have been registered as the holder of the shares in question. The facts of this contention do not call for a report. A difficulty, however, was suggested by the official liquidator arising from the fact that Strawbridge was dead, and had no legal personal representative, and therefore there was no person to substitute for Dr. Fyfe.

Mr. Jackson, for Dr. Fyfe.

Mr. Locock Webb, for the official liquidator, contended that, under the above circumstances, Dr. Fyfe's name must remain on the list. There had been no case where a name has been taken off without putting another on. He referred to The Mexican and South American Company; Shewell's case (37 L. J. Ch. 353; L. R. 2 Ch. 387); Shipman's case (37 L. J. Ch. 193; L. R. 5 Eq. 219).

GIFFARD, L.J., after dealing with the other part of the case, said—There was only one other point raised. It was said that Dr. Fyfe's name could not now be removed, because, as Strawbridge is dead, without any legal personal representative, there is no one whose name can be substituted for his. But, as I am of opinion that his name ought not to have been on the list, I must now remove it.

Will—Power of Mortgage—Power of Sale.

POWERS.—A power of sale is incident to a mortgage; therefore, where trustees are directed to raise money by mortgage they are justified in inserting a power of sale. The Court will, however, see that the exercise of it is properly guarded.

Testator was, at the date of his will, seised of an estate called Manor Farm, and had also contracted to purchase a second, the Goodeve estate. In July, 1868, he made his will, directing that his personalty be exonerated from the payment of the purchase-money for the Goodeve estate, and that the same should be raised by mortgage of both the aforesaid estates; and, subject to such mortgage, he created a term of 1,000 years in his said real estate for the purposes therein declared, with ultimate devises for life and in fee. In the September following, testator being desirous of completing the purchase of the Goodeve estate, entered into an agreement to borrow 10,000*l.* for that purpose upon a mortgage of that estate and of the Manor Farm estate, and some steps were taken towards the completion of the mortgage; but eventually he borrowed the required sum from his bankers upon the security of a deposit of the title-deeds of the Manor Farm estate. The conveyance of the Goodeve estate was executed on the 20th of November, 1869, and on the 23rd the testator died. The trustees of his will, being advised that they were still bound to carry out the direction contained therein and to exonerate the testator's personalty from the payment of the purchase-money of the Goodeve estate, proceeded to carry out the original agreement for a mortgage which had been entered into and partially carried out by the testator; but the proposed mortgagees, requiring the insertion of a power of sale, raised the question whether by the direction to mortgage the trustees were authorized to give a power of sale.

This was a petition, by the trustees, under Lord St. Leonards' Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35. s. 30.) for the opinion of the Court on the above question.

Mr. Wingfield submitted the questions to the Court. He cited—Cook v. Dawson (29 Beav. 123; 30 L. J. Ch. 359; 3 De Gex, F. & J. 127); Bridges v. Longman (24 Beav. 27). The case of Clarke v. the Royal Panopticon (4 Drew. 26; 26 L. J. Ch. 830; 27 L. J. Ch. 207), in which Kindersley, V.C. held that express power must be given to enable trustees to insert a power of sale in a mortgage, was decided before Lord Cranworth's Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 145).

Mr. W. W. Streeten, for the respondents.

MALINS, V.C. said he agreed entirely with the opinions expressed by the Master of the Rolls in the cases cited. Common sense required that a mortgage should contain a power of sale. Mortgagees would not advance their money without it; and he had never seen a mortgage in which it was omitted. The power of sale must, however, be properly guarded by a proviso that it should not operate until default had been made in the payment of principal or interest for six months after notice given.

In re PICKERING.

Debtor and Creditor—Composition Deed—Schedule of Debts—Unpaid Shares in a Company—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 192.

BANKRUPTCY.—The schedule of debts in a trust deed executed by a debtor under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, must include not only the amount of unpaid calls already made, but also a fair estimate of future calls upon shares in a company held by the debtor, if the company is being wound up.

Secus if the company is not being wound up.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Commissioner Winslow, allowing Mr. Laffitte, a creditor of Mr. Pickering, to issue execution upon a judgment recovered against him, notwithstanding the registration of a deed under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. The question argued was as to the validity of the deed, which had been impugned before his Honour upon the ground that the schedule of debts was inaccurate, and that if it had been properly made out there would not have been the requisite majority of assenting creditors.

The facts were as follows:

Mr. Pickering had been a director of the International Contract Company, which at the date of the deed was in liquidation. The number of shares for which he was placed upon the list of contributories was 6,645 shares, of 50*l.* each, upon which 10*l.* had been paid. At the date of the deed a call of 5*l.* had been made, leaving 35*l.* per share then uncalled. Mr. Pickering had entered in his deed as a debt the sum of 50,725*l.* in respect of the call of 5*l.* per share upon 10,145 shares, placing a memorandum against them that the debt was disputed.

No mention was made of the uncalled part of the capital. In his examination, when asked what were his grounds for disputing the debt, he replied that he did not think that he was liable upon so many shares, the fact being, as above mentioned, that he was only on the list of contributories for a less number.

Upon the motion being made before the Commissioner, Mr. Pickering put in some evidence that he had a right of set-off against the company in respect of some large claims against the company. The nature of these claims however did not appear. It appeared that the company would require all their capital to pay their debts; and, in fact, calls to the full amount of the shares had been made since the date of the deed. The liquidator was not an assenting creditor, and if the whole 40*l.* per share were to be considered a debt for the purpose of ascertaining the majority of assenting creditors there would not have been the requisite majority to support the deed. Under these circumstances the Commissioner held the deed to be bad. There were some other points raised in the case, which, however, in the view taken by the Court upon the principal question, became immaterial.

Mr. A. E. Miller (Mr. Roxburgh with him), for the appellant.—First, the debtor was not bound to insert in his deed as a debt anything in respect of the shares, except the call that had been made. For if it were otherwise, what a difficulty there would be in every case where a debtor possesses shares not fully paid up! He never would be able to register a deed if the company should not assent, for there would almost always be an overwhelming amount in respect of the uncalled capital. Until the call is made there is, in fact, no debt—The Companies' Act, 1862, ss. 38, 75. How can any debtor judge what calls are likely to be made? Suppose that no calls be made, is a company which is not and never will be a creditor to have an almost absolute power of controlling the rights of other creditors?

[Wood, L.J.—When the company is a going concern, not in course of winding-up, there is no debt provable in respect of unpaid capital, and the bankrupt is not discharged from his liability—Martin's Patent Anchor Company v. Morton.[1] But is not the case quite different when the company is being wound up?]

I submit not. Until the call is made nothing can be proved. Next, Mr. Pickering had a complete set-off against all calls. His claims against the company exceed not only the amount of the calls made since the date of the deed, but even the 5*l.* calls which he had inserted in the deed. Therefore the company could not really exercise any power of assenting to or dissenting from the deed; consequently the deed is good—In re Duckworth (36 L. J. Bk. 28; L. R. 2 Ch. 578).

Mr. De Gex and Mr. Reed, for the respondent, Mr. Lafitte, the judgment creditor.—Under a bankruptcy a liquidator can prove for an estimated amount of future calls—Companies' Act, 1862, s. 75; therefore an estimated amount of future calls ought to be included in the schedule of debts, which ought to contain every debt that would be provable in bankruptcy. Lord Kingdown's exposition of the law in Williams v. Harding (35 L. J. Bk. 25; L. R. 1 E. & I. Ap. 9), clearly shews that these calls constituted a debt before the date of the deed.

(1) 37 L. J. Q.B. 98; L. R. 3 Q.B. 306: see also General Discount Company v. Stokes (17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 765; 34 L. J. C.P. 25); Ex parte Hastie (38 L. J. Ch. 43).

Digitized by Google

Next, as to the alleged set-off, there is not the slightest evidence of its existence such as the Court can notice. It is clearly a mere claim, the validity of which is disputed and more than doubtful; therefore the debt upon the calls ought to taken into account for the purpose of calculating the number of assenting creditors without any reference to this set-off—Ex parte Middleton (33 L. J. Bk. 36). It is necessary to apply for leave to issue execution, even though we dispute the validity of the deed—Lloyd v. Harrison (35 L. J. Q.B. 153; L. R. 1 Q.B. 502); Ames v. Colnaghi (37 L. J. C.P. 159; L. R. 3 C.P. 359). They also referred to Ex parte Morrison; In re Clun (33 L. J. Bk. 47), in support of their contention.

Mr. Roxburgh, in reply, was stopped by the Court.

WOOD, L.J.—It appears to us that this debtor has not complied with the requisitions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. Under section 192. of that act he is bound to make out a list of creditors and a statement of his liabilities, and dissentient creditors are only bound if the statement is accurate. It is on oath, and is taken to be prima facie true. It ought to contain such debts as would be provable in bankruptcy. Now, if the matter were in bankruptcy, what would be the result in the circumstances of this case? We find that in the first part of the 75th section of the Companies' Act, 1862, there is, as Lord Kingsdown has remarked, a plain statutory declaration that a person executing a company's deed of settlement becomes a debtor liable to pay all calls afterwards made, although, of course, not payable until they are made. The section then in the second part provides for the estimation of future calls. Therefore we have a debt when the deed of settlement is executed, but so long as the company is a going concern it is not a debt that can be estimated; but when the company is being wound up the state of things in this respect entirely changes, because then, by positive enactment, it is necessary to estimate the liability; the debt must in fact be ascertained as best it can be. The debtor, then, when executing the deed under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, knows that these calls constitute a debt capable of estimation, a mode of estimating which, in point of fact, is provided, for the liquidator can do it. He must then state his indebtedness in respect of all future calls, from which, it is to be observed, since they can be proved, he obtains a release. This settles the present case, for there does not appear to have been any doubt as to the amount of the calls, and the required estimate involved no difficulty whatever, because the whole amount unpaid was required. The only answer that he gives, which remains to be disposed of, is this alleged set-off. He says that in reality the company owes a larger amount than the calls. But this seems something very shadowy as opposed to the clear and undoubted debt for calls. In order to take advantage of such a claim he must make a full disclosure of its nature. There were some other points raised in the argument which I think it unnecessary to decide.

SELWYN, L.J.—Considering the effect which a trust deed has upon the right of dissentient creditors, it is incumbent upon the debtor to make a strictly accurate statement of all matters properly included. Here the debtor being a director must have had a considerable knowledge of the affairs of this company. He does not allege that there was any change after he ceased to be director, and it was morally certain that the whole nominal amount of the shares would be required for payment of debts. Therefore, according to law, and regard being particularly had to section 75. of the act, he is bound to include this amount among his debts. His answer is, that he has complied with all the requisitions of the Bankruptcy Act by making the statement before us without any reference to future calls. And he says, that even if the future calls ought to have been included, still the debt which he owes would not nearly amount to what he has inserted because of his counter-claims. But in view of the facts of the case, I think, this statement is altogether inaccurate. The insufficiency in respect of the future calls is by no means cured by his affidavit as to counter-claims, and I think, therefore, the order of the Commissioner was right, and this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Debtor and Creditor—Composition Deed—Assent of Majority of Creditors.

BANKRUPTCY.—Where, under a deed of arrangement, it appears that the debtor retains for his own benefit part of his property, the Court will, on behalf of the dissenting minority, closely inquire into the bona fides of the bargain made with him by the majority of his creditors.

An officer in the army, being indebted in an amount which would have been covered by the price of his commission, if sold, retired on half-pay, thereby receiving about half the value of his commission, and executed a composition deed to pay 10s. in the pound, which was assented to by the statutable majority of his creditors. No meeting of creditors took place:—Held, that the deed was not binding upon the dissenting minority.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Commissioner Holroyd, refusing to release the appellant from custody.

In July, 1867, the appellant, Major Deacon, was a major in the army on full pay. Being then indebted to his sister and another relative, Colonel Yonge, in considerable amounts, he executed a deed by which he assigned to them all moneys which should come to the hands of his army-agents, Messrs. Cox & Co., by virtue of any exchange or sale of his commission. A memorandum was indorsed on the deed, by which he agreed either to sell the commission, or retire on half-pay, and in the latter case the sum to be received on retirement was to be paid to his sister and Colonel Yonge, in satisfaction of their debt.

After the agreement was entered into nothing was done as to selling the commission for some time. Much correspondence between the parties took place, in which Major Deacon promised to give immediate information to Colonel Yonge of the sale of the commission. In September, 1868, he sent in his paper for retirement. He was then arrested at the suit of Colonel Yonge, who held a judgment for his debt.

On the 2nd of November, 1868, he executed a deed of arrangement, whereby he covenanted to pay his creditors 10*s.* in the pound. This was assented to by his sister and the requisite majority of his creditors, but not by Colonel Yonge. No meeting of creditors took place.

His debts amounted to rather less than 3,200*l.*, and the sum which he received on retirement was 1,650*l.* He had no other assets but his half-pay, which was 150*l.* a year. The commission, if sold, would, it appeared, have realized more than 3,200*l.* Under these circumstances, the Commissioner made the order now appealed from, when the debtor applied to be released from custody.

Sargood, Serjeant, and Mr. Reed, for the appellant.—The Commissioner thought that In re Cowen (36 L. J. Bk. 41; L. R. 2 Ch. 563) applied to this case; but we submit that it has no application, for there is no evidence whatever that the creditors acted from motives other than such as prudent people might approve of. The debtor could not be required to sell his commission. If he had been made bankrupt, the creditors at the utmost would have obtained a portion of his pay under section 134. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. Why, then, should not they with prudence and wisdom accept a reasonable composition payable immediately? As to the half-pay, that is not an asset which can belong to the creditors. It is pay for services which the retired officer may be called upon to render at any moment.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. W. R. Cole appeared for Colonel Yonge, but were not called upon.

WOOD, L.J.—If we examine the case of In re Cowen we find this, that where a man has placed himself in such a position that one creditor may, under a judgment, carry off all his assets, and he then takes steps to secure an equal distribution among all his creditors by deed of arrangement, the Court will not be hasty to say that he is guilty of fraud, whatever may be the mode in which he does this, because by this means he acts fairly by all his creditors instead of allowing one creditor to sweep away all. But he must make a distribution of all his property, and that rateably, amongst his creditors; and if the Court finds that he is not parting with all, but is reserving a fund for his own use, then the question whether the assent which may appear to have been given to his scheme of arrangement was an assent within the meaning of the act, is a question into which the Court will inquire closely. The Court will, in order to protect the minority, inquire whether the majority, whose opinion is to bind the minority, have arrived at their opinion by a consideration of their own pecuniary interests, or whether the assent has been given from some other motive, such as a desire to protect the debtor. In In re Cowen the Court found that the creditors had taken no steps to ascertain what was the amount of the property, or what the debtor was giving up. No meeting had been held by them, and in fact the debtor was retaining a portion of his property. In such a state of circumstances the Court concluded that the assent could not have been given bona fide. In the present case this gentleman, having a commission in the army, in July, 1867, arranged with some relatives who were creditors that he would raise by sale or exchange of his commission a sum of money to pay his debts, and that all moneys so to arise should pass through Messrs. Cox & Co.'s hands. A memorandum indorsed upon the deed making this arrangement states that it was contemplated that he should retire upon half-pay, although that was not mentioned in the deed, and that the sum to be paid on his so retiring should be paid over under the deed. He retired accordingly, and if the sum paid on his retirement had been the whole of his property there would have been nothing to throw suspicion on the arrangement afterwards made, that this sum should be given up to the general creditors. In re Cowen would have had no application. But, in fact, he has at the time of making the arrangement, and retains at the present moment, that which constitutes half his property. He retains in the form of half-pay that which, if it had been realized by selling the commission instead of retiring, would have enabled him to pay his creditors in full. He does not sacrifice all his property so as to pay in full. Instead of that, he adopts a course which the Court cannot sanction; and looking at the conduct of his assenting creditors, seeing that they have taken no pains to secure the unappropriated fund, there is nothing to shew that they considered whether the composition which they agreed to accept was reasonable or not. The necessary inference seems to be that they were influenced by other considerations than their own interest in being content to accept a composition not extending to the whole property.

I agree, therefore, with the Commissioner in this case, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

SELWYN, L.J., concurred.

In the meanwhile, and during the lifetime of the tenant for life, the executors invested part of the funds upon a security which would be an improper one for investment by trustees, and which afterwards proved deficient. The security was appropriated to the purposes of the trusts of the eighth codicil. It did not appear whether the tenant for life consented to the investment, but she received the interest during her life, and did not in fact suffer from the insufficiency of the security:—Held, that a proof against the estate of one of the trustees who had become bankrupt for the deficiency was good.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Commissioner Holroyd, refusing a proof for a debt of 1,819*l.* 15*s.*, claimed against the separate estate of A. W. Biddulph, as the balance of a sum of 3,000*l.* after realizing a security for the same.

The circumstances were as follows:

By her will and the first seven codicils thereto, made in the year 1824, the Countess de Front gave the residue of her estate to her executors, W. V. Fry, A. Wright Biddulph and J. Wright, upon trust for her sister S. Neve for life, and subject thereto for themselves absolutely.

It appeared that the testatrix was an ardent Roman Catholic, and that it was privately understood by the executors that they were to devote the residue bequeathed to them to Roman Catholic purposes. But no trust was ever formally constituted for that purpose.

By an eighth codicil to the will, dated the 20th of April, 1824, the testatrix declared that she had bequeathed the residue of her personal estate to her executors in trust only, and directed them, after payment thereout of certain sums therein referred to, to pay one moiety to the Catholic bishop for the time being of the London district, the vicar-general of the same district, the president of St. Edmund's College, and to John Gage, and the other moiety to the Catholic bishop of the midland district, the vicar-general of the same district, the president of St. Mary's College, Oscot, and John Gage.

The testatrix died on the 7th of January, 1830.

The will and the first seven codicils were proved by the executors in the following month. The existence of the eighth codicil was not communicated to the executors, and was only brought to light in the year 1841, having been in the possession of Mr. Gage.

The two executors, Mr. Biddulph and Mr. Wright, were partners in a banking business, carried on by them with a Mr. Jerningham, under the firm of Wright, Biddulph & Co. With this firm the executors had a banking account, bearing their title as executors and trustees of the Countess de Front's will.

The banking firm, in the year 1834, made large advances to Sir G. Duckett, to the extent of 15,000*l.*, upon the security of a third mortgage of a canal, dated the 8th of May, 1834, made in favour of Wright and Jerningham. Part of the money so advanced was considered to belong to the countess's estate; and by a deed-poll, dated the 31st of May, 1836, executed by Wright and Jerningham, after reciting that the moneys advanced upon the mortgage were not the moneys of Wright and Jerningham, but belonged to the persons and in the proportions therein mentioned, it was declared that they (Wright and Jerningham) held the said mortgage in trust, as to 3,000*l.*, part of the money thereby secured, upon trust for A. W. Biddulph, J. Wright and Dr. Fryer, as trustees of the will of the Countess de Front, and in priority over the residue of the 15,000*l.* as therein mentioned.

The firm of Wright, Biddulph & Co. became bankrupt on the 17th of December, 1840.

Dr. Fryer proved against the estate for the money standing to the trustees' account beyond the 3,000*l.*, but did not then prove for that sum.

The eighth codicil was proved on the 1st of October, 1841. The exact period when it first became known to the executors did not appear, Mr. Biddulph in his affidavit only declaring that it had come to his knowledge since the will had been proved.

The tenant for life, S. Neve, died on the 22nd of September, 1842.

When the security was realized there was a deficiency of the sum now sought to be proved.

In the year 1858 a proof was tendered for this amount against the separate estate of Jerningham, but it was rejected on the ground that he was not a trustee and had not such knowledge of the trust as could render him liable for a breach of trust, the investment having been made with the sanction of those who had legal control over the money, and were moreover, according to the then known state of the trust, absolute owners of the money, subject only to the life interest of S. Neve.

The claim was now made by the present legal personal representative of the countess against the separate estate of A. W. Biddulph; but the Commissioner, thinking it was governed by the former case against Jerningham's estate, refused the proof.

The case alluded to is reported sub nom. Ex parte Barnewell; In re Biddulph (6 De Gex, M. & G. 801).

Mr. De Gex and Mr. Ramadge, for the appellants.—This case is in no way governed by Jerningham's case, for Jerningham was not a trustee, and never committed any breach of trust. Here Mr. Biddulph was clearly a trustee. There is no evidence that the tenant for life consented to the investment. It is true that the trustees seemed to be absolute owners (subject to the life interest), but it is certain that they did not consider that in honour they could appropriate the money, and, in fact, they were mere trustees. They had never done anything to appropriate the fund or divide it. It is admitted that the investment was such that it constituted a breach of trust if the executors were to be considered as trustees. It cannot be disputed that when distribution has taken place under a mistake, you may follow the assets into the hands of those who have received them and require them to refund. This alone, in every event, would enable us to support this proof as to one-third—Anon. (1 P. Wms. 495); Edwards v. Freeman (2 P. Wms. 435). A distinction is taken: when the distribution is made under decree of Court the claim against individual beneficiaries for refunding is only pro rata; but when it is made out of Court you may require any legatee to refund the whole of his legacy; but the right to refund is clear—Todd v. Studholme (3 Kay & J. 324; 26 L. J. Ch. 271). We had a perfect right to appropriate the security, realize it, and then prove for the difference; and since this was a breach of trust, although made under peculiar circumstances, in consequence of the executors' ignorance of the nature of their trust, we are entitled to take this course—Mant v. Leith (5 Beav. 524; 21 L. J. Ch. 719). Whichever way, therefore, you look at the case, whether the proof be grounded on breach of trust, or upon the right of requiring legatees to refund, it is well founded.

Mr. Amphlett and Mr. Elderton, for the assignees.—We say there was no breach of trust, for at the date of the investment the executors were absolute owners, according to all appearances. The question as to the consent of the tenant for life is immaterial, because she was not damnified; she received the interest and made no complaint. There is no evidence that she did not consent. The security was taken, and that is all that the claimant could properly ask for. As, in fact, the executors derived no benefit from the property, why should their estates be liable? They considered they had a perfect right to lend the money as they did, and although it may be that in honour they considered themselves bound to apply the interest for Catholic purposes, that is quite beside any question which this Court will consider. Next, we say this is an improper way of proceeding; there ought to have been a bill filed against the representatives of all three executors. Dr. Fryer is dead, but he died solvent, and his representatives ought to be made parties, so as to contribute.

The COURT did not require a reply.

SELWYN, L.J., after stating the nature of the question and facts, observed, that it was admitted that the investment was not authorized by the trusts of the particular will, or by the general rules of this Court, and under ordinary circumstances would constitute a breach of trust. He proceeded as follows: The first question, therefore, that appears to be material is in what manner, in point of fact, the executors dealt with this trust fund. No doubt, if it could be shewn that they, with the consent of all the persons interested, had in fact divided the trust fund under some mistaken notion of their rights, if it had been separated and dealt with otherwise than as a trust fund, and divided amongst different individuals, then different considerations entirely would arise. But, in the present case, it appears that throughout the whole of these transactions down to the time of the bankruptcy there had always been joint possession of this fund, and it always had been dealt with as a trust fund, as in point of fact it was. Now, the money having been advanced, as I have stated, on that security on the 8th of May, 1834, it appears that a deed-poll was executed on the 31st of May, 1836, declaring the ownership of the different sums of money which were included in the mortgage made in 1834; and the recital in that deed-poll, as far as is material for the present purpose, states: "That whereas the said sum of 15,000*l.*, which in and by the said recited indenture is stated to be due to the said John Wright and Edmund William Jerningham, was not, in fact, their own proper moneys, but the same was the proper moneys of and belonged to the following persons, in the proportions, and was advanced by them according to the priorities hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, the sum of 3,000*l.*, part thereof, belonged to and was the proper money of Anthony George Wright Biddulph, the said John Wright and the Rev. Dr. Fryer, as trustees under the will of the late Countess de Front, deceased; the sum of 5,000*l.*, other part of the said sum of 15,000*l.*, was the proper money of and belonged to Peter Campbell," and so forth. Therefore, there is there an express declaration by way of recital that the sum of 3,000*l.* belonged to and was the proper money of these gentlemen as trustees under the will of the late Countess de Front, and in the operative part of the same instrument there is a declaration of trust exactly in accordance with the recital, in these words: "And as to, for and concerning the sum of 3,000*l.*, part of the said sum of 15,000*l.*, and the interest thereof, in trust for the said Anthony George Wright Biddulph, John Wright and the Rev. Dr. Fryer, as trustees under the said will of the said Countess de Front." It appears, therefore, that so late as the month of May, 1836, these persons were dealing with this fund as being a trust fund, declaring by this instrument which was executed by them that it was a trust fund, and held by them upon the trusts of the said Countess de Front's will. I think therefore that as it appears nothing was done from that time down to the bankruptcy with the trust fund, it becomes immaterial to consider precisely whether they or any of them had or had not notice at that time of the eighth codicil, because, it being a trust fund, and it being admitted by them to be such, and it being dealt with by them as such, the burden is cast on them of shewing—when they committed what they are obliged now to admit was in substance and effect a breach of trust under ordinary circumstances—I say the burden is cast upon them of shewing that they had the consent of all persons whose consent was necessary to legalize that which without such consent would have been a breach of trust. It is their misfortune that they had not obtained that consent, because it now appears that the persons who were entitled to stand in the position of cestuis que trust, either primarily or ultimately in respect of that trust fund, were the persons interested in the remainder of the estate of the Countess de Front, after the termination of the life of the tenant for life. It appears that the tenant for life lived until 1842, that is, until after the bankruptcy, and therefore the trust was obviously subsisting down to that time. Under those circumstances, the present appellants come here asking for leave to prove in respect of this trust fund, saying that the investment was an improper one, but that under ordinary circumstances they are entitled to follow the trust money into the investments if they can trace it, and having received as much as can be realized from the proceeds of the sale of that improper investment to prove against the estate of the trustee for the difference. I think that is what they are entitled to at the present time. I think the respondents have failed to prove that which was necessary to establish their contention, namely, that that which would under ordinary circumstances have been a breach of trust was sanctioned and authorized by persons capable of giving such sanction and authority. It follows therefore that the proof ought to have been allowed. It is then said that even if a prima facie case had been established, considering the lapse of time and the great complication of circumstances, a bill ought to have been ordered to have been filed, and that this proof ought not to have been allowed in the meantime; but inasmuch as these facts were within the cognizance of Mr. Biddulph, and inasmuch as there has been no difficulty in ascertaining or proving any part of the facts of this case, inasmuch as there has been a full opportunity given to the parties to bring forward any evidence they might think fit, I think it would be incurring unnecessary expense if we were now to say that this proof should be postponed until after a bill is filed. I think a case has been established for allowing the proof, and that consequently the order of the Commissioner must be reversed. The proof will be allowed, but there will be no costs of the appeal. The deposit will be returned.

GIFFARD, L.J.—I am of opinion that the proof should be allowed against Mr. Biddulph's separate estate. The original transaction was simply a loan, and there was security taken for it which was worthless, or nearly worthless. Of course such a transaction as that by trustees would be in an ordinary case a breach of trust, and would in an ordinary case create a joint and several liability. I do not think it a less breach of trust because it has happened that the persons entitled under the trusts were not known. It may be that under certain circumstances the ignorance of those facts may excuse that which in itself is a breach of trust, as for instance, if there had been on the face of this seventh codicil some third party entitled and the money paid over to the third party in ignorance of the existence of the eighth codicil. But in this case these parties had done nothing of the sort; and not only that, but it cannot be said that they ever acted at any time in the belief that this money was their own or proceeded upon that footing. That being so, first of all there was a breach of trust, and secondly there was no excuse for it. Under these circumstances therefore I think there is a clear case for proof against the separate estate, and I see no reason why it should stand over for a bill to be filed.

mortgage by deposit of the lease of the mill:—Held, also, that other rollers which had been purchased with the view of using them in the machine, but had not been fitted to the machine, were not part of the machine, and did not pass to the mortgagees.

Weighing-machines which rest in brick cavities constructed in the ground for the purpose, but which are not attached to the brickwork, and can be lifted out of the cavity at pleasure, are not fixtures.

Straightening-plates, formed of flat plates of iron and let into the iron flooring of a room so as to be on a level with the surrounding floor and united to it, are fixtures.

Fixtures belonging to a lessee and removable by him at pleasure (as between himself and the lessor) form part of the security under an equitable mortgage by deposit of the lease.

These were appeals from an order of Mr. Registrar Tudor, acting for the Commissioner of the Birmingham Court of Bankruptcy, made on a special case.

In June, 1867, Messrs. J. Richards & Co. (of which firm the bankrupts were partners) made an equitable mortgage of their mills to Lloyds Banking Company by deposit of their lease (accompanied by a memorandum in writing), for the purpose of securing any advances which the bank might make to them.

The memorandum was as follows:

"Memorandum.—We, the undersigned Job Richards, L. Jenkins, Richard Hill and Thomas Jenkins, trading together as ironmasters at Smethwick, in the county of Stafford, under the style and firm of Job Richards & Co., have this day deposited with Lloyds Banking Company (Limited), the deed mentioned in the schedule hereunder written, to be retained by the company by way of a continuing security to them for payment on demand of all moneys and liabilities already paid or incurred, or which the company may at any time advance, pay, or incur to or for the said firm of Job Richards & Co., whether on current account or by the discount of, or otherwise in respect of bills of exchange, promissory notes, or other negotiable securities drawn, accepted, or indorsed by the said firm, together with interest, commission, banking charges, law and other costs, charges and expenses; and for a more effectual security we undertake, at our own expense, when required by the company, that we and all other necessary parties will execute to the said company, or as they shall direct, a mortgage of all our estate and interest in the said deed, which mortgage shall contain a power of sale and all usual clauses."

The bankrupts afterwards, in 1867, succeeded to all the assets and liabilities of the firm of J. Richards & Co., the Messrs. Jenkins then retiring.

In January, 1868, the bankrupts executed a legal mortgage of the mills to the bank; and in this mortgage was included a number of articles belonging to the mill and machinery described as rollers of various kinds, also four weighing-machines and four straightening-plates. These rollers, &c., were part of the plant necessary for the bankrupts' business.

At that time the account with the bank had been overdrawn to the extent of nearly 11,000*l*. On the 18th of January the bank took possession of the mortgaged premises, and soon afterwards the petition was presented upon which an adjudication in bankruptcy was made against Messrs. Richards. M. Astbury and two other gentlemen were appointed creditors' assignees.

It was admitted that the mortgage, having been made on the eve of bankruptcy, could not be supported as against the assignees, except so far as it gave effect to the previous equitable mortgage by deposit of the lease.

The question was whether the mortgagees had any claim to the rollers and other chattels. They contended that everything forming part of the machinery or in any way belonging to it passed to them by virtue of their equitable mortgage as being fixtures.

Digitized by Google

The facts as to the nature of the chattels were proved to be as follows:

The rollers were loose iron rollers fitting into the rolling-machine. When the machines were made they were usually fitted with one set of rollers, and others were ordered and supplied as occasion required, the rollers being required to be of different sizes according to the character of the iron being manufactured. After the rollers had been made by the manufacturer they required to be fitted to the machine by filing their ends; and they were, when so fitted to their bearings, grooved in a manner varying according to the work each set was intended to perform. At the date of the equitable mortgage there were several of these duplicate rollers which had been either in use or fitted to the machine ready for use, besides others which had not been so fitted.

The weighing-machines in question were placed in square holes dug in the ground and faced with brickwork. The machines rested upon the brickwork in the holes, their upper surfaces being on the level of the ground. They were not fastened to the brickwork, and could be removed without injury to it, and it was said that similar machines were often placed upon wheels.

The straightening-plates in question were broad plates of iron used for straightening bars of iron whilst red hot. They were laid upon brickwork and embedded in the earth; their upper surfaces being even with the surrounding floor, which was also composed of iron.

The Registrar held that all the rollers passed to the mortgagees as part of the mill, but that neither the straightening-plates nor the weighing-machines passed.

Both parties appealed. The assignees admitted however that one set of rollers passed with the machine.

The appeals were argued separately.

Mr. Jessel, Mr. Little and Mr. A. Smith, for the assignees, the appellants in the first appeal.—The duplicate rollers were mere personal chattels, unconnected with the freehold, and could not therefore pass as fixtures. It might easily be that a hundred sets were in stock ready for use as occasion might require; can all these pass as fixtures? In calico-printing establishments the copper rollers on which the designs are engraved are the most valuable part of the plant; can it be pretended that they would pass as fixtures in any case? The case as to the rollers which have never been used or fitted to the machine, is, at all events, clearly in our favour. These can in no sense at all be considered as belonging to the machine, or forming part of it.

Mr. Fry and Mr. Finlay Knight, for the mortgagees.—These rollers are ordinary trade fixtures. They are parts of the rolling-machines, which are admittedly so. You cannot distinguish between one set of rollers and another. They are like a mill-stone, which is often removed, yet certainly constitutes part of the mill—Wystow's case (cited in 4 Man. & R. 277, 280 n); Johnston v. Dobie (Mor. 5543); Fisher v. Dixon (12 Cl. & F. 312); Mather v. Fraser (4 Kay & J. 536; 25 L. J. Ch. 361).

Mr. Jessel, in reply.—Johnston v. Dobie (ubi supra) was decided according to Scotch law: it must have been decided the other way by English law. In Wystow's case (ubi supra), the distinction is taken between one millstone and duplicates; therefore, it is in our favour.

GIFFARD, L.J.—The questions in cases of this description are generally more of fact than law, for, as I think, the law has been well settled, but the facts must differ in particular cases. As to the law it is clear, and is admitted, that where there is a mortgage of a manufactory and part of the machinery used in it is a fixture, that part passes to the mortgagee. We have, therefore, to determine what according to law are fixtures. Two dicta will be sufficient to guide us in the present case. In Mather v. Fraser it was said, and so decided, that the article in question must be an essential part of the machine. I think that was all it was necessary to decide in that case. Lord Cottenham, in Fisher v. Dixon, said that all "belonging to the machine" would pass: and

I should say in this case the proper test to lay down will be that the chattel must be something which "belongs to the machine."

Now, these machines were rolling-machines, and there appear to be connected with the machine some parts which clearly cannot be described as fixed. It is in evidence that when a machine is ordered from the manufacturer, it is sent with one set of rollers, and it is quite manifest that without rollers the machine would not do any part of the work it is intended to do. One set of rollers therefore must pass. But we have here duplicate rollers, and with reference to them—I am not now speaking of rollers which can be in any sense considered as unfinished, but of duplicate rollers which have been actually fitted to the machine—I cannot see why if one set of rollers passes, the duplicate should not also. It comes in fact to this, that the machine with one set of rollers is a complete machine, but a machine with a duplicate set is a still more perfect machine. I think, therefore, that each set of rollers necessarily belongs to the machine as part of it. I do not think that the dictum of Fitzherbert in Wystow's case affects what I have decided; but if it did, I should observe that this subject has been considered much more of late years than it was in olden times, and that the matter decided there was in regard of distress. The matter may be reduced to an absurdity by supposing a case of duplicate latch-keys to a door. Could it be held, that one only should pass and not the other? The fact is that, whether there is one set of rollers or more they are each part and parcel of the machine and come within the term "belonging to the machine as part of it." Then comes the case as to the different size of the rollers. But if the duplicates of the same size pass, it follows that the rollers of different sizes pass if they render the machine still more perfect than if all the rollers were of the same size. We come next to a different class of rollers; and here I confess I differ from the Registrar who has decided this case. I allude to those rollers which had been made for the purpose of being used in the machine, and had been purchased for that purpose, but had never been fitted to the machine, and required something more to be done to them before they were ready for use. I think if a man mortgages a machine when perfect and fitted with rollers and everything else connected with it, and afterwards purchases other rollers which cannot be used until they are fitted to the machine, it would be going a long way to say that the mortgagor should be compelled to fit those rollers to the machine, and should be precluded from saying that they form no part of it.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the duplicate rollers and the rollers of different sizes, in fact all the rollers that have been fitted to the machine belong to the machine; they are essential parts of it. But I cannot hold that the rollers which have never been fitted to the machine, and have never been used, and which in fact require something to be done to them before they can be used, belong to the machine or that they are essential parts of it. The order must be varied in this respect.

On the second appeal by the mortgagees,

Mr. Fry and Mr. Finlay Knight, for the appellants, contended that the weighing-machines were so far attached to the soil that they could not be removed without structural injury to the building; and that the straightening-plates constituted part of the structure, being in fact only a special kind of flooring.

Mr. Jessel, Mr. Little and Mr. A. Smith, for the assignees, contended that as the weighing-machines were merely laid upon brickwork, and could be removed by merely lifting them, it could not be held that they were in any way part of the building, nor would their removal injure the building. They were, therefore, not fixtures—D'Eyncourt v. Gregory (36 L. J. Ch. 107; L. R. 3 Eq. 382); The Duke of Beaufort v. Bates (3 De Gex, F. & J. 381; 31 L. J. Ch. 481); Hellawell v. Eastwood (6 Ex. 294; 20 L. J. Ch. 154). Similar reasons applied to the straightening-plates, as to which they referred to The Metropolitan Counties Society v. Brown (26 Beav. 454; 28 L. J. Ch. 581). But, in fact, these cases were not wanted, because the mortgagor is only a leaseholder, and fixtures constitute no part of his leasehold interest, which alone is mortgaged.

Mr. Fry, in reply.

GIFFARD, L.J.—Two points remain to be disposed of in this case, one as to the straightening-plates, and the other as to the weighing-machines.

I cannot agree with the suggestion of Mr. Jessel, that because the mortgagor was a leaseholder and not a freeholder, the articles which were fixtures did not pass to the mortgagee of his leasehold interest. Whether he is a freeholder or leaseholder the same rule clearly applies; and the only question is, whether these articles are fixtures or not.

As to the straightening-plates, two cases were cited in argument, The Metropolitan Counties Society v. Brown and The Duke of Beaufort v. Bates. The latter case has, I think, no application, for it was a case in which, there being chattels which, as between lessor and lessee, the lessee might remove, an execution creditor of the lessee was held entitled to take them. As regards the former case, the point decided differed entirely from the present question. There the straightening-plates were not fixed in the mode in which these straightening-plates appear, by the evidence, to be fixed. We need only read a few portions of the evidence to see that these plates are clearly fixtures, just as much, indeed, as an ordinary part of the flooring or any pavement would be; and it would certainly be astonishing if an ordinary pavement were regarded as a thing which could be removed by a mortgagor as against his mortgagee. I must assume upon the evidence (which his Lordship referred to) that the iron plates round the straightening-plates are part of the floor of the place, and that the straightening-plates also constitute part of the floor just as much as the surrounding plates. I look upon these straightening-plates as in the same position as a flagstone laid down and let in, and certainly, if anything can be a fixture, I should say a flagstone laid down and let in would be one. I think the Registrar has fallen into this mistake by laying rather too much stress upon what was said in Mather v. Fraser, as to nothing being a fixture which will stand by its own weight. No doubt a flat plate will rest by its own weight, but when you find it let in, embedded, and overlaid with part of the permanent floor, and the permanent floor cannot be removed without injury to the freehold, as is clearly the case here, I cannot entertain a doubt that the straightening-plates are fixtures.

Next, with regard to the weighing-machines. I think we have wholly different circumstances here. The evidence shews that machines of this description are frequently placed upon wheels, and so used; and it appears that when these weighing-machines are placed inside the building the floor is prepared for them, and when they are placed outside the building the soil is prepared for them; both in the same way, by making a square receptacle of brickwork, and in this the weighing-machine is placed; and it may be as easily taken out again, for no fastenings of screws or nails are used. One of the witnesses shews that there was a space all round the machine of from five-eighths to three-quarters of an inch.

Mr. Fry's argument that a brickwork was the same thing as a frame to the machine, and constitutes part and parcel of the machine, I cannot assent to. Suppose in this case a number of bricked places had been made as convenient receptacles for weights, it cannot be thought that the weights would be fixtures. So, if there had been a foundation of granite for a cannon or large telescope, neither the cannon nor telescope would be fixtures. The preparation of the soil does not make the machine a fixture, nor does the fact of its being put into a receptacle so prepared for it, make it a fixture.

As regards the straightening-plates, the decision below must be reversed; and, as regards the weighing-machine, it will be affirmed. There will be no costs of the appeal, and the deposit will be returned.

Bankruptcy—Act of Bankruptcy—Unstamped Trust Deed—Stay of Proceedings.

BANKRUPTCY.—A deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors, not registered through want of the necessary assents, may be used, even though unstamped, as evidence of an act of bankruptcy.

Where an adjudication was obtained upon the bankrupt's own petition, and on the same day, but at a later hour, another adjudication in another Court was obtained by a creditor upon an earlier act of bankruptcy, the Court stayed proceedings under the former adjudication.

On the 20th of July the bankrupt executed an ordinary deed of assignment of all his property to trustees, upon trust to pay his debts. He was unable to obtain the necessary assents of his creditors, and the deed could not, therefore, be registered under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and it remained unstamped. On the 8th of August the bankrupt obtained an adjudication of bankruptcy against him upon his own petition in the County Court of Hull.

On the same day, but at a later hour, an adjudication was made against him by the Court of Bankruptcy, at Leeds, upon the petition of a creditor. The act of bankruptcy relied on was the assignment of property by the deed above mentioned.

The petitioning creditor then applied to the County Court at Hull for an order to stay proceedings under the adjudication there obtained. This was refused, upon the ground that the deed not having been stamped could not be used for any purpose in Court. From this refusal the petitioning creditor now appealed.

Mr. De Gex, for the appellant.—There is no objection to our using the deed, though unstamped, for the purpose for which we seek to use it—Ponsford v. Walton (37 L. J. C.P. 113; L. R. 3 C.P. 167), where the Judges adopted Lord Westbury's decision in Ex parte Wensley (32 L. J. Bk. 23; 1 De Gex, J. & S. 273), overruling His Lordship's later decision to the contrary in Ex parte Potter; In re Barrow (34 L. J. Bk. 46).

Mr. Jemmett, for the official assignee in the Hull bankruptcy, contended that Lord Westbury's later decision was right. The adjudication at Leeds was open to doubt, whereas the other was free from all doubt, and was moreover prior in date. There was no good reason for disturbing it.

WOOD, L.J.—The decision of the Judges in Ponsford v. Walton seems to me to decide the point relative to the use of the deed, though unstamped, as an act of bankruptcy. I agree with the conclusion arrived at by them, and think the reasoning upon which it is founded is correct. It is clear that the deed, though unstamped, passes the estate; it is not void. Only under the act 5 Will. & M. c. 21. s. 11. and the subsequent similar enactments it may not be pleaded or admitted in any Court to be good or available. But the object of the present proceeding is to make it bad, as being an act of bankruptcy; there seems then no good reason why it should not be so used.

Next, as to the discretion to be exercised in staying proceedings, the Court always inclines to favour an adjudication obtained on the part of a creditor in preference to one made at the instance of the bankrupt himself. I think, in the present instance, the proceedings in Leeds would be more advantageous for the creditors generally than those in Hull, and therefore the latter must be stayed.

SELWYN, L.J.—The question as to staying proceedings is one of convenience. Lord Eldon, in the case of Ex parte Layton and Ex parte Hardwicke (6 Ves. 433: see p. 439), said, that "If there are two commissions, and the Court see that by superseding one the other may be made good, and will answer the purpose of convenience to the creditors and the bankrupt himself, the Court will supersede the one if the objections to the other would be thereby removed." In the present case it seems altogether more convenient that the second adjudication should be supported rather than the first, for it relates back to an earlier date, and the creditors seem to wish that the administration of the estate should take place under it, for none of them supports the other adjudication. The order appealed from must be discharged, and the proceedings in the Hull Court stayed.

Digitized by Google

Probate—Unexecuted Papers—Reference to, in Will and Codicil—Incorporation.

WILL.—Where the will, if read as speaking at the date of the execution of the codicil, contains language which would operate as an incorporation of a document to which it refers, such document, although not in existence until after the execution of the will, is entitled to probate by force of the codicil. But where the reference in the will was to a future document, and the language of the codicil, in which the reference was repeated, was ambiguous and might be read as pointing either to an existing or future document, the Court refused to incorporate unexecuted papers written by the testatrix between the date of the will and codicil.

Mary Reid, late of Oxford Parade, Cheltenham, in the county of Gloucester, widow, died on or about the 19th of October, 1867, leaving a duly executed will and codicil. The will bore date the 24th of May, 1864; the codicil was not dated, but it appeared from the affidavit of the attesting witnesses that it was executed in the latter part of April or the beginning of May, 1866. By her will she gave all her ready money to her executors, "to pay her funeral expenses, &c., as also some small sums as remembrances to friends, to be named in a letter addressed to my two nieces, Margaret G. Thain and Lilias Thain," whom she appointed residuary legatees. In disposing of certain sheep in Australia, she divided the flock into four parts. Three of these she specifically bequeathed, and then continued, "the other portion to be given to my residuary legatees, to be appropriated by them as specified in my letter."

The codicil ran thus: "In consequence of some deaths in our family, it is necessary that I add a short codicil to my will, &c. In the first place, my set of pearl ornaments, which I then left to Mary Eweretta Thain, in consequence of her early and melancholy death, so much lamented by us all, I must now destine to some one else, and as Mrs. Thain has no female in her family that either she or I would wish to possess those family jewels, I now leave them as intimated in the letter addressed to my residuary legatees."

The will and codicil were found in an envelope in a sealed parcel. In the same parcel, but in a separate envelope, two unexecuted testamentary papers were also found. Paper No. 1. bore date the 1st of March, 1866, and commenced thus: "To my dear nieces, Margaret G. Thain and Lilias Thain, named in my last will and testament as my residuary legatees, and to whom I there stated it was my intention to address to them a letter which I wish to be equally binding and legal as if its contents had been expressed in the will itself. This my intimated intention I now shall endeavour to perform." The paper gave trifling legacies to certain friends and acquaintances, and also referred to her pearls,—this reference and some other portions of the document being in pencil.

Paper No. 2. simply expressed a wish that the fourth part of the sheep in Australia might go towards forming a fund to pay off a debt on a cottage, and had at the foot of it "Cheltenham, 1865." Both papers were in the handwriting of the deceased.

Dr. Swabey moved for probate of the will and codicil, together with the two unexecuted testamentary papers as incorporated by reference.—Although the will does not refer to an existing paper, the unexecuted documents were written before the codicil, and in it the reference "I now leave them as intimated in the letter addressed to my residuary legatees" is a reference to an existing document.

SIR J. P. WILDE.—I think that those papers cannot be admitted to probate as part of the will. Dealing with the case as it appears on the face of the will, the unquestionable rule of law is that the will must refer to a paper as existing at the time, and then that the reference must be in such terms that the paper referred to can be fairly recognized. Now this will does not refer to an existing paper at all. It is said very truly that the language of the will is future, and points to a future document; and, further, the document which is asked to be incorporated refers to the fact that the testatrix intended to write such a paper, and it then goes on to say that this is the document which she so intended. It is quite plain therefore that the document referred to in the will was of a future character. But then comes the codicil. In the goods of Lady Truro (35 L. J. Pr. & M. 89; 1 L. R. P. & D. 201) it was decided that the effect of a codicil was to make the will speak as if executed on the date of the codicil, but that is all. It was there said, "Where the will, if treated as executed on the date of the codicil and read as speaking at that date, contains language which, within the rule of Allen v. Maddock (11 Moo. P.C. 427), would operate as an incorporation of the document to which it refers, testamentary effect may be given to such document. But when this is not the case, the mere fact of unexecuted papers having been written or signed between the date of the will and that of the codicil, will not suffice to add such papers to the will by force of republication, or to make that testamentary which would not have been so, if the will had been originally executed at the later date." But the language of this instrument, read it as you will, is language of a future character, and therefore it seems to me that it cannot fall within the rule laid down in the case to which I have referred. It is quite true that the effect of the codicil is to bring down the will to that date, and that the codicil speaks of leaving certain jewels "as intimated in the letter addressed to my residuary legatees"; but then the language is ambiguous. It might point to an existing paper, but it might also point to a future paper, and the testatrix herself, when she was obviously speaking of a future paper in the will, used similar language—"the other portion to be given to my residuary legatees, to be appropriated by them as specified in my letter." The Court cannot see on the face of the will or codicil any distinct reference to an existing document, and still less that these documents existed at the time of their execution. Under these circumstances, the Court can only grant probate of the will and codicil.

memorandum of part of them in his presence, and trusted to memory for the remainder. Before the will could be prepared A. became suddenly worse, and he then executed a paper in which he desired that the "instructions given to the clerk" should be carried out:—Held (on motion), that the mere fact of the clerk writing in the presence of A. did not make the "memorandum" a written document of which A. had cognizance, and that it was not incorporated by the reference to the "instructions" in the paper.

The deceased, William Pascall, late of Bowdon, in the county of Chester, died on the 25th of September, 1868. On the evening of the same day, being then ill in bed, he gave verbal instructions for the preparation of his will to an attorney's clerk, who attended him for the purpose. Part of the instructions so given, viz., the names of the executors, the names of the children, a legacy of 50*l.* to his sister, and the enumeration of the property, the clerk reduced to writing in the presence of the deceased, and trusted to memory for the remainder. It did not appear that the memorandum was read over to the deceased. After the clerk left the deceased grew suddenly worse, and he then, at the instance of his medical attendant, executed the following paper:

"The instructions given, this Tuesday, August (a mistake for September) 25th, 1868, to Messrs. Whitworth's clerk, I desire to be carried out."

He died a few hours afterwards, and before the will could be prepared.

Pritchard moved for the probate of the paper and the memorandum of instructions made by the clerk as together constituting the will of the deceased. The memorandum was clearly incorporated by reference.

[Sir J. P. Wilde.—How do you shew from the affidavit of the clerk that the deceased knew anything of the existence of the document beyond the fact that the clerk sat and wrote at the table?]

The document was written in his presence, and these were the only instructions given by the deceased that day. That the document is incomplete is no objection. So far as it goes it expresses the intention of the deceased.

Sir J. P. Wilde.—I fear I cannot grant this probate, upon motion at any rate. You are, however, at liberty to propound the papers, and take the considered opinion of the Court upon them. It seems to me that before the Court makes a grant of this kind it ought to be satisfied that the testator, at the time he signed this paper, was refering distinctly to some written document of which he had cognizance, and that the reference should be so definite as to enable the Court to identify the document. That is the plain rule upon which the Court acts in all cases.—[Having referred to the facts of the case as above detailed, his Lordship continued]—Now, the question is, whether the paper executed by the deceased does refer in distinct terms to any written document which he wished to incorporate. It seems to me that it does not. When he says, "the instructions given this Tuesday," &c., he meant, I think, the instructions which he verbally gave the clerk, and though the clerk did make a very meagre note, which, according to his own account, does not contain a tithe of the will, still he made no such paper as confessedly was the substance of his instructions, and still less is there any evidence to shew that the testator knew that there was any such paper in existence. The application for probate must be refused, but the parties may propound the papers if they please.

after its execution, but it could not be found at his death*:—Held, *that there being satisfactory evidence of the due execution of the will, the onus of shewing that it was destroyed by S. when of sound mind lay upon the party alleging its revocation.

The testator, Mr. Oliver Sprigge, late of Peterborough, surgeon, died, on the 3rd of December, 1867. He had declined to make a settlement on his wife, but on the 15th of September, 1858, the day after his marriage, he executed a will in her favour and the children that might be born to them, and appointed her one of his executors. In 1863 his mind became affected. He continued to grow worse, and in November, 1865, he was removed to Lincoln Lunatic Asylum, where he died. Search was made for the will after his death, but it could not be found. The plaintiff, the widow, propounded as executrix a copy of it. The defendants (the children and only next-of-kin, who appeared by their guardian) pleaded that it was destroyed by the testator with the intention of revoking it, and that when he so destroyed it he was of sound mind, memory and understanding.

The case was heard on the 5th of November.

Dr. Deane (with him Dr. Tristram), was for the plaintiff.

Pritchard, for the defendants.

It was proved that the will was in the custody of the testator; that it was seen in his desk by the solicitor who prepared it about two months after its execution; and that for a considerable time—two or three years—prior to his removal to the asylum, he was in the habit of tearing up papers, regardless of their value or character. No evidence was offered on behalf of the defendants, who gave notice with their pleas that they only required the will to be proved in solemn form.

Cur. adv. vult.

Sir J. P. Wilde (Nov. 17).—This was a question of revocation. There was no doubt of the execution of the will, and the question was, whether, in the circumstances that happened, the Court ought or ought not to presume that the will had been revoked, the fact being that the will remained in the custody of the testator from the time it was made, and that upon his death it was not to be found. Under ordinary circumstances in such a state of things, the presumption of law is that the testator destroyed it animo cancellandi, but in this case it appeared that the testator, during a considerable portion of the time that elapsed between the making of the will and his death, was of unsound mind. The question that arose was the general one, whether the Court ought to apply the ordinary presumption in such a case.

Now, a case was cited in argument, Harris v. Berrall (1 Sw. & Tr. 153), and on looking to that case I am of opinion that it is an authority directly in point, and that it concludes the general question. In that case the will had not been destroyed, but had been cancelled, and the question was whether it had been cancelled animo revocandi. Sir C. Cresswell said, "If there had been no evidence to fix one time or another for its mutilation, I still think that it would have been entitled to probate. By 1 Vict. c. 26. every will is required to be executed as therein prescribed. If it is once proved that a will has been duly executed I hold that it is entitled to probate, unless it is also shewn that it has been revoked by one of the several modes pointed out by that statute; and I am of opinion that the burden of shewing that it has been so revoked lies upon the party who sets up the revocation. One of the modes of revocation pointed out by the statute is tearing with an intention to revoke; but an insane person cannot be said to have any intention. The will in this case was in the custody of the deceased at the time she was of unsound as well as of sound mind. Shortly before her death it was discovered to have been torn by her. The burden of shewing that it was not done after she became insane but at a time when she was of sound mind is cast upon the plaintiff who sets up the revocation of the instrument." I am entirely of the same opinion, and I think the rule applies equally to cases in which the will has been destroyed. The short proposition is, that the burden of shewing that the destruction of the instrument was not done by the testator after he became insane but that it was done when he was of sound mind, is cast upon those who set up the revocation. Here there was no evidence to shew when it was done, and thus the party setting up the revocation failed to make out the case upon which the presumption would rest. In these circumstances I think the paper is entitled to probate.

Upon the application of counsel, the costs of all parties were allowed out of the estate.

Staying Proceedings—Lis alibi pendens—Amendment of Pleadings to raise Question of Domicil.

WILL.—A, a native of France, died after many years' residence in London, leaving a will, executed according to the English law, in which he appointed B. sole executrix. B. propounded the will in a declaration. C, the brother, who, with other of the next-of-kin, had entered a caveat, filed pleas and treated the will as that of a domiciled Englishman. Some months afterwards, the cause having in the mean time been ordered to be tried by a special jury, C. and the other next-of-kin commenced proceedings in France to set aside the will, on the ground that the testator was a domiciled Frenchman, and that the will was not executed according to the law of France:—

The Court refused to stay the proceedings in the suit pending the proceedings before the French tribunal, or to allow the pleadings to be amended so as to raise the question of domicil; the facts as to the domicil having been within the knowledge of C. from the first, and the case standing for trial.

The testator, Louis Nicolas Stanislas Veret, otherwise Bonté, died at Gainsforth Street, Horselydown, in the county of Surrey, on or about the 27th of February, 1868, possessed of personal property in England and France, and leaving a will, dated the 6th of February, 1868, in which he appointed the plaintiff sole executrix. He was a native of France, but had lived and carried on the business of a corn-merchant in London since 1850, when he came to England to avoid a criminal prosecution which was instituted against him in his own country. On being notified of his death and the execution of the will, the defendant (his brother) and the other next-of-kin entered a caveat, and further filed, on the 17th of March, a bill in Chancery to restrain the executrix from intermeddling with the property, and for the appointment of a receiver. In this bill the testator was described as a "native of France, but a domiciled Englishman." The declaration was filed on the 1st of April. The defendant pleaded that the will was not duly executed according to the statute 1 Vict. c. 26; that the testator was not of sound mind, memory and understanding, and that the will was procured by undue influence. These pleas were filed on the 5th of May. Issue having been joined, the Court, on the 3rd of June, ordered the cause to be tried before itself by a special jury; and it stood in the list of causes set down for trial in the Michaelmas Sittings.

On the 26th of August, 1868, proceedings were commenced by the defendant and the other next-of-kin in the Civil Tribunal of Montdidier (Somme), France, to set aside the will, on the ground that the testator being a domiciled Frenchman and all the parties to the suit French subjects, the tribunal in question was alone competent to determine its validity; that the will was not executed according to the requirements of French law; and that it was procured by fraud and undue influence. And it was stated in the affidavits that the case would be heard on or about the 15th of December, 1868.

Dr. Tristram, for the defendant, now moved the Court to order a stay of proceedings in the suit pending the proceedings instituted in France.—The deceased being domiciled in France at the time he made the will and died, the French forum is the proper tribunal to determine its validity. Besides, the issues in dispute in both suits are the same. But if the Court should not grant the motion, it may allow the defendant to amend his pleas by adding a plea that the testator was a domiciled Frenchman, and that the very questions in dispute in the case pending in this Court are raised in the case depending in the Court in France.

Dr. Spinks (with him Pritchard), for the plaintiff, contra.—At this stage of the proceedings, the case standing for trial by a special jury, it is too late to amend the pleadings. As to a stay of proceedings, the Court has seisin of the case, and before it can dispossess itself, it must decide that there was a French domicil. But not only has that question not been raised, but the defendant himself has alleged in the bill filed in Chancery that the testator was domiciled in England, and in his affidavit in opposition to an application in Chancery for security for costs, that he himself has come to London with the intention of permanently residing here. The application is an attempt to oust the Court of its jurisdiction.

Dr. Tristram, in reply.

Sir J. P. Wilde.—In this case the testator died in February last. Thereupon the executrix propounded the will which he left behind him, treating it as the will of a domiciled Englishman, and alleging that it was well made according to English law. Upon that being done, it was open to the defendant to take one of two courses. He might allege, as he has alleged to-day, that although the deceased was resident in England, yet that he came to England under peculiar circumstances to avoid the effects of a criminal prosecution, and that he always intended to return to his native land; that there was the animus revertendi, and that consequently he remained a domiciled Frenchman, he not having lost his original domicil in France. It was open to the defendant to contend that, and to go on and say, that the will was not well executed according to the law of the domicil. That was one course he might have taken. The other course was to treat it as the plaintiff treated it, as the will of a domiciled Englishman, and to traverse the plaintiff's allegation that, according to the law of England, the will was a good one. He took the latter course, and he took it with his eyes open, because all the facts now relied upon to shew that the deceased was a domiciled Frenchman were facts, as it appears from his own affidavit, within his knowledge at the time. It seems from the 5th paragraph of his affidavit that he perfectly well knew all along that the deceased was a domiciled Frenchman, and yet, notwithstanding that, he takes issue upon the question whether the will was good according to the law of England, treating it as purely a question to be decided by the law of England. The suit goes on, issue is joined, and directions are given for the mode of trial; and then, in August this year, the defendant goes to the French Court and commences a suit there. He now comes to this Court and asks to have all proceedings stayed in it. It is obvious that such an application is quite untenable, because the question to be determined in the French Court is a different one altogether from that to be determined in the English Court. In the French tribunal it will have to be decided, first of all, whether the testator was a domiciled Englishman or not; in the English Court that fact is admitted, and the question will be whether according to the law of England, the will is a good one. The French Court will not entertain the suit, except upon the assumption that the deceased was a domiciled Frenchman, or if otherwise, according to the law of nations, they would decide it according to English law.

This Court on its side is proceeding on the assumption that he was a domiciled Englishman; and, therefore, the proceedings in the two Courts will be proceedings of a totally different character. It is, therefore, quite clear to my mind that the one suit is quite independent of the other, and that it would be monstrous to stay proceedings in the one which was first commenced in order that the proceedings in the other might be first determined. Dr. Tristram then applies to be allowed to retrace his steps, and to say at the eleventh hour that the deceased was not a domiciled Englishman, but a domiciled Frenchman. That is a matter within the discretion of the Court. It is, however, five months since the suit was commenced, and under such circumstances the Court would never allow a party to retrace his steps, unless it was satisfied that he was under some mistake as to the facts, and discovered at the last moment that the testator was a domiciled Frenchman. But he knew this all along, and it would be monstrous to allow him, after all this expense has been incurred, to withdraw his pleas and file fresh pleas founded on circumstances which were within his knowledge from the first. The application must be rejected, and with costs.

Dr. Tristram asked for leave to appeal.

SIR J. P. WILDE.—The question as to the amendment of the pleadings is not properly a ground of appeal. I give leave to appeal on the motion as originally made, on condition of payment of costs, and that there be no stay of proceedings.

Desertion—Wife's Petition—Judicial Separation.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—Immediately after their marriage in 1845, A. and B. proceeded to Jamaica, where A. (the husband) had an appointment. B. (the wife) came to England at the end of the year in consequence of ill health, and corresponded with and received an allowance from A. until 1851. In 1851 A. wrote requesting her to return to Jamaica, stating at the same time that if she did not she would hear no more of him. B. replied that she was still too unwell to return to the island and remained in England. From 1851 to 1856 she neither heard nor received any allowance from A. In 1856 she communicated with him through a friend, the result being an arrangement for the continuance of the allowance, but she at no time expressed any desire to return to him. In 1860 A. wrote to say that he could no longer pay the allowance, and all communication ceased between them:—Held, that after the definite offer made by A. in 1851, B. should have been able to shew that she subsequently sought a renewal of the cohabitation, and that the circumstances under which she and A. continued to live separate did not constitute desertion on his part.

This was a petition by the wife for dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery, cruelty and desertion. The respondent did not appear. At the hearing, which took place before the Judge Ordinary on the 12th and 13th of November, the charge of adultery was established; the petitioner failed to prove cruelty, and judgment was reserved on the question of desertion.

The respondent was a medical practitioner. He married the petitioner in April, 1845, and all correspondence ceased between them in 1860. The other facts are set out in the judgment.

Dr. Swabey, for the petitioner.

The JUDGE ORDINARY (Nov. 14).—In this case the wife prays for a dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery, cruelty and desertion. The Court has already intimated that it considers the adultery to be proved, and that it considers the cruelty has not been proved. The remaining question was, whether desertion was established. Immediately after her marriage Mrs. Keech went with her husband to Jamaica, where he had an appointment which gave him an income only of 100*l.* a year. She had in consequence to put up with some hardship. Her health suffered, and she returned to England at the end of 1845 or beginning of 1846, and she has been in England since that date. Mr. Keech, so far as we know, has been abroad ever since, the greater part of the time in Jamaica, where he succeeded in obtaining another appointment of a more lucrative character; and the contention on the part of the petitioner is, that the circumstances under which they have lived separate amount to desertion on his part. When she left Jamaica he put her on board the vessel himself, and otherwise then acted kindly. She further states that there was no arrangement for a separation, but that he said he would allow her 30*l.* a year. His income being only 100*l.* a year, that would seem to be a fair provision. She then says that she went to live with her mother until 1851, and that she and the respondent corresponded on kindly terms. Now, here you have a wife returning to England on account of her health, taking up her abode with her mother, her husband making her an allowance and corresponding with her, and no one can say that there was then desertion. In 1851, she says, he wrote to me. When asked for the letter she says she tore it up. What did he say in the letter? He said, "Come out here (Jamaica) directly, and the money for your passage will be at my agent's;" and then he went on to say, "If you don't come I shall disappear, and then you won't hear any more of me." Now it is very likely that he intimated on some former occasion his desire to see her out in Jamaica. The petitioner says that it was not so, and the Court has no means of knowing; but from the tone of the letter it would rather look as if he had also on a former occasion expressed a like desire to see her in the island. What was the answer? "I answered that I was still in bad health, and couldn't go (I was still weak and suffering from neuralgia), but I asked for the money which was intended for my passage to apply it to other uses." He refused, or at any rate did not assent, and she did not go out. Here the correspondence seems to have ended, and she heard no more of the respondent until 1856. In 1856 she succeeded through the medium of some persons living in Jamaica, in ascertaining, which she had been desirous of doing, where he was, and she found that he was in the island and was leading a loose life. She then got a relation, an attorney, to write to him for an allowance, and he thereupon made an allowance of 50*l.* to herself, and a further allowance of 25*l.* which was to be paid to her mother by way of remuneration for the past support of his wife in England; and this allowance he continued to pay up to October, 1860. He then wrote and said that his circumstances were altered, that he had lost his appointment, and that he was no longer able to pay the allowance. It is under these circumstances that the Court is asked to hold that he deserted his wife. But what is meant by desertion? It means that he wilfully separated himself from his wife against her consent; but the Court cannot come to that conclusion. Here there was a definite offer by the husband to come and join him in Jamaica in 1851, and funds provided for her passage; and if the wife's health was not then sufficiently re-established to admit of her going to Jamaica, still she ought to have been able to shew in the witness-box that, knowing her husband's desire to have her come back to him, she subsequently offered to join him. It seems to me that he was willing to have her back, and that she was not willing to go; and I find in one of his letters, dated in 1860, a passage to this effect: "I have declined repeated offers of private practice, one recently, Mrs. Keech having refused to return to the island." Taking that and the evidence given in the case, I cannot see my way to the conclusion that the respondent wilfully deserted his wife. That Mr. Keech is willing enough for a divorce I am disposed to think, but that he ever brought himself within the provisions of the act of parliament by deserting his wife, I am not disposed to think. He has, however, been guilty of adultery, and if the wife desire it she can have a decree of judicial separation.

Judicial separation decreed.

CURTIS v. CURTIS.

38 L. J. P. 9; 19 L. T. 610.

Dissolution of Marriage—Non-Appearance of Petitioner at Hearing—Dismissal of Petition—Practice—Costs.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—Where the wife, the petitioner, did not appear on the day of hearing, the Court, before dismissing the petition, required that a rule to shew cause should be first served upon her, and intimated that in all such cases that practice should be followed.

If in a matrimonial suit the wife be unable to go to trial in consequence of the non-payment of her costs by the husband, she should either apply at chambers to have the case stand over, or appear in Court on the day of hearing and state her inability to proceed.

This was the wife's petition for dissolution of marriage. It appeared in the general list of causes for Michaelmas Term, and stood for hearing, before the Judge Ordinary, on Thursday the 12th of November. The petitioner did not appear.

Bayford, for the respondent, asked that the petition might be dismissed.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—With a view to establishing a practice in these cases, let a rule be served on the other side to the effect that, unless on next motion day cause be shewn to the contrary, the petition will be dismissed.

Searle (Nov. 17) shewed cause.—The petitioner has got an order for costs and alimony, and an attachment against the respondent to enforce their payment. They however still remain unpaid, and the petitioner is in consequence not in a position to proceed to hearing. She is entitled to have the rule discharged, with costs.

Bayford admitted that he could not support it, but submitted that under the circumstances the petitioner was not entitled to costs.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—The petitioner ought to have done one of two things. She ought either to have come to chambers and asked that the case might stand over, or she should have come to the Court on the day of hearing and stated her inability to proceed in consequence of the non-payment of her costs. The husband was brought here by seeing the case in the paper, and the cause of this rule was the petitioner's absence. She cannot therefore have the costs of the argument.

Rule discharged; costs of argument not to be taxed against respondent.

Matrimonial Suit—Respondent and Co-Respondent—New Trial—Severance of Issues.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—Where there was reason to suppose that, on the trial of the husband's petition, evidence applicable to the respondent alone affected the minds of the jury against the co-respondent, the Court, in making absolute the rule for a new trial, ordered that the issues should be severed, so that the charges against the co-respondent might be tried separately from those against the respondent.

* Before the Full Court: The Judge Ordinary, Willes, J. and Cleasby, B.

This was the husband's petition for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent. The respondent and co-respondent denied the charge, and the respondent further pleaded a counter-charge of adultery against the petitioner.

The cause was tried, before the Judge Ordinary, by a special jury, in the Sittings after Trinity Term. Alleged confessions by the respondent were much relied on by counsel for the petitioner, and the jury, after long deliberation, found that the respondent and co-respondent had committed adultery, and they assessed the damages at 1,000*l*. They also found that the petitioner had been guilty of adultery, but did not state with whom or where, though the charges in the answer were specific. The petitioner took no steps to impeach the verdict of the jury so far as it affected him; but, on the 3rd of November, Dr. Spinks, for the co-respondent, obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. In granting the rule the Judge Ordinary directed that it should be argued before the Full Court.

Cause was shewn against the rule by Ballantine, Serjeant and Willis, for the petitioner; and it was supported by Dr. Spinks and F. H. Lewis, for the co-respondent.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—There were three questions of fact submitted to the jury. One of them was, whether the petitioner had committed adultery; another of them was, whether, upon the evidence applicable to the respondent, it was proved that she had committed adultery with the co-respondent; and the third was, whether the co-respondent, upon the evidence legally applicable to him, was proved to have committed adultery with the respondent. We are all of opinion that the inquiry with respect to the co-respondent has not been a satisfactory one. The effect of some of the evidence applicable to the respondent alone was such as probably to affect the minds of the jury strongly against him, and we are therefore prepared to grant a new trial of the issue found against him. The petitioner, however, has also been found guilty of adultery. He has not applied to have that finding set aside, but we nevertheless think that, if he desire it, he ought to have the opportunity of reopening the question. The form in which the verdict was delivered was such as to lead the Court to believe that possibly justice has not been done to him, and he may, if he wish it, have a new trial; but if he determine upon having a new trial, it must be a new trial as to the whole matter, including the issue found against the respondent. With a view also that justice may be done to all parties, the charges against the co-respondent must be tried separately from those against the respondent, and the issues therefore severed.

Rule absolute for new trial of the issue found against the co-respondent.

Dissolution of Marriage — Specific Counter-charges of Adultery by Respondent—General Verdict of Adultery found against Petitioner—New Trial offered and declined—Refusal of Decree—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. s. 31.—Costs.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—The cases are few in which the Court would be justified in visiting with the penalty of adultery a guilty wife whose husband has also been found guilty of adultery.

Where a general verdict of adultery was found against the husband (the petitioner), the issues raised by the counter-charges of adultery in the wife's answer being specific, and the petitioner declined the offer of a new trial, the Court, accepting the verdict of the jury as conclusive of his adultery, refused to exercise its discretionary power under section 31. of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, and condemned him in the wife's full costs.

In this suit, which was the husband's petition for dissolution of marriage, and which was tried before the Judge Ordinary, by a special jury, in the sittings after Trinity Term, the jury found that the respondent and co-respondent had committed adultery together, and they assessed the damages at 1,000*l*. They also found that the petitioner had likewise been guilty of adultery; but they declined to say with whom or where, or whether it was committed with the knowledge and consent of the respondent. The petitioner took no steps to impeach the verdict, but the Full Court, in making absolute a rule nisi for a new trial of the issues found against the co-respondent, intimated that the petitioner might also have a new trial of the issue found against him, the question of the respondent's guilt to be, in such event, also re-opened.

Willis, on behalf of the petitioner, now moved the Court to exercise its discretionary power under section 31. of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, and to grant a decree nisi notwithstanding the verdict. The jury having only found a general verdict of adultery, the Court might assume that the petitioner had not been guilty of the specific adultery charged against him in the respondent's answer, and might properly exercise the discretionary power vested in it by section 31. of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85.—He cited Narracott v. Narracott and Hesketh (3 Sw. & Tr. 408; 33 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 132).

[The JUDGE ORDINARY.—But in that case no verdict was found against the petitioner. As to the offer of a new trial, the petitioner was not in a position to accept it.]

Dr. Deane (with him Dr. Swabey), for the respondent, contra.—The petitioner could not avail himself of the finding of the jury against his wife and repudiate it as against himself. As to the discretionary power given by section 31. of the first Divorce Act, the Court was not to say whether the petitioner had committed adultery (here the jury found that he had); but whether the adultery partook of that venial character which, notwithstanding its commission, would justify the Court in granting him the relief he sought. The respondent was entitled to her full costs—Ellaytt v. Ellaytt, Taylor and Halse (3 Sw. & Tr. 504; 33 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 137).

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—I assume that the petitioner declines to avail himself of the liberty granted by the Full Court to submit the whole matter to a fresh jury. That being so, the verdict stands. It is now said that it was not a verdict against the petitioner on the issues, but merely a general verdict of adultery. There were certainly some expressions of the jury, when the verdict was given, which were not satisfactory; but, on the whole, there is no doubt that the jury did find the petitioner guilty of adultery. The Court is now asked to take one of two courses,—either to pass over the finding of the jury and to act on its own opinion as to the guilt of the petitioner; or, accepting the finding of the jury and treating the fact of adultery as proved, to exercise its discretion under the 31st section of the Divorce Act, and, notwithstanding the adultery of the petitioner, to grant him a divorce. I am of opinion that the Court cannot properly do one or the other of these things. Now, whatever may be the effect of the verdict of a jury in some cases,—to whatever extent it may be possible for the Court to exercise its discretion upon it, and to refuse to withhold a divorce, —yet in this case I am clear that the verdict ought to be allowed to have its ordinary effect. I do not propose now to attempt a definition of the cases in which the Court would pass by the verdict of a jury; but in this case the petitioner has refused the opportunity of having the verdict reviewed before a fresh jury; and the Court therefore is not inclined to pass it by. The remaining question is, whether the petitioner ought to have his divorce. The language of the section is: "Provided always, that the Court shall not be bound to pronounce such decree if it shall find that the petitioner has, during the marriage, been guilty of adultery, or if the petitioner shall, in the opinion of the Court, have been guilty of unreasonable delay in presenting or prosecuting such petition, or of cruelty, &c." That looks as if the legislature meant that the cases in which the Court did not grant a divorce should be the exceptions. But, in construing that section, my learned predecessor always considered what was the practice before the Divorce Act passed, and what the House of Lords used to do. He considered that, although the language of the section gave a discretion, he would be acting in conformity with former practice by withholding a divorce under such circumstances, or making the grant of it quite exceptional. I do not propose to depart from that principle. The cases are few in which the Court would be justified in visiting with the penalty of adultery a guilty wife whose husband has also been found guilty of adultery. As to the question of costs, that must be governed by the cases of Ellaytt v. Ellaytt, Taylor and Halse (3 Sw. & Tr. 504; 33 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 137) and Sedden v. Sedden (2 Sw. & Tr. 640; 31 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 101). The wife has her costs in these cases because she succeeds in the suit. It is true the husband succeeds in proving her guilty of adultery; but then she, on her side, has established the proposition that he had no ground for coming into Court. The wife must therefore have her full costs.

The COURT refused to dismiss the petition against her until the issue with the co-respondent had been disposed of.

Confrontation—Petitioner and Co-respondent ordered to attend at Trial—Damages—Claim withdrawn—Reinstatement of—Practice.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—The co-respondent, who pleaded a counter-charge of adultery against the petitioner, and whose case depended upon the petitioner's identification, applied that he might be ordered to attend at the trial. The petitioner asked that, as a condition of the order, the co-respondent might also be ordered to attend. The Court ordered that both petitioner and co-respondent should attend at the trial.

A claim for damages having been formally withdrawn, the Court refused to allow it to be reinstated in the petition, the petitioner having failed to shew that it was withdrawn in error, or that an altered state of circumstances had arisen which would justify its reinsertion.

This was the husband's petition for dissolution of marriage, on the ground of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent. It also contained a claim for damages, but this was struck out of the petitioner's motion on the 3rd of November; and on the 10th of November the co-respondent obtained leave to amend his answer, by adding a counter-charge of adultery against the petitioner.

Dr. Swabey, for the co-respondent, moved the Court (Dec. 15) to order the petitioner to attend at the trial. The petitioner was abroad, and the co-respondent's case depended on his identification. In Hooke v. Hooke (28 L. J. Prob. & M. 29) it was held, that the Court had not power in a suit for dissolution to compel the respondent to attend, but in Pollack v. Pollack, Deane and Macnamara (2 Sw. & Tr. 648; 32 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 28), on intervention by the Queen's Proctor after decree nisi, the proceedings were ordered to be stayed till the petitioner should attend.

Searle, for the petitioner, submitted, that the Court could only order his attendance for the purpose of being examined under section 43. of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. If, however, the Court made the order, the co-respondent should also be required to attend.

The JUDGE ORDINARY ordered that both petitioner and co-respondent should attend at the trial.

Dr. Tristram, for the petitioner, moved (Dec. 22) to be allowed to reinstate in the petition the claim for damages.

Dr. Swabey, for the co-respondent, contra.—The claim had been voluntarily withdrawn, and it would not have been revived if it had not been for the counter-charge of adultery against the petitioner.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—I think the application must be refused. It may be that on good grounds shewn (here no grounds have been shewn) the Court would allow a petitioner to change his mind in such a matter, but, as the Court must proceed on some principle, he cannot be allowed to shift backwards and forwards as often as he pleases. The claim has been formally withdrawn, and there ought to be an end of it, unless it can be shewn that it was withdrawn in error, or that some altered state of circumstances has arisen which would justify its reinsertion. The application must be refused, with costs.

Settlements—Order under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. s. 45. and 22 & 23 Vict. c 61. s. 5.—Omission in Order per Incuriam—Order acted on and appealed against—Rectification of—Practice.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—In making an order under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. s. 45. and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61. s. 5, the Court failed per incuriam to give the husband (the petitioner) the interest in the wife's property which it intended. Before the error was discovered the order was acted on by the petitioner and repealed against by the respondent. The Court held that it had power to amend the order so as to carry out its original intention, and intimated that it would follow the practice of the Court of Chancery, which varies its orders, but not without re-hearing when the order has passed and been entered as a decree. The matter was accordingly re-heard, and fresh circumstances having been brought to the knowledge of the Court the parties were directed to attend at chambers that the order might be drawn anew.

The husband, the petitioner in the suit, having obtained a decree for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery, subsequently petitioned the Court, under section 5. of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61. and section 45. of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, to vary the marriage settlements, and to order also that provision should be made for his benefit and that of the children of the marriage out of the wife's property.

Owing to the character of the settlements and the circumstances attending the property affected (it consisted principally of coffee plantations in Ceylon, which were heavily mortgaged) the matter was very complicated, and the Court in consequence invited both parties to submit proposals for the basis of an arrangement.

This was done, and on the 31st of July, 1868, the Judge Ordinary made an order which, per incuriam, omitted to give the petitioner, as intended, one-third of the interest in a sum of 20,000*l.* during the life of the respondent.

The order was appealed against by the respondent, and was acted on by the petitioner before the discovery of the omission.

Digitized by Google

Hodgson, for the petitioner, now moved the Court to amend the order so as to carry out its original intention.

Manisty (with him Cohen), for the respondent, contra.—At common law an order once acted upon cannot be altered or amended. Here, not only has the order been acted upon, but it is also under appeal. It can only be altered by a higher Court; and even if it can be amended in this Court, this is not the mode in which it should be done. It should be by petition.

Hodgson, in reply.—The Court has power to correct its mistakes. The appeal will not be affected by the correction.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—As to the justice of the matter I have no doubt. What took place was this: each party sent in a proposal, the matter being very complicated and difficult to deal with. It was spoken to on a subsequent occasion, and the Court having ascertained what it was that the petitioner desired, and that it was reasonable, an order was thereupon drawn up; but before it was drawn up notice was given to the parties to attend at chambers and see it. They accordingly did attend at chambers, and no objection was taken as to the mode of dealing with the 20,000*l.*, now the subject of discussion. At the same time, if the matter had been then called to my attention I should have made the alteration now desired. I am clear that the order is not in accordance with the intention of the Court; but the question is whether I can now correct the mistake. The practice of the Court is not sufficiently formed in these matters to indicate the course which I should take. There is no analogy between orders of Courts of common law and orders of this kind, but the Court of Chancery furnishes a variety of instances which I should have thought would have been available and been cited in argument, though I know not how far it may go in dealing with cases of this kind, where the blunder is passed over by the party interested in correcting it, and where, with full notice, no objection is at the time taken. I will be guided by the practice of the Court of Chancery, and if I make the amendment I shall take care that the party appealing has the right of appeal on that as on all other points.

Cur. adv. vult.

The JUDGE ORDINARY (Dec. 1).—In this case the Court took time to consider whether it was within the proper exercise of its functions to alter or amend an order already made, and I intimated that, there being no established practice in this Court, I should like to ascertain what the practice was in the Court of Chancery. I find that the practice in the Court of Chancery is well established. It is this: so long as an order remains on the minutes the Court can alter it from time to time. When the order has once passed and been entered as a decree, the Court never does alter it without a re-hearing; but when any suggestion is made that the order does not carry out the intentions of the Court, then it is the daily practice to re-open and re-hear the matter with the view of doing what justice may require. I think that is the course that ought to be pursued in this case. My impression is that the parties do not desire to have the matter re-opened, and that they will be content to consider what took place last Tuesday as a re-hearing; but if they wish it, the Court will appoint next Tuesday for a further hearing; if not, the order will be amended as prayed.

The matter was re-opened and re-argued by the same counsel on the following Tuesday, the 8th of December, and fresh circumstances were brought to the notice of the Court, which led it to think that, in addition to the correction suggested by the petitioner, the order should also be amended in other respects in the interest of the respondent.

The JUDGE ORDINARY in consequence intimated that the order should be drawn anew, and directed the parties to attend at chambers for the purpose.

Desertion—Refusal of Wife to resume Cohabitation until Husband's Innocence was proved—Verdict in Favour of Husband—Cohabitation never resumed—Fresh Petition.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—No one can desert who does not actively and wilfully bring to an end an existing state of cohabitation. Cohabitation may be put an end to by other acts besides that of actually quitting the common home; and when once cohabitation has ceased to exist, whether by the adverse act of husband or wife, or even by the mutual consent of both, desertion becomes from that moment impossible to either, at least until their common life and home have been resumed.

A, the wife, while temporarily absent from the common home, received information which led her to believe that B, the husband, had been guilty of adultery, and she in consequence refused to resume cohabitation until his innocence was established. On the trial of her petition for divorce, on the ground of adultery and cruelty, the verdict was in favour of the husband, but both parties continued to live apart, and nothing was done by either towards reconciliation or resumption of the cohabitation. Subsequently B, the husband, committed adultery, and A. filed a fresh petition for dissolution of marriage, on the ground of adultery, coupled with desertion:—Held, that under the circumstances B. had not been guilty of desertion.

This was the wife's petition for dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery, coupled with desertion without reasonable cause, for two years and upwards. It was heard, before the Judge Ordinary, on the 27th of November. The adultery was proved, and judgment was reserved on the question of desertion.

Coleridge (with him H. Giffard and Dr. Swabey), for the petitioner.

Dr. Spinks (with him Searle), for the respondent.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment.

The JUDGE ORDINARY (Dec. 22).—The petitioner in this suit instituted a former suit against her husband a few years since, charging him with adultery and cruelty. She failed to establish those charges. The parties have never lived together since. Her present suit is founded upon charges of adultery and desertion. Adultery since the conclusion of the former suit has been proved. The question which the Court has reserved for consideration is, whether the desertion is established. The facts are not doubtful. In the autumn of 1861 Mrs. Fitzgerald received information which led her to believe that her husband had been guilty of adultery. At that time their home was at Braydon Hall, but at the moment when these suspicions were aroused they were both temporarily absent from it—he for a month at Cowes, she for a few days in London. Some attempt was made to establish the proposition that Major Fitzgerald, on leaving for his visit to Cowes, had, in fact, determined not to return to his wife. But his conduct immediately afterwards, and the contents of the correspondence which then passed between them, sufficiently disprove any such resolve. Upon discovery of what Mrs. Fitzgerald deemed proof of her husband's guilt, she wrote to him a letter charging him with it, and distinctly refused to return home, at least for the present. She says: "I have received a communication of such a nature it is impossible for me to return to Braydon for the present. In fact, I am so entirely upset by it that it must be some days before I can recover myself sufficiently to think what to do." After writing this letter Mrs. Fitzgerald went with her mother to Dover. Thither Major Fitzgerald followed her. It is needless to pass in review the passionate letters which Major Fitzgerald then wrote, entreating forgiveness for the past (whatever that was), and that his wife would receive him and live with him again. She refused to see him, and the burthen of her letters was uniform—prove yourself innocent, and I will accede to your wishes; until then I have determined to live separate and apart from you. The act of separation was therefore that of the wife. She withdrew herself from the common home and cohabitation; and though strenuously pressed to resume it, she persistently refused. Whether she had good cause and reasonable excuse for her conduct is another matter. True, she failed to establish her husband's guilt to the satisfaction of the jury and the Court. But it is not inconsistent with that to allege that she had such reasonable grounds for suspecting her husband as to warrant her in withdrawing from cohabitation until her suspicions were confirmed or dispelled. Believing that she could establish her husband's guilt she instituted the suit to which I have above referred. The case was brought to trial at Christmas, 1863, and an appeal to the Full Court finally established the verdict against her early in the following year. Meanwhile, both parties had kept aloof from each other, as might be expected. After the first few months which immediately succeeded the withdrawal of his wife from Braydon Hall in 1861, Major Fitzgerald, so far as the Court is aware, desisted from all attempts to induce her to return to him. The termination of the legal proceedings appears to have worked no alteration in the relation of the parties. On her part, Mrs. Fitzgerald made no overtures to her husband to return to him. She says she wrote one letter to him to a wrong address, which was returned through the Dead Letter Office. She says further, indeed, that she was willing to have returned if he had asked her, and that she was bound to accept the verdict of the jury. But, on being questioned, she could not, and did not, assert that his innocence was really established to her own satisfaction and belief, and the Court may well hesitate to accept the conclusion that the trial had really removed her scruples or changed her determination, for she has repeated the same charges against him on the face of her present petition. She also alleges that for some time she did not know her husband's address; but she admitted that she first entertained the idea of reconciliation when she came to town in 1864, and that within a day or two afterwards she found her husband was leading an immoral life, and abandoned the idea again almost as soon as she had conceived it. So that in the result it is quite plain that Mrs. Fitzgerald never demanded to be taken back again by her husband, and I think it is tolerably plain that she never desired it. On Major Fitzgerald's part nothing seems to have been done since the first suit towards reconciliation. He has never sought his wife or asked her society, but, like her, has been well content that the breach made in 1861 should remain open, and cohabitation not be resumed. But does all this amount to "desertion" on his part? That is the question. Now, putting the facts in the most favourable light for Mrs. Fitzgerald, it would, I presume, be argued thus: After the first suit was at an end, Major Fitzgerald might at any time have demanded cohabitation of his wife; she was not unwilling to return to him; and if she had been, the law would have compelled her. But he made no such demand, therefore, he wilfully kept apart from her. Therefore he deserted her. If, indeed, keeping apart from a wife who has voluntarily quitted her husband against his will and withdrawn from cohabitation is the same thing as "deserting" her, the argument must prevail. But I cannot think that it is. It is one thing to make a breach, it is another to refrain from attempts to heal it. Desertion means abandonment, and implies an active withdrawal from a cohabitation that exists. The word carries with it an idea of forsaking or leaving, and is hardly satisfied by the negative position of standing still. No doubt there are cases, such as that of Williams v. Williams (3 Sw. & Tr. 547; 33 L. J. Pr. & M. 173), in which actual cohabitation does not exist at all, because the circumstances of the parties do not permit of it. I am not now dealing with such cases. No doubt, again, there are cases in which the parties may have innocently ceased for a time to be living together, separated by the calls of every-day life or the exigencies of public duty, and the husband or wife, taking advantage of the separation, may have purposely rejected all subsequent opportunities of coming together again; and this may constitute desertion. For, in truth, in such cases the state of cohabitation was not, in the first instance, wholly relinquished, but only suspended till a fitting occasion for its resumption, and purposely to reject all such occasions is, practically, to abandon it. Such were the cases of Gatehouse v. Gatehouse (36 L. J. Pr. & M. 121) and Lawrence v. Lawrence (2 Sw. & Tr. 575). But they have no analogy with a case in which a wife, who complains of desertion, has herself voluntarily ceased to live with her husband, and an actual separation has already occurred, not in obedience to any external necessity, but for the express purpose of avoiding continued intercourse. In this latter case the cohabitation is not merely suspended, but determined by the wife herself, with or without good cause, as the case may be, and with or without a conditional intention on her part of possibly resuming it at some indefinite future day; but still broken up and put an end to. In such a case desertion, if it exist at all, is rather the act of the wife herself than that of the husband. I come, then, to the following conclusions as applicable to cases of this kind: No one can desert who does not actively and wilfully bring to an end an existing state of cohabitation. Cohabitation may be put an end to by other acts besides that of actually quitting the common home. Advantage may be taken of temporary absence or separation to hold aloof from a renewal of intercourse. This done wilfully, against the wish of the other party, and in execution of a design to cease cohabitation, would constitute desertion. But if the state of cohabitation has already ceased to exist, whether by the adverse act of husband or wife, or even by the mutual consent of both, desertion, in my judgment, becomes from that moment impossible to either, at least, until their common life and home have been resumed. In the meantime either party may have the right to call upon the other to resume their conjugal relations and, if refused, to enforce their resumption, but such refusal cannot constitute the offence intended by the statute under the name of "desertion without cause." It results from these considerations that the petitioner's claim to a dissolution of her marriage must be respected. She is entitled to a decree of judicial separation.

Domicil—Consul—Domicil of Lunatic Son of Full Age—Change of Domicil —Evidence.

INTERNATIONAL LAW.—Residence in a foreign country as a public officer gives rise to no inference of a domicil in that country; but if already there domiciled and resident, the acceptance of an office in the public service of another country does nothing to destroy the domicil.

The domicil of a child during its minority follows that of the father; and if from lunacy or mental imbecility it is incapable, after it has attained the age of majority, to choose a domicil for itself, in such case its domicil will still continue to be determined by that of the father.

An intention to abandon the domicil of origin and acquire another must be indicated by some words or acts of a marked character from which a definite resolve may safely be collected; but the mode in which a man may evidence such a intention must vary indefinitely with the age, the character, the circumstances and the general conduct of the individual. Where, accordingly, a minor of age of nineteen or twenty, who was of weak intellect and incapable of being employed in any business or occupation, was taken back to Oporto on the close of his education in England by his father, an Englishman domiciled in Portugal, but returned to England shortly after he attained his majority, the Court held, that his intention to abandon his domicil of origin and to acquire an English one was sufficiently shewn by the reluctance with which he accompanied his father back to Portugal, by expressions of dislike to residence in Portugal, and by his prompt return to England when circumstances allowed it.

This was a cause of interest, the question being whether George Crispin was at the time of his death, which took place in a lunatic asylum at Stoke Newington, Middlesex, on the 1st of September, 1862, domiciled in England or Portugal.

It was heard before Sir J. P. Wilde, on Wednesday, the 13th of January. The facts were these:

George Crispin was born (presumably at Lisbon) on or about the 11th of January, 1804. His parents were English, but were at the time of his birth domiciled in Portugal. Whilst yet a child he was sent to school to England, and remained in this country until 1823 or 1824, when he returned to Portugal with his father, who was then British consul at Oporto. He came back to England, but under what circumstances was not in evidence, in 1826 or 1827, and took up his residence with his aunt at Richmond. He was always of weak intellect (the degree was a matter of controversy). In 1829 or 1830 he was placed under medical supervision and control, and in 1858 he was found lunatic under a commission.

John Crispin, the father, was the son of William Crispin, who had settled at Faro, in Portugal, about the year 1765. He was born in 1769, was educated in England, married in Lisbon in 1801, where he carried on business as a merchant, and in 1811 (he having previously been employed in the British consul general's office at Lisbon) was appointed British consul at Oporto. He was removed from Oporto to Corunna, in Spain, in 1832. In 1843 he retired on a pension, and came to England, and he died at Richmond in 1846.

Dr. Spinks (with him Dr. Tristram), for the plaintiffs, whom the deceased appointed his executors in a will made in 1858, urged that his domicil at the time of his death was English. The presumption was that John Crispin, the father, looking at the date at which he left his home, the fact that he never took any part in his father's business, and the early period at which he was employed in the consular service, had revived his English domicil, and he did not abandon it by his subsequent residence abroad as British consul. But even if the father's domicil were Portuguese, George Crispin, the son, when he came of age, was entitled to choose his own, and he did so by returning to England, where he remained until his death.

H. Giffard (with him Inderwick), for the defendant,—an illegitimate cousin of the deceased, but who by the law of Portugal would be entitled as one of the next-of-kin in the event of an intestacy,—contended that the domicil of the father was Portuguese; that he did not lose it by entering the British consular service; that George Crispin was incapable from his mental condition of choosing a domicil for himself, and that therefore he retained throughout his life his original domicil, which was that of Portugal.

Cur. adv. vult.

SIR J. P. WILDE (Feb. 9).—George Crispin died in this country on the 1st of September, 1862, and the question now before the Court is, whether at the time of his death he had a Portuguese domicil. His family was English or Irish by extraction. He was born in 1804, and lived all his life in England, with the exception of two or three years, during which he was in Portugal with his father, who was the British consul at Oporto. But residence is no absolute test of domicil, and the very peculiar facts of this case render it one in which it is not easy to apply with confidence the recognized principles of the law.

It must be admitted at the outset that on the 11th of January, 1804, when George Crispin was born, the domicil of his father, whose name was John, was Portuguese. For John was the son of William, who had settled at Faro, in Portugal, in the middle of the last century, had established a valuable mercantile business there, and had there lived till his death, under circumstances which shewed that he had abandoned his original domicil for that of Portugal. The domicil of origin of John, his son, was therefore Portugal. The date of his birth was the 7th of January, 1769, and there is evidence that soon after his baptism he was sent to England. His subsequent movements in the earlier part of his life were not in evidence; but he was shewn to be in Lisbon in 1792, when he was about twenty-three years old. He was shewn again to be in Lisbon in 1799; on the 5th of April, 1801, he married in Lisbon, and in 1811, when he received his first appointment as British consul at Oporto, he is represented as a merchant carrying on business in Lisbon. On these facts, which were all that the evidence revealed, it is impossible, I think, for the Court to read an intention up to this time (1811) to abandon his Portuguese domicil of origin for that of England or any other country. John was therefore a domiciled Portuguese in 1804, and George, who was then born to him, had a Portuguese domicil as his domicil of origin.

Starting from this point, it was ably and forcibly argued that George said nothing and did nothing in the course of his life from which the Court could infer a deliberate resolve on his part to surrender his Portuguese domicil and replace it by an English one. That such an inference could alone in the eye of the law destroy his domicil of origin is apparent from the numerous authorities which exist on this subject, confirmed as they are by the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Moorhouse v. Lord (32 L. J. Ch. 235). The great difficulty which besets this part of the case lies in the fact that George Crispin, always of somewhat weak mind, was certainly as early as 1829 or 1830, probably even earlier, unfit from mental incapacity to manage his own affairs, or be employed in any business or occupation, and that from that time till his death he was more or less under medical supervision and control as a person of unsound mind, having in the year 1858 been actually found lunatic under a commission. It was argued on the one isde that he was non compos mentis from the time his father took him, still a minor, from this country to Portugal, in 1823 or 1824. It was argued on the other that his mental incapacity did not shew itself until the later period of 1829 or 1830. It would be no easy task to ascertain upon the very meagre evidence which the great lapse of time has left at command, what was the precise period at which his mental faculties so far failed him as to make him incapable of a choice of domicil. Nor is it necessary, for, in my judgment, both alternatives led to the same result. I propose to deal with them separately.

Assuming, then, the first to be true, namely, that from a time before his minority expired—that is, 1824—continually down to the period of his death, he was of unsound mind, the question arises whether anything, and, if so, what, happened which could destroy his domicil of origin. Now his father, John Crispin, as I have already pointed out, was in 1811 a domiciled Portuguese. In that year he became British consul at Oporto, where he remained till the year 1832, when he was removed, as British consul, to Corunna, in Spain. Some stress was laid in argument on the fact of his having thus devoted himself to the British service as consul, but in my judgment it had no bearing on the question of his domicil. Residence in a foreign country as a public officer gives rise to no inference of a domicil in that country. But if already there domiciled and resident, the acceptance of an office in the public service of another country does nothing to destroy the domicil. In the year 1843, being of advanced age, John Crispin determined to retire from the consular service, and came over to this country apparently for the purpose of doing so. On the 10th of June, 1843, he wrote a letter to the Foreign Office, in which he said, "I have served my country since the year 1792," and that he wished to retire with a pension. The pension was allotted to him, and he took up his residence at Richmond, in Surrey, where he lived from that time down to 1846, when he died. It should be stated that his wife, who had died just forty years before, was an Englishwoman, of the name of Hare, and that her mother and sister had, from the beginning of the century, lived at Richmond. It should be further stated that, from his earliest years, John Crispin had apparently no connexion with the business at Faro, nor was he shewn to have been resident there. On the contrary he was, soon after his coming of age, shewn to have been in Lisbon, assisting in the consular office; and it must be further borne in mind that whatever mercantile pursuits engaged his attention in Lisbon during the years which preceded his consular appointment in 1811, from that date he wholly ceased, in obedience to the rules of the consular service, to take any part in mercantile affairs. In this state of things there existed, in 1843, few ties with Portugal to be broken. He was bound to that country neither by ties of family, residence or business association; and the fair presumption from his conduct in 1843, when he claimed his pension, retired from active life, and took up his residence in this country, is, in my judgment, that he meant from that time to make England his home. In 1843 John Crispin became, I think, a domiciled Englishman. The question then arises, what effect had this change of domicil upon the domicil of his lunatic son? It seems to have been considered as tolerably free from doubt that the domicil of a minor follows that of his father, and the better opinion seems to be that, after the father's death, even the mother may, by changing her domicil, affect the domicil of her minor children. I can find no authority which defines the effect of a change of domicil in the father upon a lunatic son. It would probably depend upon circumstances. If a man had grown up, married and established himself in business in the country of his original domicil, and had afterwards become lunatic, and in that state had been taken charge of by his father, the emigration of his father to a foreign country, with the view of becoming domiciled there, taking his son with him, might fail to work a change in the domicil of that son. It is not difficult to conceive cases in which great injustice might be done to the interests of others if the general proposition were admitted, that the custody of a lunatic necessarily carried with it the power of changing his domicil at will. But the hypothesis under which I am now considering the circumstances of the present case is free from the necessity of asserting any such general proposition. For I am assuming that George Crispin was of unsound mind throughout his majority: in other words, that there never was a period during which he could think and act for himself in the matter of domicil otherwise than as a minor could. And if this be so, it would seem to me that the same reasoning which attaches the domicil of the son to that of his father while a minor, would continue to bring about the same result after the son had attained his majority, if he was continually of unsound mind. The son in this case continued under the control of his father, was presumably supported by him, and, if he had not already been in England when his father returned hither in 1843, would, it may reasonably be presumed, have been brought with him. At no period could he, according to that hypothesis, have acted for himself in choosing a domicil, and if his next-of-kin and those who had the control of his movements and life were not capable of changing his domicil, that domicil would, from the moment of his majority, become indelible. The better opinion, in my judgment, is, that the incapacity of minority never having in this case been followed by adult capacity, it continued to confer upon the father the right of choice in the matter of domicil for the son, and that in 1843, if not before, that right was exercised by the adoption of an English domicil for himself, which drew with it a similar domicil for his son.

I now proceed to examine the other alternative, namely, that there was a period of longer or shorter duration after George Crispin came of age, on the 11th of January, 1825, during which he was capable of selecting a domicil for himself. Did he do so? And, for that is the question, did he voluntarily adopt England as his home and domicil, with the intention of renouncing and abandoning the Portuguese domicil which his origin had conferred upon him? I was much struck with the argument that such a resolve ought to be indicated by some acts or words of a marked character, from which definite intentions of a permanent nature might be safely collected. But, while admitting this as a general proposition, it is, I think, sufficiently obvious that the mode in which a man may be expected to evidence his intentions on such a subject must vary indefinitely with the age, character, circumstances and general conduct of the individual. In canvassing the words and actions of a youth just emerging from minority, and still wholly dependent on his father, one would not expect the intention, if it existed, of making England his home to be evidenced by such acts as would be likely to attend the resolve of a matured man of business. Nor would it be reasonable to look for conduct such as might be evinced by a healthy, energetic youth in the full use of his faculties, in one who was neither healthy nor energetic, and whose mental faculties were weak, if not yet unsound. I am far from saying that this last condition dispenses with the proof of the intention in question, or that the existence of the intention in all its fullness and completeness must not be arrived at by the Court before a change of domicil can be declared. But I am speaking of the media of proof, and I hold it to be unreasonable to require any further proof to this end than the individual, such as he really was, might fairly be expected to have furnished in the circumstances in which he was placed—if he had, in fact, really and truly entertained the intention of which we are in quest. What, then, was George Crispin, what his previous life, and what his conduct after he came of age and before he became imbecile? The date when he was sent to England is not in evidence. But in 1814, when he was ten years old, he is spoken of as living at a school at Twickenham and spoken of as having been there some time. Here George Crispin remained until 1820 or 1821, spending his holidays with his mother's sister, Miss Hare, who lived at Richmond. With this aunt he continued to reside until 1823 or 1824, when his father took him over from England to Oporto, with the view, apparently, of bringing him up in the consular office. The day of his majority found him still residing with his father, where he remained till 1826 or 1827, when he returned to his aunt in England. It is to be gathered from the evidence that he was not able to render his father the assistance he expected. There is no proof of the exact circumstances which attended his return. But there is strong evidence in the testimony of Mr. Mark Comburgh, the French master of the school where he had been educated, of his feelings and desires while resident in Portugal, and of the light in which he contemplated his return to this country. His letters to this gentleman during his stay in Portugal were "desponding," expressed a "dislike to be there"; he thought "the climate did not agree with him"; he said "he was always subject to head-ache"; and, in his last letter he said, "I hope I shall return to England very shortly." He further said, that what kept him in Portugal was his father's wishes, and that he disliked his stay in Portugal very much. Upon his return to England this same gentleman had several conversations with him, in which he expressed a similar dislike to the country, the people and their habits. Another witness, Mr. Chapman, says he came to London with George Crispin and his father when they were about to start for Portugal. He describes him as "very loth indeed to go."—"I think he felt he must go as a matter of duty to his father." This same gentleman saw him on his return, when he said that he did not like Portugal; "that the habits of the people were so different from what he had been accustomed to in England; that it was so very distasteful to him." It is reasonable, I think, to infer from these statements that this young man, who had been entirely brought up in England with his aunt, was attached to this country; and that, as soon as his father permitted it, he put an end to his enforced residence in Portugal, returning to England as his home. True, he took no steps to establish himself in business in this country. It is true also that he did no act, beyond that of his eager return hither, to sever the ties which bound him to Portugal as his original domicil. But those ties were of the slightest. Except in the eye of the law, they had no existence. His language, his nurture, his habits, the family of his mother, and, by extraction, the family of his father, were all English. His actual relations with Portugal were those of an enforced and temporary residence, distasteful in the outset, repellant throughout, and escaped from with alacrity. The evidence that a man desires to resign his domicil of origin ought to be cogent in proportion to the probability of such a desire. And the converse is true, that if the probability is great, far less evidence may suffice. On the whole, I do not hesitate to conclude that, had this young man been asked, on his return to England, whether he desired to make England in future his home and surrender all connexion with Portugal, he would have answered in the affirmative. And if that was his true state of mind, did he not evidence his intention in the only way in which he could be expected to do it? As for setting up in business or establishing an independent home for himself in this country, he had not the capacity or the means for either. He did the only thing which, in his condition and circumstances, he could do,—continued to reside with his aunt and be maintained, it is presumed, by his father. And if the means of determining his true state of mind by marked and definite acts were less ample than might have been desired, the conclusion to be drawn from all that he really said and did is not, in my judgment, the less certain. Assuming, then, that George Crispin was of sufficient capacity after he came of age to select a domicil for himself, I am of opinion that he did so, and that the domicil he selected was English, which he retained till he died. The issue taken upon the Portuguese domicil must therefore he found in favour of the plaintiffs, and I think with costs.

DEATH DUTIES.—In granting probate or letters of administration the Court is not restricted to the oath of the applicant as to the value of the property, but may receive the oath of any competent person to that fact.

Where, therefore, the property was sworn below its value by the executor who was abroad, the Court allowed a fresh affidavit, in which the true value of the property was stated, and the mistake in the executor's oath explained, to be sworn and filed by his agent in this country, and probate to go accordingly.

Damasco Francisco de Angulo y Urruela died domiciled at and resident in Guatemala, Central America, on the 13th of June, 1866, leaving a will and codicil, in which he appointed Rafael Jose Angulo y Urruela executor. As he left considerable property in this country, an official copy of the will and codicil, duly certified, was forwarded to England, together with the usual affidavits, which were prepared here, and sworn by the executor in Guatemala. In these affidavits the property belonging to the deceased in this country was stated to be under the value of 32,000*l.*; but it was subsequently discovered that this was a mistake, and that the amount ought to be taken at 40,000*l.* The agent of the executor offered to make an affidavit as to the full value of the estate, and to pay the proper duty and fees, but the registrar refused to allow the grant to be made on a stamp larger than sufficient to cover the amount under which the effects had been sworn by the executor.

C. A. Middleton now moved the Court to allow the grant to be stamped on the affidavit of the agent as to the true amount, so as to cover the whole value of the property, and referred to sections 38. and 41. of 55 Geo. 3. c. 184.

Sir J. P. Wilde.—The mistake that has happened is easily explained. The affidavit as to the amount of the estate is made at the other side of the globe, and when the matter comes to be investigated here, it turns out that the property is larger than expected. It appears natural that the mistake should be corrected, and unless there is anything in the act of parliament to prevent it, the Court would be desirous to allow the correction to be made. Is there anything in the act of parliament to prevent it? I think not. The act (55 Geo. 3. c. 184. s. 38.) says, "No Ecclesiastical Court or person shall grant probate of the will or letters of administration of the estate and effects of any person deceased, without first requiring and receiving from the person or persons applying for the probate or letters of administration, or from some other competent person or persons, an affidavit, or solemn affirmation in the case of Quakers, that the estate and effects of the deceased for or in respect of which the probate or letters of administration is or are to be granted, &c., are under the value of a certain sum to be therein specified, to the best of the deponent's or affirmant's knowledge, information, and belief; in order that the proper and full stamp-duty may be paid on such letters of administration; which affidavit or affirmation shall be made before the surrogate, or other person who shall administer the usual oath for the due administration of the estate and effects of the deceased." It is plain from that section that the Court is not restricted to the affidavit of the person applying for the grant, the executor or his attorney, but that it may take the affidavit of any "other competent person." It seems to me, therefore, that the estate being larger than was expected, upon a proper affidavit being filed of that fact, and explaining how the mistake in the executor's oath has arisen, this application should be granted. It might have been surmised that the proper mode of rectifying such an error was to apply to the stamp office under the subsequent section (41), but on looking to the terms of that section I think it will appear that that would not be the proper course. The section says, "Where any person, on applying for the probate of a will or letters of administration, shall have estimated the estate and effects of the deceased to be of less value than the same shall afterwards be proved to be, and shall in consequence have paid too little stamp-duty thereon, it shall be lawful for the said Commissioners of Stamps, on delivery to them of an affidavit or solemn affirmation of the value of the estate and effects of the deceased, to cause the probate or letters of administration to be duly stamped, on payment of the full duty which ought to have been originally paid thereon in respect of such value," &c. It is plain from the language of that section that the stamp office is only intended to interfere where the mistake has been discovered after the grant has been made, and where the person applying for it has estimated the property below its value and paid too little stamp-duty. Here the mistake was discovered before the grant was made, and I think the course proposed is the right one.

Motion allowed.

Restitution of Conjugal Rights—Cruelty charged by Wife—Wilful Communication of Disease—Onus Probandi—Absence of Actual Proof—Medical Testimony—New Trial—Costs.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—To the husband's petition for restitution of conjugal rights the wife pleaded cruelty, viz., the wilful communication of an infectious disease. The husband denied the charge, and on examination by medical men no trace of disease could be found upon him:—Held, by the full Court (Willes, J. dissentiente), first, that it devolved upon the respondent to establish affirmatively that the petitioner, having the disease himself, knew, either from medical advice or from the obvious character of the symptoms, that he had a disease, that it was an infectious disease, and that it existed in such a stage and form that connexion with his wife was at least distinctly dangerous; secondly, that in the absence of actual proof of the existence of disease in the petitioner, it was incumbent on the respondent, in the medical evidence adduced in support of her charge, to lay the foundation for a scientific conclusion which should take the place of such proof, and from which the jury could argue with reason, first, to the charge of knowledge, and through that to the charge of wilfulness; and thirdly, that the verdict of the jury having, in absence of such actual or scientific proof, been for the respondent, the petitioner was entitled to a new trial, the respondent's costs in the previous trial being first paid by him.

This was the husband's petition for restitution of conjugal rights.

The wife in her answer pleaded adultery and cruelty; the proof relied upon of both charges being the communication of an infectious disease. The petitioner denied the charges.

The facts were these:

The parties, who were both young, were married on the 9th of June, 1866, and the cohabitation ceased in the following September. In January, 1867, the husband filed his petition for restitution.

In February, 1867, the wife was found to be affected with secondary syphilis, and in March she was prematurely delivered of a child, which was also marked with the disease. Upon this she filed her answer, charging adultery and cruelty, and immediately afterwards the husband submitted himself to examination by medical men.

On the trial, which took place in the Sittings after Trinity Term, before the Judge Ordinary, by a special jury, the petitioner swore that he never had been diseased. The medical men by whom he was examined swore that they could find no trace of disease on him; and further gave their opinion that if he had been diseased in the previous autumn there must have been some trace left.

On the other hand, the respondent, the wife, swore that the first intimation she ever had of being infected was in February. She further swore that she had not been unchaste before marriage or unfaithful after it; and in the course of the inquiry counsel for the petitioner stated that no such imputation was made against her. Several medical men were also examined on her behalf, but their evidence left it uncertain as to the form in which the person who infected her must himself have been suffering at the time.

The jury found for the petitioner on the issue of adultery, and for the respondent on the issue of cruelty.

* Before the full Court, the Judge Ordinary, Willes, J. (whose judgment was read by Brett, J.) and Cleasby, B.

Cur. adv. vult.

The JUDGE ORDINARY (Jan. 20).—The parties in this case were married on the 9th of June, 1866. They lived together only a few months. At the end of that time the respondent refused to live with her husband any longer. The ground of her refusal was his unkind and cruel conduct. This was investigated at the trial, but nothing like legal cruelty was proved. In the month of January, 1867, the husband filed a petition in this case for a restitution of conjugal rights. In the month of February, 1867, the respondent was examined by a surgeon of eminence, who found her to be affected with certain tubercles and other symptoms, which indicated to him that she was suffering from secondary syphilis, which, in his opinion, she had suffered from on some previous occasion. This, the respondent said, was the first intimation she ever had of being thus affected. In the next month a child was born similarly affected, and the existence of this disease was beyond question. Upon this she filed her answer to her husband's petition, and charged him with having wilfully infected her. He denied it, and submitted himself immediately to examination by medical men, who swore that there was no trace of such a disease, and further gave their opinion that, if he had been diseased in the previous autumn, there must have been some such trace left. On the other hand, the respondent swore that she had not been unchaste before marriage or unfaithful after it. No proof was given, beyond this denial, on the part of the wife to establish the fact of the husband having been the cause of the infection. It was, indeed, sworn by her, though denied by him, that during the cohabitation, when she consulted him about a discharge from which she suffered, he advised her not to mention it to her mother. But the medical man who attended her within a month of her marriage proved that the discharge she suffered from was probably of an innocent character, at any rate it had no connexion with syphilis, and her own admissions made it probable that it was due to nothing but an innocent complaint from which she had suffered before marriage. In this state of things the jury, with nothing to guide them but the oaths and demeanour of the parties themselves, decided, as might be expected, in favour of the wife, and arrived at the conclusion that the disease proceeded from the husband. But the mere fact that the husband has communicated disease to his wife, whatever may be thought of it in other points of view, is not sufficient to constitute legal cruelty. It is abundantly clear that, for this purpose, the act must be a wilful one; and, according to the judgment of Dr. Lushington in Collett v. Collett (1 Curt. 679), the proof of it "requires very strong and conclusive evidence." The very important question, therefore, arises, whether in the mere fact that the wife was diseased, any evidence is to be found to sustain the proposition, not only that the husband infected her, but that he did so knowingly and wilfully. It devolved upon the respondent to establish affirmatively that the petitioner, having the disease himself, knew, either from medical advice of from the obvious character of the symptoms, that he had a disease, that it was an infectious disease, and that it existed in such a stage and form that connexion with his wife was at least distinctly dangerous. The great difficulty attending the establishment of these propositions in this case was this, that no proof appears to have existed of the actual fact of disease in the petitioner at all; and consequently, none of the form in which it presented itself. On the other hand, the presumption that the petitioner had the disease, which was drawn from the respondent's oath that she had not been herself unchaste, did not carry with it any further presumption as to the form in which the petitioner had it, or the symptoms by which it was attended at the time when he is supposed to have communicated the infection. Now, it is obvious that in such an inquiry as the present, it is all-important to know what the signs of the disease were at that time. Were they such as to give warning, or at any rate arouse suspicion and excite vigilance and inquiry? Were they such that any man might be expected to notice them and suspect their true nature? If knowledge is charged and the proof of it is to be drawn from the fact that the disease existed, it is material to know whether the disease existed in such a form as to carry with it a knowledge of its existence and an appreciation of its nature and incidents. In many, if not most cases of venereal disease, the general nature of the malady is hardly doubtful. I allude to those cases in which the organs of generation are palpably affected. But when the disease exhibits itself in other parts of the body only, as was proved to be the case with secondary syphilis, and the symptoms are those of eruptions, sore-throat and the like,—easily disregarded with innocence, or as easily referred with innocence to other causes,—the case becomes widely different. Now it is just here that the evidence of fact wholly fails. There is an absolute dearth of proof that the petitioner was diseased at all, and consequently of all circumstances tending to shew its character or appearances. The next question is, whether the scientific evidence supplies this defect. I am quite unable to perceive that it does. Proof of this character ought, I conceive, to be tolerably uniform and cogent to the end it is designed to meet. It is far from it. There is no affirmative medical testimony from which it can be inferred whether the symptoms of the petitioner at the time of the supposed infection must have been those of primary, or might have been those of secondary syphilis; or, indeed, whether at that time he must have had any outward symptoms at all. If primary, it is probable on the evidence that the symptoms would be such as to challenge attention and reveal their true character. But if secondary, it was made clear by the evidence beyond question that they might escape observation altogether, or if noticed might be innocently referred to other causes than venereal disease. In a word, no definite conclusion was capable of being drawn from the evidence given at the trial through the medium of medical experience as to the form in which the person who infected the respondent must himself have been suffering at the time. When I say "must," I mean must within the limits of all reasonable probability, as inferred from past experience. It was, I think, absolutely incumbent upon the respondent, in the absence of actual proof on this head, to lay the foundation for a scientific conclusion which should take its place, and from which the jury could argue with reason, first, to the charge of knowledge, and through that to the charge of wilfulness. It was part, and the most essential part, of the burden of proof which her charge of cruelty cast upon her, and the defect in her proof leaves her case, in my judgment, unsupported by sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the jury. The rule for a new trial ought therefore, in my opinion, to be made absolute. But before the petitioner brings the case to trial again, I think he ought to pay his wife's costs of the first trial. The principle acted upon in this court is that the husband shall provide the wife with the means of defending herself, and as the finding of the jury exonerated the respondent from all misconduct, the petitioner ought not to enter upon further litigation until provision has been made for her costs of the past.

WILLES, J.—If the question in this case had retained the form in which it was dealt with at the trial, in the rule, and, as I understood, upon the argument, as one of fact depending only upon the weight of evidence, I might have restricted myself to expressing a strong reluctance against condemning the respondent, who is upon her defence, to the ordeal of a new trial in such a case, once fully investigated, laid before a jury and deliberately decided by them. Inasmuch, however, as the true question has, in the event, turned out to be one of law, viz., whether there was any sufficient evidence to go to the jury, and the majority of the Court are of opinion that there was not, their judgment, in which I do not concur, involves not merely a new inquiry, but practically a decision of the cause, and a conclusion, only to be deferred by the changes and chances of litigation—that the respondent must return to cohabit with the petitioner,—and it is therefore right that I should shortly state my reason for dissenting. Having carefully studied the shorthand-writer's notes of the trial, I find evidence of the following facts: The marriage took place in June. Soon after the wife suffered, amongst other things, from a discharge which, according to her evidence, was distinctly unlike any that she had experienced before. It was remarkable enough to induce her to complain of it to her husband, and he requested her not to tell her mother, as people would think that something was the matter with one or other of them. The husband left his wife in the beginning of September, and they did not again cohabit. During the cohabitation she had caught a foul disease, the precise nature of which was not suspected by her medical attendant before November, and was not discovered until her examination by a more experienced medical man, early in the following year. In the following March she was prematurely delivered of a child poisoned thereby. How did she contract the disease? Not by any misconduct of her own. No suggestion of that was made against her at the trial. The evidence was such that my Lord, in summing up, told the jury they would have "scouted" the notion if suggested. Had any such imputation been made, she might have ransacked her life for evidence to rebut it; and to be influenced by the hint of its possibility thrown out in argument, would be grave injustice. Could the disease then have been congenital? Of this there was no evidence, either as to the husband or wife; and, on the contrary, strong improbability, such as a jury were warranted in acting upon. It remains, as the jury concluded, that she caught it from her husband, and that he had at some time contracted the disease. But, in order to entitle her to object to a renewal of cohabitation, it was still to be shewn that he must have known of, or at least suspected his state, and disregarded the probable consequences to his wife. As to the proof of this, I conceive that, in the present state of the law, allowing the examination of the parties, explanation from the husband was properly called for at the trial; and, in the absence of any satisfactory explanation, the jury were justified in acting upon the evidence given by and for the wife. The case or cases in the Spiritual Courts which shew, or tend to shew, that a husband might disease his wife over and over and yet compel her to return, unless she could establish affirmatively that he not only was diseased and diseased her, but knew of his state when he did so, could only be tolerable under a system which exlcuded the evidence of the husband. Now that he can be heard, if he thinks proper, in explanation, those cases are only valuable as warnings. What, then, was the answer or explanation given by the husband? It consisted, in the main, of proof: first, that he was examined by medical men, who found no traces of disease at a period consistent with the fact of his having suffered from it during the cohabitation and recovered; and, secondly, of his own evidence contradicting that of the wife in several particulars, and positively denying that he ever had the disease. In this state of things I do not intend to pronounce an opinion upon the question of fact, which is not within my province; but I am satisfied that it was competent for the jury to believe, as they did, the statements of the wife, to conclude that the husband was the cause of the suffering; and that his denial of having ever suffered himself was untrue, and therefore unsatisfactory. A man who commits an act prima facie injurious to another, which may or may not be morally wrong, according to the mind with which it was committed, and who, having the opportunity of explanation, offers none beyond a flat contradiction, exposes himself, when the fact is established by competent proof, to the inference that his lying denial was the result of conscious wrong. Whether that inference be a just one under the circumstances is a question for a jury. I do not understand how it can be held otherwise than relevant and important without also holding that there was nothing in the wife's evidence which the husband ought to have been called upon to answer. In the result, I think there was evidence upon which the jury might properly conclude: first, that the disease was communicated to the wife by the husband, under circumstances calling upon him for an explanation; and secondly, that the explanation attempted was untrue and ought to be rejected; except, indeed, so far as the assertion of a falsehood gives rise to the inference of guilty motives for keeping back the truth. Upon these grounds I am of opinion that the rule for a new trial ought to be discharged.

CLEASBY, B., concurred in the judgment of the Judge Ordinary.

Rule absolute for a new trial; respondent's costs of previous trial to be first paid by petitioner.

MATRIMONIAL. Jan. 19, 1869.

PATCH v. PATCH.

Alimony Pendente Lite—Wife charged with leading an Abandoned Life—Conflicting Affidavits—Refusal to rescind Order.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—The Court refused to rescind an order for alimony pendente lite on an allegation, supported by affidavits, that the wife was maintaining herself by prostitution; the wife in her affidavit denying the truth of the allegation, and the charge of prostitution being the main question in the suit.

Alimony pendente lite was allotted to the wife, the respondent in the suit, on the 8th of December, 1868, but the order was suspended until the next motion-day, to enable the petitioner to file affidavits in proof of an allegation that she was supporting herself by prostitution. No affidavits having been filed, the order was drawn in the usual manner.

Littler, for the petitioner, now moved the Court to rescind the order, on the ground that the respondent was supporting herself by prostitution. He relied on three affidavits: two by policemen, who deposed that the house in which the respondent lived was a noted brothel, and the third by a confessed prostitute, who stated that she was a lodger in the house, and that the respondent was the mistress of it.

Inderwick, for the respondent, contra.—The adultery charged in the petition is prostitution, and the Court will not decide the main question in the suit on the motion now before it. Further, the respondent, while admitting that she keeps lodgers, denies in her affidavit that her house is a brothel or that she is leading an abandoned life.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—I cannot interfere with the order that has been made for the payment of the alimony. To do so would be to decide incidentally and upon affidavits the main question in the suit, which will ultimately have to be tried in a very different way, and it may be with a different result. If the Court saw its way clearly to the conclusion that the wife was leading the life she is represented, it would be disposed to relieve the husband from the obligation of paying alimony. But here it is a matter of contest and oath against oath. The wife pledges her oath that there is no truth in the allegation that she is leading a life of prostitution, and she is open to a prosecution for perjury if she has sworn falsely. I cannot act upon the affidavits.

Motion refused.

In the goods of JOHN HUTLEY.

Citation to bring in Probate—Affidavit to Lead—Applicant (Next-of-Kin) Abroad—Estate in course of Administration in Chancery—Agent—Practice.

WILL.—The Court allowed a citation to executors to bring in the probate to issue on the affidavit of the agent of the party citant (the next-of-kin), who was in Australia; the property being distributed by the Court of Chancery in due course of administration, which could not be stayed until proceedings were instituted in the Court of Probate for revocation of the probate, and the agent of the party citant being in a position to make the necessary averments to lead the citation.

John Hutley, late of Maida Vale and Blooomsbury, in the county of Middlesex, provision-merchant, died in August, 1866, possessed of large personal and real estate, and leaving a will, dated the 9th of December, 1865, in which he appointed Susan Grimston, his sister (who pre-deceased him), Frances Maria Hutley, Percival Turner and Michael Gunston, executors. Probate in common form was granted to the executors in September, 1866. In January, 1867, the probate was called in on the citation of Stephen Hutley, the natural and lawful brother and heir-at-law of the deceased. The executors propounded the will in a declaration, to which the defendant pleaded; and the suit proceeded.

At the trial, which took place, before Sir J. P. Wilde, by a special jury, on the 27th of July, 1867, a compromise was arranged between the parties; and the Court pronounced for the validity of the will.

The compromise entered into in the Court of Probate was confirmed by the Court of Chancery, in which a suit had been previously instituted for the administration of the estate pursuant to the trusts and provisions of the will, and large sums were subsequently paid out of the personal estate, which was sworn under 90,000*l.*, by orders of the Court, in due course of administration.

The deceased left surviving him John Grimston and Henry Grimston, his lawful nephews, and who, with Stephen Hutley, were the only next-of-kin and the only persons entitled in distribution in the event of his having died intestate. John Grimston died in August, 1868. Henry Grimston was in Australia at the time of the death of the deceased, and still resides there. He was not cited or made party to the suit by the executors, though described in the pleadings in the administration suit, in the Court of Chancery, as "then resident in Hobart Town, in the colony of Australia," and as "one of the persons entitled in distribution," and he had no knowledge of his uncle's death, or the suit in the Court of Probate in respect of his will, until October or November, 1868, when he received a communication from Mr. Edwin John Nunn, of Colchester. He at once forwarded a power of attorney authorizing Mr. Nunn to take all such steps as might be necessary for the protection of his interests; but before the administration of the estate could be stayed in the Court of Chancery, it was requisite that proceedings should be instituted in the Court of Probate to have the probate of the will called in and declared null and void.

Dr. Spinks (E. C. Clarkson with him) moved the Court, under these circumstances, to allow the citation to the executors to issue on the affidavit of Mr. Nunn, as agent for the applicant. As the property was in course of distribution, the delay of waiting for an affidavit from Tasmania would be very injurious, and Mr. Nunn was in a position to make all the necessary averments.

SIR J. P. WILDE said, that the affidavit of Mr. Nunn would answer all the purposes.

Motion allowed.

Testamentary Suit—Costs against Defendant as Executor and as Party—Defendant out of the Jurisdiction—Sequestration—Money in the Funds—Dividends—20 & 21 Vict. c. 77. s. 25—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

WILL.—The Court of Probate has, under the 25th section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, the like powers, jurisdiction and authority for enforcing its orders, decrees and judgments as are by law vested in the Court of Chancery, but the limit of this authority must be found in the powers exercised by the Court of Chancery prior to the passing of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. The Court of Probate does not possess the additional powers and authority indirectly conferred upon Courts of equity for the enforcing of their orders by that statute.

Where, therefore, large sums of stock stood in the books of the Bank of England in the name of an unsuccessful defendant in a testamentary suit, who admitted that he held the stock as executor and trustee for the original defendant, and who was condemned in the costs of the suit as executor and party, the Court refused to give effect to a writ of sequestration for payment of the costs by granting an order on the Bank of England to pay into Court the dividends on the stock in question, an adverse order never having hitherto been made by a Court of equity on a third party to pay over to a creditor money which he owes to the debtor.

This was originally a cause of interest, in which a decree had been given (June 2, 1863) against Maria Doglioni, the original defendant, with costs.

An appeal was prosecuted to the House of Lords by Madame Doglioni, and on her death by the defendant as her executor, but the appeal was dismissed (July 31, 1866) with costs, and the cause remitted back to the Court of Probate.

Orders for payment of the taxed costs in the suit and balance of the taxed costs on the appeal (3,605*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.* and 744*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*) were made by the Court on the defendant as executor of Madame Doglioni.

The defendant was out of the jurisdiction, and on the 22nd of December, 1868, a writ of sequestration issued against the estate.

The defendant was not possessed of any real estate in this country, but two large sums of money (99,424*l.* and 75,442*l.*) were standing in his name in the books of the Bank of England.

In August, 1859, an injunction issued from the Court of Chancery to restrain the transfer of these funds, but it did not restrain the payment of the dividends, which continued to be received by the defendant. The injunction was still in force. Moreover, the Bank received notice through his solicitor, on the 8th of January, 1869, that he held the stock in question as executor and trustee for Maria Doglioni. He also commenced an action for payment of the last half-yearly dividend on the sum of 75,442*l.*, and further gave notice of his intention to claim a writ of injunction to restrain the Bank from paying the dividends to any one else.

The defendant was one of the residuary legatees named in Madame Doglioni's will as well as her executor.

Dr. Deane (with him Mander), for the sequestrators, moved the Court (Feb. 2) for an order on the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to pay into Court to the credit of the cause the sum of 1,103*l.*, being the amount of one half-year's dividend now in their hands, due in respect of the sum of 75,442*l.*, and also until further order all future dividends accruing in respect of both sums standing in the name of Cumano.—It is immaterial whether Cumano receives the dividends in his own right or as executor, and there is no dispute as to his liability or the amount of the debt. Under section 25. of the Probate Act the Court has the like "power, jurisdiction and authority" as the Court of Chancery for enforcing its orders, decrees and judgments. In Dent v. Dent (36 L. J. Pr. & M. 61; L. R. 1 Pr. & D. 366) the Court enforced its order by writ of sequestration. Choses in action, which dividends on Bank stock are, are liable to sequestration, and the Court of Chancery will order a chose in action in the hands of a third person to be paid into Court when the person in whose hands it is is willing to abide by the order of the Court, or admits it belongs to the party against whom the sequestration has issued. The only case in which a third party can refuse is where he bona fide denies the debt.

Digitized by Google

Dr. Spinks (with him Cecil Russell), for the defendant.—No such application as that now made to the Court would be entertained by the Court of Chancery on motion. It should be for permission to bring an action, and not to proceed by summary process, from which there can be no appeal. Further, supposing the Court to have the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, there is no case to support the proposition that the Court of Chancery would attach a chose in action in the hands of a third person; and, moreover, the Court has no power to restrain the defendant from prosecuting the action which he has brought against the Bank for payment of the dividends.

Watkin Williams (with him Kekewich), for the Bank of England.—The Bank is neutral in the matter, it neither assents nor objects to the order; but it is legally liable to Cumano, and if it should turn out that the Court has not jurisdiction the order would be no defence to an action by him.

The following cases were cited in argument:—Dent v. Dent (36 L. J. Pr. & M. 61; L. R. 1 Pr. & D. 366); Pratt v. Bull (4 Giff. 117; 32 L. J. Ch. 21); Wilson v. Metcalfe (1 Beav. 269); Knight v. Knight (4 W. R. 771); M'Carthy v. Gould (1 B. & B. 387); Johnson v. Chippendall (2 Sim. 55); Dundas v. Dutens (1 Ves. jun. 196); Barrett v. M'Cullagh (5 W. R. 38); Daniel's Chanc. Prac. 948

Cur. adv. vult.

SIR J. P. WILDE (Feb. 16).—The statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, by which the Court of Probate was created, provides, in section 25, "That the Court shall have the like powers, jurisdiction and authority for enforcing all orders, decrees and judgments made and given by the Court as are by law vested in the High Court of Chancery." On the 2nd of June, 1863, this Court made a decree condemning Madame Doglioni, the unsuccessful defendant in a testamentary suit, in the costs of the plaintiff. For the enforcement of this decree the Court, on the 29th of January, 1867, made an order upon Justine Cumano, who was the executor of Madame Doglioni and who had become a party to the suit in her place, for the payment of the amount of costs as taxed. The defendant Cumano is out of the jurisdiction, and the order cannot be enforced by attachment. There is, however, a very large sum of stock standing in his name in the books of the Bank of England, upon which the last accruing dividends are now in the hands of the Bank. It appears on affidavit that this stock is in fact held by Cumano as executor of Madame Doglioni, the original defendant in the suit. It seems therefore extremely just and reasonable that the dividends above mentioned should be made available in satisfaction of the costs of that suit. Now, if the order in question had been made by a Court of equity instead of the Court of Probate, the provisions of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. would immediately have been applicable to it. The order would have had the force of a judgment at common law, and the funds in question would have been available in satisfaction of the decree; and this, not by reason of the original authority of the Courts of equity, but of the additional powers and authority indirectly conferred upon these Courts for the enforcing of their orders by the statute of Victoria. No doubt this statute did not prescribe any additional or new action on the part of the Courts of equity themselves. All that they had to do was what they had done before. But it can hardly be denied that by attaching to these orders when made new legal incidents and effects of a much larger character than they had previously enjoyed, the power and authority of the Courts for the enforcement of their orders was greatly and beneficially widened and extended. It is immaterial to this end whether a Court is empowered to make orders of a more extensive character and incidence than heretofore, or whether a more extensive character and operation is, by the act of the law, given to the orders already in use. The wider and more searching the legal effect and practical scope of any order made to enforce a decree upon the person or property of him against whom it is issued, the greater the power and authority for the enforcement of that decree possessed by the Court that issues it. I should therefore have thought that when the legislature declared its intention that the Court of Probate should have the like powers and authority as the Courts of equity for the enforcing of its decrees and orders, it designed to include therein the power of making orders which should be of the like efficacy, attended with the same incidents, and followed by the same legal results as those of the Courts whose powers and authority formed the standard to which it was to be assimilated; and this design, I should have thought, might have been well conveyed in the very general language employed in section 25. of the statute, notwithstanding that by a very close adherence to the precise terms employed it was quite possible to infer a distinction between the power of the Court in making an order and the legal consequences of that order when made. These views, however, must now be taken as incorrect, for the matter has now received judicial consideration and decision in the Court of Chancery. The case of Pratt v. Bull (4 Giff. 117; 32 L. J. Ch. 21) is a direct authority, as it seems to me, upon the point; and the decision of the very eminent Judge by whom that case was determined must be held decisive.

There is, therefore, no other way in which the order here in question can be enforced except by a writ of fieri facias or a writ of sequestration. A writ of fieri facias inapplicable, and a writ of sequestration has issued. The sequestrators now apply by motion for an order upon the Bank of England to pay into Court the dividend in their hands. This order is opposed by Cumano. The Bank of England appeared by their counsel, on the hearing of the motion, and neither assented nor objected to such an order being made. In these circumstances, the question is whether the Court has power to make the order. It will not be right, even in the furtherance of justice, to assume a power which the Court does not possess; and the limits of the powers which it does possess must be found in the powers hitherto exercised by the Courts of equity in this direction. The only semblance of a direct authority produced in favour of the proposed order is the case of Wilson v. Metcalfe (1 Beav. 269). But in that case, the third person upon whom the order was asked to be made was a consenting party to it. The question therefore arises whether an adverse order has ever hitherto been made by a Court of equity on a third person to pay over to a creditor money which he owes to the debtor. I cannot find that it has, and I must, therefore, with much reluctance, refuse to make such an order. It is hardly within the province of this Court to suggest the remedy, if any, which the party applicant has for the inefficiency of this Court to work out his rights. It may be that the Courts of equity may be able to assist him in the suit now depending in reference to the stock in question; or it may be that the Bank of England, by bill of interpleader, may be able and willing to give some jurisdiction to the Court of equity under which justice may be done. It is enough for this Court to say that, as the case now stands, on the decided cases, it can give the parties no further help towards obtaining the money to which they are justly entitled.

In the goods of ANDREW RUSSELL.

Will—Executor renounced—Attorney for other Executors—Practice—Rules and Orders, 1862—Rule 50.—20 & 21 Vict. c. 77. s. 79.

WILL.—An executor, having renounced in Australia, was appointed by the executors, who proved the will in the colony, their agent to obtain letters of administration with will annexed in this country:—The Court held that rule 50. of Rules and Orders, 1862, did not apply to such a case, and made the grant to him as attorney, but required that he should file a fresh and definite renunciation, which beyond all question should strip him of the character of executor and bring him within the operation of the 79th section of the Probate Act.

Andrew Russell died domiciled in Australia, leaving a will and two codicils, in which he appointed Peter Inglis, William Taylor, Archibald Fiskin, Donald Larnach, and David Moore his executors.

On the renunciation of Inglis, Moore and Larnach, probate of the will and codicils was granted to Taylor and Fiskin by the Supreme Court of the Colony of Victoria. Exemplified copies of the instruments were forwarded by them to Larnach, who was resident in London, with a power of attorney authorizing him to take out administration in this country on their behalf.

C. A. Middleton moved the Court accordingly for letters of administration (with the will and codicils annexed) to Larnach as attorney for the executors.—By rule 50. (Rules and Orders, Principal Registry, 1862) "No one, who renounces probate of a will or letters of administration of the personal estate and effects of a deceased person in one character, is to be allowed to take a representation to the same deceased in another character." But the character there referred to is a character derivable from the deceased either by relationship or interest. Here the right of the applicant is derived not through the deceased, but the executors. Further, by section 79. of the Probate Act, 1857, in case of renunciation by an executor the rights of such person in respect of the executorship shall wholly cease, and the grant of probate or administration shall go as if such person had not been appointed executor. If the renunciation abroad be not sufficient, a fresh renunciation will be filed by the applicant.

SIR J. P. WILDE.—I think the application ought to be granted. I can conceive no reasonable object to be attained in forbidding a man appointed executor by a testator from saying, "I will have nothing to do with the estate as executor. I do not wish to be burdened with the responsibility, and I withdraw from the position in which the testator has offered to place me," and not allowing such a man to act when requested as attorney for somebody else who is entitled to the probate or administration. The good sense and obvious reason of the thing is therefore in favour of the application; whether it conflicts with rule 50. is another matter. I think it does not. I think the meaning of the rule is what is suggested, that is, where a man under a will, or in case of an intestacy, occupies with reference to the testator or deceased two different characters, in either of which he might ask for administration, he is not to be at liberty to select the character in which he will take the grant, but that he must take it in that character (always the largest one) in which, according to the ordinary practice of the Court, he would be entitled to the administration. I think that is the sense and meaning of the rule, and, if so, it in no way interferes with the decision at which the Court has arrived. There must, however, be a fresh and definite renunciation which beyond all question should strip Larnach of the character of executor, and bring him within the operation of the 79th section.

Will—Codicil—Revocation—Probate of Will and Codicil.

WILL.—J. H. by his will, appointed A. and B. trustees, executors and guardians of his three minor children. He subsequently executed two codicils. By the first he revoked all the dispositions in favour of his son, and in all other respects confirmed his will. By the second he absolutely revoked and made void all bequests and dispositions in his will, and bequeathed all his property to C, his housekeeper, whom, with D. and E, he also appointed executors:—

The Court granted probate of the three papers to C. and E, power being reserved to A. and B, the executors named in the will, to come in if entitled and prove.

John Howard, late of Staley, in the county of Chester, cotton-spinner, died, leaving a will and two codicils, all duly executed. By his will be gave and devised all his real and the residue of his personal estate to Samuel Cocker and William Sunderland, in trust for his three children, whom he named, and he also appointed them his executors and guardians of his three minor children. By the first codicil, dated the 23rd of July, 1863, he revoked and made void all the devises, bequests and dispositions in his will in favour of his son, Harry Edward Howard, and directed that his trustees should stand seised and possessed of the share intended for his said son in trust for his other two children, and in all other respects confirmed his said will.

The second codicil, which was executed on the 23rd of July, 1868, was as follows:

"This is a second codicil to the last will and testament of me, &c. I absolutely revoke and make void all bequests and dispositions in my said will, and I bequeath all my property to my housekeeper, Margaret Wright, and appoint Mr. Henry Heap one of my executors, Robert Heap another of my executors, and Margaret Wright aforesaid my executrix."

Bayford moved for probate of the three papers to Robert Heap and Margaret Wright.

SIR J. P. WILDE.—So long as anything in the will is left the codicil does not revoke it absolutely. It is clear to my mind that the probate ought to be of the three papers as prayed, power being reserved to the executors named in the will, if entitled, to come in and prove.

Alimony pendente Lite—Respondent cohabiting with and supported by Co-Respondent.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—The respondent in a matrimonial suit cohabited with and was supported by the co-respondent for some time after the filing of the petition and the service of the citation. In allotting alimony pendente lite, the Court ordered that the alimony should run from the date at which the respondent ceased to cohabit with the co-respondent, instead of from the service of the citation.

The wife, the respondent in the suit, having filed a petition for alimony pendente lite, the husband in his answer, after setting out his faculties, alleged that at the time of the filing of the petition and the service of the citation (February, 1868), and from that time up to the 21st of August, 1868, the respondent lived with the co-respondent as his wife, and was supported by him. Affidavits were filed in support of this allegation.

Searle, for the petitioner, submitted that the alimony ought to run from the 21st of August, 1868, instead of from the service of the citation, as up to that date the respondent required no alimony.

[The JUDGE ORDINARY intimated that a prima facie case having been made out the respondent might have time to answer the affidavits if she applied for it.]

Dr. Swabey (with him Thomas), for the respondent, did not apply for time to answer.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—It is proved that the respondent was living as the wife of the co-respondent up to the 21st of August, 1868, and the Court assumes that she was supported by him during their cohabitation. I think the husband ought not to be called on to pay alimony for the time during which the wife had other means of support. It is immaterial, so far as this question is concerned, that the wife was living in adultery. The ground upon which the Court proceeds is, that she was living in such a manner that she had means of support independent of her husband. Taking the income at 500*l*., I allot alimony pendente lite, at the rate of 100*l*. per annum, to commence from the 21st of August, 1868.

Judicial Separation—Wife Petitioner—Adultery—Order to attend at the Hearing—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. s. 43.—Practice.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—The Court ordered the petitioner in a suit for judicial separation on the ground of adultery to attend at the hearing of the petition, and intimated that section 43. of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. was applicable to any petition.

This was the wife's suit for judicial separation by reason of the husband's adultery. The respondent pleaded connivance; and the Court had ordered that the petition should be heard before itself without a jury.

Dr. Deane, for the respondent, moved the Court to order the petitioner to attend at the hearing to be examined.

Pritchard, for the petitioner, contra.—The suit is for judicial separation by reason of adultery, and the parties are therefore inadmissible as witnesses. Moreover, section 43. of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, under which the Court makes such orders, only refers to suits for dissolution of marriage.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—The section is applicable to any petition, and in almost all cases the Court requires the petitioner to be here. It will not make an order that the petitioner attend for the purpose of examination, but that she shall be here when the petition comes on for hearing.

Order accordingly.

Dissolution of Marriage—Decree absolute—Time—29 & 30 Vict. c. 32. s. 3.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—The Court refused, in the absence of special circumstances, to exercise the discretionary power vested in it, and to fix a shorter period than that within which, according to the statute and the rules of the Court, the decree nisi in a suit for dissolution of marriage is to be made absolute.

This was the husband's petition for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent. Neither the respondent nor co-respondent appeared; the petition was heard before the Court itself, on Saturday, the 6th of February, and the Court granted a decree nisi. The adultery charged in the petition came to the knowledge of the petitioner, an officer in the Indian army, in 1865 or 1866, but it was alleged that ill-health and the exigencies of foreign service prevented him from sooner prosecuting his suit. He had also been separated for a number of years from the respondent because of a previous act of adultery of which she had been guilty.

Inderwick, for the petitioner, now moved the Court to exercise the discretionary power vested in it, and to fix a less period than six months within which the decree nisi might be made absolute. There was no right of appeal on the part of the respondent or co-respondent, they not having appeared and defended the suit; and if the period were not shortened, the decree could not be made absolute until after the long vacation—practically nine instead of six months from the decree nisi.

[The JUDGE ORDINARY.—Are there any special circumstances in the case?]

The petitioner is in a bad state of health; he suffers from the excitement of this litigation, and he is anxious that it should be brought to a close.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—He may set his mind at rest at once upon that point, but I fear I cannot grant this application. The period within which the decree is to be made absolute has been fixed by the statute and the rules of the Court; if I departed from it at all I should have to fix some other period applicable to all such cases, and I cannot see my way to that.

Application refused.

Dissolution of Marriage—Wife's Petition—Rights of Husband in Wife's Real Estate after Divorce—Annuity to Wife secured on her Property—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. s. 32.—Practice.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES. HUSBAND AND WIFE.—The wife during the coverture became entitled to a small estate of inheritance. On the dissolution of the marriage on her petition, by reason of the husband's adultery and cruelty, the Court ordered that he should pay to the wife an annuity to the amount of two-thirds of the rents, and secure such annuity on the property.

Quære—Does the husband's interest in the wife's freehold estates continue after the termination of the coverture by a dissolution of the marriage?

The wife, the petitioner in the suit, obtained a decree nisi for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of cruelty and adultery. During the coverture she became entitled to a small estate of inheritance, the rents of which, amounting of 45*l.* a year, the husband continued to receive.

Inderwick, in moving to make the decree absolute, asked the Court also to declare that the respondent's interest in the petitioner's property had ceased. In case of judicial separation, the wife's right in respect of property were defined by the Divorce Acts. In the case of divorce they were silent, the 31st section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. empowering the Court simply to declare the marriage dissolved; but, as in the case of judicial separation, it was enacted that the husband should have no right in the after-acquired property of the wife, it could not be supposed that the legislature intended that where the marriage was dissolved the husband should continue to enjoy the property which, while the marriage subsisted, he alone had jure mariti.

[The JUDGE ORDINARY.—The decision of this Court cannot bind the property in any way. If I were to pronounce one it would be a mere obiter dictum.]

Inderwick then asked for an order, under section 32. of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, settling the amount of the rents on the petitioner and securing it on the property.

Pritchard, for the respondent, objected to the order being drawn in such form, on the ground of the difficulty which it would throw in the way of his dealing with the property, supposing he continued still entitled to it.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—If the property is the wife's, the Court ought not by its order to deprive her of it, or to prevent her in any way from asserting her right to it. The order I shall make will be upon the contrary assumption; namely, that the property, so far as the life interest is concerned, belongs to the husband; and that being so, I shall order that he pay to the wife 30*l.* annually, to be secured on the property, and to cease if at any time she should recover the property from him. The order will express that the wife's rights to the property, whatever they are, are reserved, and that in the event of her becoming possessed of them as a feme sole, the order shall cease.

Nullity of Marriage—Order for Inspection of Person—Refusal—Attachment —Practice.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—In a suit for nullity of marriage by reason of malformation the respondent refused to comply with the order for inspection. The Court declined to issue an attachment against her until after the hearing, but intimated that the attachment would issue forthwith if she attempted to remove out of the jurisdiction.

This was a suit for nullity of marriage by reason of the malformation of the respondent.

On the 16th of June, 1868, the Judge Ordinary made the usual order for the appointment of inspectors to examine the person of the respondent and to report whether she had any impediment to prevent the consummation of the marriage. This order was personally served upon her on the 11th of September, 1868, but while admitting the allegations in the petition to be true, she, through her attorney, formally declined to submit to any examination. A fresh copy of the order was served upon her on the 1st of February, 1869, and she was informed that if she did not obey it, application would be made for an attachment against her, but she again absolutely refused to comply.

Dr. Spinks (with him Bayford) now moved the Court that an attachment might issue against the respondent for non-compliance with its order. It might be that the evidence which would be adduced would satisfy the Court and render inspection unnecessary, and the attachment might therefore be allowed to lie in the registry until after the hearing: to be enforced, however, if the respondent attempted to leave the jurisdiction.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—The course suggested is a desirable one, but I think it ought to be modified. I think the Court ought not to issue an attachment now and let it lie in the registry as suggested; but if, after the hearing, the Court should determine that the respondent ought to be examined, it will then make a fresh order, appointing time and place for the purpose. The best way will be to let the motion for the attachment stand over until after the hearing, it being clearly understood that if the respondent attempts to leave the jurisdiction, the Court will at once grant the attachment.

Dissolution of Marriage—Adultery and Cruelty—Condonation—Evidence—Practice.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—After the cause had been heard, and the Court taken time to consider its decision, the petitioner (the wife) applied to be allowed to give evidence of further acts of cruelty, which she alleged took place at a date later than that to which she deposed at the trial. The Court refused the application, the petitioner having repeatedly stated, in the course of her examination, that the last act of cruelty took place at Easter, 1863, and that also being the latest date given in the petition.

This was a petition instituted by the wife for dissolution of marriage by reason of adultery, coupled with cruelty. The respondent traversed both charges. The case was heard, before the Court itself, on Saturday, the 20th of February. Judgment was reserved; and on the following motion-day the petitioner applied to be allowed to give evidence of further acts of cruelty, which she alleged took place at a date later than that to which she deposed at the trial. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Dr. Tristram, for the petitioner.

Pritchard, for the respondent.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—I think the evidence in this case fails. The parties lived together nearly ten years. During that time the petitioner speaks of two or three occasions upon which the respondent used some violence to her. On no occasion is it established, in my judgment, that he did her any serious hurt. Her own evidence was not given in a manner to induce the Court to place implicit reliance on her statement; and the occasions of violence, few and comparatively slight as they were on her own shewing, appear to the Court to have been exaggerated. The blow said to have been given with the muzzle of a gun is an instance of this. The struggle which went on at the time between the respondent and another man renders it very probable that the injury the petitioner received was the result of accident rather than design. These isolated acts, not accompanied with any general ill-treatment and of no very serious nature, do not establish a case of legal cruelty. But, further, the last act of cruelty imputed took place at Easter, 1863, and the petitioner continued to cohabit with the respondent until February, 1864, when she left him because she was jealous of a servant in the house. The cruelty, if any, was therefore condoned, and cannot now be relied upon unless revived by the subsequent adultery which has been charged. But here, too, I think the evidence fails.

Digitized by Google

The respondent is living in a house in which there is only one other person—a maid-servant. He has been once seen to kiss this woman. Beyond that there is no evidence of adultery, except that the man who lives in the next house has heard voices apparently talking in the same room at night. On the other hand, a girl who was once there on a visit deposes to the fact that the servant slept in her own room, and that she never saw the respondent in that room, or the servant in the respondent's. It was proposed, after the case was closed and the Court had taken time to consider its decision, that the petitioner should be allowed to be called again, to give evidence of further acts of cruelty calculated to take off the effect of the condonation. But on the trial she had been several times asked if the occurrence which took place at Easter, 1863, was the last act of which she had to complain, to which she had uniformly answered in the affirmative. Moreover, on turning to the statement of cruelty in her petition, it will be seen that Easter, 1863, is the latest date she gives. I think the proposed further evidence ought not to be received. And as the evidence on neither of the two charges is, in my opinion, sufficient to sustain them, the petition must be dismissed.

Permanent Alimony—Settled Property—Large Proportion brought in by Wife—Rate of Allowance—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. s. 22.—Practice.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—In allotting permanent alimony in suits for judicial separation, the Court is bound by the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and cannot allot a larger proportion than one moiety of the joint income, although the greater part of the fortune may have come from the wife.

The wife had obtained a decree of judicial separation on the ground of cruelty, and the case now came before the Court on the question of permanent alimony.

The income of the respondent was derived from property comprised in the marriage settlement, part of which was brought into settlement by the wife and part by the husband. It amounted to 341*l.* per annum. Of this sum 210*l.* per annum was derived from property which belonged to the petitioner; and by the settlement the income of the whole of the property was receivable by the respondent during their joint lives.

Dr. Deane (Searle with him), for the petitioner, moved that the income of the whole of the wife's property might be allotted to her as permanent alimony. The Court is not bound by the rules of the Ecclesiastical Courts, but is at liberty to make such an order as it might deem just.

Dr. Tristram, for the respondent, contra.—One moiety of the joint income is the utmost that the Court can allot. The usual rate is one-third, and there is no reason why the Court should depart from it in this instance.—He referred to 20 & 21 Vict c. 85. s. 22; Cooke v. Cooke (2 Phil. 40); Otway v. Otway (2 Phil. 109).

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—The question is, on what principle the Court is to act in allotting permanent alimony in suits for judicial separation. The Court is invited to adopt by analogy the principle on which it acts in suits for dissolution of marriage; but the powers given to the Court in suits for dissolution are defined by certain sections of the statute, and the legislature has advisedly not extended the powers contained in those sections to suits for judicial separation. Section 22. of the Divorce Act defines the principles and rules by which the Court is to be guided in suits for judicial separation—namely, the principles and rules on which the Ecclesiastical Courts have heretofore acted and given relief. Let us see what the principle of the Ecclesiastical Courts was. It would be equitable to say that where a wife has brought a sum of money, whether large or small, to her husband, and the cohabitation contemplated at the time of the marriage has become impossible by reason of the husband's misconduct, the wife should receive back the money which she had brought to the common fund, whatever it may be. I think that would not be an unreasonable principle. But the Ecclesiastical Courts never did proceed on that principle. There is no trace of it in the reports. The rule laid down by those Courts was, to take all the circumstances of the case into consideration, and having regard to those circumstances to allot a certain proportion of the joint income. In ordinary cases the principle was to give one-third. The highest proportion ever allotted in any case was one-half, and that I shall allot in this instance. Taking the joint income at 340*l*. I allot 170*l*. payable quarterly.

Petition for Dissolution of Marriage—Power of Court to order Cause to be heard in Camera.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—The Court is not bound by the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts in suits for dissolution of marriage, and in such suits it has no power, even with the consent of all parties, to order the cause to be heard in camera.

This was a suit instituted by the wife for dissolution of marriage, on the ground of sodomy. The respondent traversed the charge.

Searle, for the petitioner, moved that the cause might be heard before the Court itself, and in camera.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—Has the Court power to make an order that the cause be heard in camera?

Dr. Tristram, for the respondent, intimated that he was prepared to consent to the order.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—The authority under which the Court has acted in hearing causes in camera is the section in the Divorce Act which says that the Court shall follow as nearly as may be the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and that section applies to all cases except cases of dissolution of marriage; but in cases of dissolution we are under the act of parliament, and I am not sure whether the Court has power to make such an order. I must pause and see whether I can do it.

The learned JUDGE subsequently intimated to counsel that he had no power to order the cause to be heard in camera. Under section 22. of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. the Court is governed in all suits and proceedings, other than proceedings to dissolve any marriage, by the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, but even under that practice suits for nullity were alone heard in camera. Here the suit was for dissolution of marriage, and the section did not apply.

The usual order that the cause be heard before the Court itself was granted.

Codicil—Execution—Signature not Made or Acknowledged in Presence of Witnesses—Presumption.

WILL.—A testator wrote with his own hand on the back of his will, which was duly executed, a codicil, headed "Memorandum, dated the 25th of April, 1863." It purported to have been executed on the 31st of August, 1863, and the attestation clause was perfect save that it did not state that the testator had signed his name or acknowledged his signature in the presence of the witnesses. The witnesses could not say whether he did either one or the other in their presence; they did not see his signature when they signed nor the will on the other side, and nothing was said as to the character of the paper. The Court refused probate of the codicil on motion, but allowed the parties interested, if they thought fit, to propound it.

J. S. Swinford, late of Nash Court, Margate, in the county of Kent, died on the 3rd of October, 1868, leaving a duly executed will, on the back of which he wrote with his own hand a codicil, headed "Memorandum, dated the 25th of April, 1863." The attestation clause ran, "Witness the signature of the said J. S. Swinford, in the presence of us, who, at his request, in his presence and in the presence of each other, have hereunto subscribed our names this 31st of August, 1863. William Mascall, Jane Kennett."

Mascall deposed that the testator asked him to sign his name to a paper; that the testator then called up his servant, and that deponent signed the paper in her presence; that he was unable to say whether the testator wrote anything in his presence, or whether the testator's signature was on the paper when it was signed by deponent; and that nothing was said about the character of the paper.

Jane Kennett said that she put her name to the paper at the testator's request, and then directly left the room; that she did not see Mascall sign; that she did not see the testator's signature; that he did not acknowledge or in any way refer to his signature, and that he did not tell her what the paper was.

Both witnesses further deposed that they did not see the will on the other side of the paper, and that they could not say whether the paper was so folded as to prevent them from seeing the testator's signature to the codicil.

Dr. Tristram moved the Court, the executors having renounced, to grant letters of administration, with the will and codicil annexed, to John Swinford, the father and only next-of-kin of the deceased. He submitted that the codicil being in the handwriting of the testator, and the attestation clause sufficiently full for the purpose, the presumption omnia rite esse acta should prevail.—He referred to Gwillim v. Gwillim (3 Sw. & Tr. 200) and Vinnicombe v. Butler (3 Sw. & Tr. 580).

SIR J. P. WILDE.—I am not disposed to grant probate of the codicil. I do not think that the circumstances come up to the decided cases. It is desirable that the Court should draw the line somewhere, otherwise the provisions of the statute would be entirely defeated. The parties interested may, if they think fit, propound the paper.

Administration—Insolvent Estate—Property liable to Depreciation—Grant ad Colligenda Bona to Creditor—Practice.

WILL.—The widow and next-of-kin in this country renounced administration, and the estate, which was insolvent, was liable to depreciation if the property (timber) were not at once sold. The Court, under the circumstances, made a grant ad colligenda bona to a creditor, the money realized by the sale of the timber (after deduction for wages and charges) and collection of debts, to be paid into the registry, and the next-of-kin abroad to be at once cited with a view to the applicant taking a creditor's grant.

Charles Stewart, late of Kingston-upon-Hull, timber-merchant, died intestate on the 18th of January, 1869, leaving his wife and several children, some of whom lived abroad, him surviving. The estate, which consisted principally of deals and a number of small trade debts, was valued at 2,000*l.*, but the deceased was indebted to his banker and other creditors to the amount of 7,000*l.* The widow and the next-of-kin in this country renounced administration.

Dr. Tristram moved for letters ad colligenda bona to Mr. A. B. Pease, a creditor. It was proposed to sell the timber.

[SIR J. P. WILDE.—But timber is not a perishable article.]

It is subject to charges, and the affidavits also state that it will deteriorate in value if not at once sold. The trade debts, moreover, are small and numerous, and may be altogether lost to the estate if some one be not forthwith appointed to collect them. He referred to In the goods of Clarkington (2 Sw. & Tr. 381).

SIR J. P. WILDE.—I think the grant ought to go. So far as one can judge, the estate is probably insolvent, but no one can positively say that in respect of any estate. The widow and next-of-kin in this country, however, appear to take that view of the property. They have also renounced; and as the estate is subject to charges and the timber will depreciate in value if not at once sold, you may take a grant ad colligenda bona, but you must pay the money into the registry after deducting for wages and charges on the property, and you must also at once cite the next-of-kin abroad with the view of taking a creditor's administration.

which he found in her hands, and refused to make to him a grant de bonis non of the goods of B. until he had first taken out administration to his wife.

John Risdon, late of St. John's Wood, London, coachbuilder, died in March, 1865, a widower, without child or parent or any known relation, and intestate. In May, 1866, letters of administration of his personal effects were granted to Mary Ann Sarah Hooper, a creditor to the amount of 300*l*. She got in a part of the estate, which consisted, among other property, of two leasehold houses mortgaged to the Perpetual Building Society, and paid some of the debts. In July, 1868, she intermarried with Edward Hibberd, who thereupon entered into possession of the leasehold houses, and paid the ground-rents and taxes and the monthly instalments on the mortgages as they became due. In September, 1868, M. A. S. Hibberd died, leaving part of the estate unadministered, and the debt in respect of which she obtained the administration still due and unpaid.

Bayford (March 16) moved for a grant de bonis non of the personal estate and effects of Risdon to Edward Hibberd, the husband.

[Sir J. P. Wilde.—What has the applicant done to reduce the wife's chose in action in the debt into possession?]

He has adopted the administration granted to the wife in her character of creditor, and that is an assertion of the claim.

[Sir J. P. Wilde.—If that argument be right your proposition would be this, that the mere fact of claiming administration as a creditor would reduce the debt into possession.]

It is a step towards it. The issuing of a writ would be sufficient, and this is an analogous proceeding.—He admitted that he could cite no authority in support of the proposition.

Cur. adv. vult.

Judgment was given, on March 23, as follows:—

Sir J. P. Wilde (March 23).—This is an application for a grant of administration de bonis non to the personal estate and effects of John Risdon, deceased. After the death of the intestate, letters of administration were granted to Mary Ann Sarah Hooper, as a creditor, and under the grant she got in a considerable part of the estate, and paid some of the debts. She then married the present applicant. Within a month or six weeks after the marriage she died, and the present applicant applies for the grant of administration as a creditor on the estate of the original deceased. Now, it is obvious there was no debt due to him. But he says that the debt was due to his wife and to him jure mariti, and that he has reduced it into possession. I think that is a contention that cannot be maintained. What he really did was this—to take possession of that part of the estate which was in his wife's hands under the letters of administration at the time he married her, and to retain possession of it. But that is not reducing into possession the debt; because, before a debt can be said to be reduced into possession as a chose in action, something must have been done to satisfy it, and no part of the estate has here been set aside or appropriated for the payment of the debt. Indeed, the present position of the applicant is an inconsistent one; because he comes here to ask for a grant as a creditor, which implies that the debt is still owing, and at the same time he alleges that the debt has been reduced into possession—that is to say, that a sum of money has been set apart in discharge of it. I therefore think that he cannot take the grant in the way in which he asks for it. He must first take administration to his wife, and then he will be entitled to a grant of course.

Dissolution of Marriage—Husband's Petition—Petitioner Guilty of Adultery—Adultery long antecedent to Wife's Misconduct—Exercise of Discretion vested in Court—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. s. 31.—Costs.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—On the trial of the husband's petition for dissolution of marriage by reason of the wife's adultery, the jury found that the petitioner had also been guilty of adultery. The adultery was long antecedent to the wife's misconduct, and it did not appear that it was known to her until after the filing of the petition. The Court held, that mere lapse of time would not justify the exercise of the discretion (which must be a regulated discretion, and not a free option subordinated to no rules) vested in it under section 31. of the statute, and refused a decree.

There are cases in which the discretion may be fitly exercised in favour of a petitioner. But in cases where the adultery has no special circumstances attending it, and no special features placing it in some category capable of distinct statement and recognition, the Court ought not to assume to itself a right to grant or withhold a divorce upon the mere footing of the petitioner's adultery being, under the whole circumstances of each case, more or less pardonable or capable of excuse.

The wife, the respondent in the suit, recriminated adultery, which she charged as having taken place with A. and B. At the trial no evidence was offered in support of the charge with B. The Court ordered that the costs incurred by the petitioner in respect of the charge of adultery with B. should be deducted from the sum paid into Court to meet the respondent's costs of trial.

This was a petition by the husband for dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery.

The respondent and co-respondent traversed the charge, and the respondent further pleaded counter-charges of adultery and wilful neglect and misconduct conducing to adultery.

The cause was tried, before the Judge Ordinary, by a common jury, on the 4th of March, and the jury found, first, that the respondent had committed adultery with the co-respondent; secondly, that the petitioner had not condoned such adultery; thirdly, that he had not been guilty of wilful neglect and misconduct conducing to adultery, but that he had committed adultery with a woman of the name of Bentley.

Digitized by Google

The marriage took place in 1855. The adultery with Bentley was committed a year or two afterwards, and it did not appear that it was known to the wife until after the filing of the petition.

The respondent also alleged adultery with a woman of the name of Rhodes, but no evidence was adduced in support of this charge, which the petitioner had come prepared to meet.

Dr. Deane (with him Inderwick) (March 16), for the petitioner, moved the Court to grant a decree nisi notwithstanding that he had been found guilty of adultery. The case is different from Lautour v. Lautour (10 H.L. C. 685; 33 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 89). There the decree was refused on the ground of the adultery of the husband, but the adultery was continuous for upwards of twenty years.

[The JUDGE ORDINARY.—But it was after the wife's adultery, and after sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court.]

If the adultery of the husband committed many years previously to the adultery of the wife is of itself to be a bar to the suit of the husband, it will amount to leave and licence to the wife to commit adultery. If the husband's adultery were close upon that of the wife (either antecedent or subsequent) it might well constitute a bar, but when the adultery has taken place ten or a dozen years ago, and, for aught that appears to the contrary, the husband and wife continued to live on friendly terms afterwards, and the husband's adultery in no way conduced to the wife's misconduct, it would be a monstrous hardship that in such a case the adultery of the husband should be an absolute bar.

[The JUDGE ORDINARY.—Upon what ground do you ask the Court to exercise the discretion vested in it by the 31st section? Is it that the adultery was venial?]

On the ground that it did not conduce to the wife's misconduct, and the length of time since which it took place.

[The JUDGE ORDINARY.—In the next case the adultery may have taken place ten instead of twelve years ago. How is the Court to distinguish them?]

Anichini v. Anichini (2 Curt. 21); Clarke v. Clarke (34 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 94); Joseph v. Joseph (34 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 96); Campbell v. Campbell (Macq. H.L. Pr. 590); and Coleman v. Coleman (35 L. J. Pr. & M. 37; L. R. Prob. & Div. 1, 91) were referred to.

Dr. Spinks (with him Searle), for the respondent, contra.—All the cases shew that the discretion to be exercised under the 31st section must be a legal not an arbitrary discretion; and nothing has appeared in the case which should induce the Court to depart from the general current of decisions. There has been no condonation because there was no knowledge. The argument that the petitioner's adultery did not conduce to the respondent's misconduct is of no force. Lautour v. H. M. P. (10 H.L. C. 685; 33 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 89) the husband's adultery was subsequent to that of the wife, and a decree was refused. In Barnes v. Barnes (33 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 89) the husband's adultery did not conduce to the wife's misconduct; and there also the decree was refused. The hardship in the case is that the petitioner has been found out. The petition ought to be dismissed, and with the wife's full costs.

Pritchard, for the co-respondent.

Dr. Deane, in reply.—In Barnes v. Barnes (33 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 89) the adultery of the petitioner took place shortly after the marriage, and shortly before the filing of his petition. With respect to the respondent's costs, the costs incurred by the petitioner in regard to the adultery charged with the woman Rhodes ought to be deducted. The charges were very specific, time and place having been given, and the petitioner had come prepared with witnesses to meet them.

Dr. Spinks.—If that argument is to prevail the attorney for the wife must lose his costs unless he is successful. When the charges were distinctly made he was justified in putting them on the record.

Cur. adv. vult.

LORD PENZANCE (on May 5) delivered the following judgment:—The general question involved in this case is a serious one. It is practically this: To what extent ought this Court to exercise a discretion in granting or withholding a divorce to a petitioner who has himself been found guilty of adultery? There is no doubt, I think, that the legislature has invested the Court with a discretion on this subject; and there is equally no doubt that there are cases in which the adultery of a petitioner has been committed under such circumstances that it ought not in justice to stand in the way of a decree. In one case the respondent who was living in adultery had contrived to induce the petitioner to believe that she was dead. Upon receiving this information the petitioner married again. When he found out his mistake he sued the respondent for her adultery, and she retorted the adultery of which he had been guilty with his second wife. The Court thought that ignorance was innocence, and granted him his decree. In another case the wife was the complainant. She proved a case for divorce against her husband, and he in turn accused her of adultery, which was established. But it was further proved that he had, by threats and violence, forced her to lead an immoral life, from which he derived a pecuniary benefit. It was held that adultery so caused ought to be no bar to the wife's relief. It may also well be that an act of adultery committed by a petitioner to the knowledge of the respondent, and by him or her long since pardoned and condoned, ought not to preclude the petitioner from all remedy for the subsequent adultery of the respondent. This was much discussed in the Ecclesiastical Court, in the case of Anichini v. Anichini (2 Curt. 210), and it was pointed out that, upon a contrary view, a sort of licence to commit adultery without punishment would be set up on the one side by guilt on the other, however distant in point of time, or however completely forgiven and condoned. There appears to me to be great force in the observations of the learned Judge in that case, and on a proper occasion it will be very fit to consider whether his views ought not to be adopted in applying the discretion vested in this Court by section 31. Here, then, are three clases of cases, and there may be, and probably are, others in which this discretion may be fitly exercised in favour of a petitioner. But in cases where the adultery complained of has no special circumstances attending it, and no special features placing it in some category capable of distinct statement and recognition, there would, I think, be great mischief in this Court assuming to itself a right to grant or withhold a divorce upon the mere footing of the petitioner's adultery being, under the whole circumstances of each case, more or less pardonable or capable of excuse. A loose and unfettered discretion of this sort upon matters of such grave import is a dangerous weapon to entrust to any Court—still more so to a single Judge. Its exercise is likely to be the refuge of vagueness in decision and the harbour of half-formed thought. Under cover of discretion, a conclusion is apt to be formed upon a general impression of facts too numerous and minute to be perfectly brought together and weighed, and sometimes not perfectly proved; while the result is apt to be coloured with the general prejudices, favourable or otherwise to the person whose conduct is under review, which the course of the evidence has evoked. Upon such materials, so used, two minds will hardly ever form a judgment alike, and the same mind will often appear to others to form contradictory judgments on what seem to be similar facts. This invites public criticism and shakes public confidence in the justice of the tribunal. I hold, therefore, that the discretion to be exercised under section 31. of the statute should be a regulated discretion, and not a free option subordinated to no rules. It was probably reposed in the Court because the legislature found it impossible to foresee and specify the classes of cases fit for its application which might arise under the new law. The duty of reducing its exercise to method devolves upon the Court. Past experience has already pointed out some classes of cases to which it is fitly applied, and the future may probably furnish more. But the facts of this case present no definite features beyond mere lapse of time to justify its exercise, and the Court must refuse to decree.

In reference to the question of costs, I think that such costs as were incurred by the petitioner in respect of the charge of adultery with the woman Rhodes should be deducted from the sum paid into Court to meet the respondent's costs of trial.

Dissolution of Marriage—Revision of Settlements—Deed of Separation—Post-Nuptial Settlement—22 & 23 Vict. c. 61. s. 5.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES. SETTLEMENT.—Husband and wife having agreed to live separate and apart, executed a deed of separation, by which the husband covenanted to pay to the wife an annuity of 200l. a year during their joint lives, the annuity to be reduced to 150l. a year on the decease of the husband, and to 50l. a year if the wife re-married:—Held, that it was a post-nuptial settlement within the terms of section 5. of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, and an order was made for its revision after a decree for dissolution of the marriage by reason of the wife's adultery.

In this case the decree for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery was made in November, 1868, and the matter now came before the Court on the application of the petitioner, to vary a deed of separation entered into between him and the respondent on the 4th of December, 1865. The question was, whether such a deed could be treated as a post-nuptial settlement under the terms of the 5th section of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61.

After reciting that differences had arisen between them, and that they had in consequence agreed to live separate and apart, the deed provided that the petitioner should pay to the trustee named therein an annuity of 200*l.* a year during their joint lives for the maintenance and support of the respondent. It further provided for the reduction of the annuity to 150*l.* a year on the decease of the petitioner, and to 50*l.* in the event of the respondent re-marrying, but it contained no provision as to her remaining chaste. Finally it provided for the maintenance of the children of the marriage by the petitioner, and that the covenants should cease and determine on the revocation of the deed at the will of the parties.

Dr. Tristram, for the petitioner, submitted that the deed came within the terms of a post-nuptial settlement, and referred to Callwell v. Callwell (3 Swa. & Tr. 259) and Stone v. Stone (3 Swa. & Tr. 372).

Dr. Deane (Searle with him), for the respondent and trustees, contra.—This case differs from Stone v. Stone and Brownrigg (3 Swa. & Tr. 372).

[The JUDGE ORDINARY.—I think that case comes to nothing. It is not an affirmative decision of any kind.]

A deed of separation and a settlement are totally different things. A settlement, be it ante-nuptial or post-nuptial, has in view the cohabitation of the parties. A deed of separation has expressly the opposite purpose.

[The JUDGE ORDINARY.—Although they agreed to separate, they were still man and wife, and now an event has happened which has broken the arrangement. That is a matter which was not contemplated by the deed.]

Digitized by Google

In settlements provision is also made for the children of the marriage. Here the settlement is exclusively on the wife. The deed does not provide for anything usually found in a settlement, but for everything that is not in a settlement. There is also this distinction in it, that there is a power of revocation. Further, the 5th section of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61. has been strictly construed. Separation deeds were well known, and if it were intended to give the Court power to deal with them, they would have been mentioned.

Cur. adv. vult.

LORD PENZANCE gave judgment, on May 11, as follows:—In this case the respondent has been found guilty of adultery. The Court has made a decree for dissolution of the marriage, and the question that now remains for determination is, whether the Court should interfere, under the 5th section of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, by its order, with the effect of a certain deed which had been entered into between the petitioner and the respondent, and which is said to have been of the character of a post-nuptial settlement. The first question is, whether the deed is of a kind that falls within the intentions of the legislature when it used the words "post-nuptial settlement." Now, the deed is in all its provisions, I think, pretty well an ordinary deed of separation.—[Having recited the provisions of the deed, his Lordship continued:]—The question is, whether it is a post-nuptial settlement. The language of the statute is very general. It says, "The Court, after a final decree of nullity of marriage, or dissolution of marriage, may inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of their respective parents, as to the Court shall seem fit." I should not be justified in narrowing the fair meaning and scope of those words. The deed is one by which money is secured to the wife. It is then a settlement, so far as I understand the meaning of the word settlement, and it is post-nuptial. So much upon the mere meaning of the words. But if one looks at the substance of the matter, one will see that the legislature intended by this section to arm the Court with the power of making fresh arrangements, in case of the woman committing adultery, in respect to the pecuniary settlements that at any time were made upon her in the character of wife. I think the substantial feature of this deed which brings it within the clause is this—that it provides by covenant that a sum or sums of money shall be paid to the respondent in her character of wife, and that it was made upon the footing and assumption that she would continue the wife. It seems to me, therefore, that the Court would be acting within the spirit of the clause and the intention of the legislature in considering it as a post-nuptial settlement. The respondent has committed adultery; there is a decree for a dissolution of the marriage, and she is no longer a wife. The petitioner has in consequence proposed to reduce the annuity of 200*l.* a year by one-third, to reduce the annuity of 150*l.* a year payable on his death by one-half, and to deal in like manner with the annuity of 50*l.* a year if she marry again. It seems to me that that is a very reasonable proposition. I shall be prepared to make an order embodying that proposal, and in this, as in all other cases of marriage settlements, the order will be drawn up in the presence of the parties, and if they have any objection to make to the terms of the order, or the manner in which it carries out the decision of the Court, I shall be prepared to hear them either at chambers or in Court.

Dr. Tristram asked that the future payments of the annuity to the respondent should only be dum casta vixerit, and that a provision to that effect should be introduced into the order.

Dr. Deane submitted that inasmuch as it was not in the deed, the Court had no power to include such a provision in the order.

LORD PENZANCE.—When the order is drawn you can attend me at chambers and argue the point.

Will—Executors Intermeddling—Citation to take Probate—Failure to do so—Attachment—Practice.

WILL.—The executors of a will intermeddled in the estate and effects of their testator, without taking probate of the instrument. A citation having been served upon them, to enter an appearance and take probate, they entered an appearance, but took no further steps in the matter. The Court refused to grant an attachment against them for contempt in not obeying the citation, but directed a peremptory order to be served upon them to take probate within ten days from the date of the order.

The testator Joseph Bell Clarke, formerly of Cheltenham, Gloucestershire, cotton-manufacturer, died on the 5th of September, 1863, leaving a will in which he appointed the defendants his executors. The deceased at the time of his death was indebted to Mrs. Grant in the sum of 5,000*l.* Mrs. Grant died in 1867, and her executors instituted a suit in the Court of Chancery to administer the estate of Joseph Bell Clarke. The defendants, in their answer to the bill in Chancery, admitted that they had possessed themselves of personal estate and effects of Joseph Bell Clarke of considerable value, and that they had caused to be sold a portion thereof, which realized the sum of 205*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*, and had thereby intermeddled in the estate and effects of their testator, although they had not taken probate of his will. On the 20th of November, 1868, a citation was taken out against them, calling upon them to enter an appearance within eight days, and to take probate of the will. This citation was personally served upon the defendants, who entered an appearance, but took no further steps in the matter.

Searle, for the plaintiff, moved that an attachment might issue against them for contempt in not obeying the citation.

SIR J. P. WILDE said, he knew of no case in which an attachment had issued in the first instance for not obeying a citation. He accordingly declined to grant an attachment, but ordered a peremptory order to be served upon the defendants to take probate within ten days from the date of the order, and condemned them in costs.

Practice—Revocation of Grant of Administration with Will annexed—Proctor's Lien on Letters of Administration.

WILL.—An order was made for the revocation of a grant of administration with the will annexed. The letters of administration were in the hands of the proctors who had obtained them, and who claimed a lien upon them for costs. The Court declined to order the proctors to deliver up the letters for the purpose of cancellation, but directed that a copy of its order, revoking the grant and requiring the executor to bring the letters into the registry if they ever came into his possession, should be served upon them.

John Durham, late of Witham, in the county of Essex, grocer, died on the 28th of August, 1856, leaving a duly executed will in which he appointed his wife, Elizabeth Durham, sole executrix and residuary legatee.

Digitized by Google

Elizabeth Durham died without having proved the will, and letters of administration of her personal estate and effects were granted to John Dykes Durham, the defendant, her natural and lawful son and next-of-kin, on the suggestion that she had died intestate. Subsequently letters of administration, with the will annexed, of John Durham (the father), were granted to him as administrator of Elizabeth Durham.

The suggestion that Elizabeth Durham had died intestate was untrue. She left a duly executed will, of which she appointed John Barnes, the plaintiff, executor. The defendant, at the time he obtained administration, was aware of the fact.

In January, 1868, probate of the will of Elizabeth Durham was granted to the plaintiff as exectuor, the administration previously granted to the defendant having been revoked, and in the following February a citation was issued at the instance of the plaintiff, and served by advertisement on the defendant, to bring in the letters of administration with the will annexed of John Durham, deceased, and to shew cause why they should not be revoked; and a copy of this citation was served upon Messrs. Moore & Currey, the defendant's proctors, who obtained them. They admitted that the letters of administration were in their possession, but refused to give them up, on the ground that they had a lien upon them for their costs of obtaining them.

Dr. Tristram, for the plaintiff, now moved the Court to revoke the grant made to the defendant, and to make such order as to the Court should seem fit respecting the bringing into the registry the letters of administration in the hands of Messrs. Moore & Currey, with a view to their being cancelled. He also asked that the defendant might be condemned in the plaintiff's costs, as he was aware of the existence of the will when he obtained the grant.

Lord Penzance.—As Messrs. Moore & Currey claimed a lien on the letters of administration, I do not see my way to making an order on them to deliver them up; and the Court must therefore proceed in the matter as best it can under the circumstances. I will make this order: that the grant of administration with the will of John Durham annexed be revoked; that the plaintiff bring the letters of administration into the registry should they ever hereafter come into his possession, and that a copy of this order be served on Messrs. Moore & Currey. I also condemn the defendant in the plaintiff's costs.

Will—Residue—Signature of Legatee written under Attestation Clause—Omission of Name in Probate—Practice.

Will.—A residuary legatee who was present at the execution of the will, in which no executor was appointed, wrote her name, after the instrument had been signed by the testator and attesting witnesses, underneath the attestation clause, at the request of one of the witnesses:—Held, that, the Court having to determine to whom the grant of administration with the will annexed should go, it was the duty of the Court to inquire in what character the legatee had signed the paper; and the Court being satisfied from the evidence that she had not signed the will as a witness, her signature was omitted from the grant.

The residuary legatee signed the will after it was executed at the request of one of the attesting witnesses. The Court required, before making an order for the omission of her signature from the probate, that a notice to shew cause should first be served upon the next-of-kin.

The testator gave and bequeathed to his sister absolutely all his "houses and land and book-debts, household furniture, plate, linen, books, china, glass, books of art, drugs, hay, straw, potatoes, and everything on the said premises," horse, gig, &c., "and all other chattels":—Held, that the residue passed, "all other chattels" being meant to supply any omission in the previous enumeration.

Thomas Brightman Sharman, late of Leake, in the county of Lincoln, veterinary surgeon, deceased, died, leaving a duly executed will in the words and figures following:

"I give and bequeath unto my sister Adelaide Sharman absolutely all my houses and land and book-debts, household furniture, plate, linen, books, china, glass, books of art, drugs, hay, straw, potatoes, and everything on the said premises," horse, gig, &c., "and all other chattels. September 28, 1868."

Opposite the attestation clause there appeared the names of two witnesses, and beneath the attestation clause the signature of the legatee, Adelaide Sharman.

From the affidavits it appeared that Miss Sharman signed her name after the will had been executed at the request of one of the witnesses who had drawn the will, and who thought it was proper she should, as the legatee named therein, so sign her name.

The Court was moved (April 20) to allow administration, with the will annexed, to go to Adelaide Sharman as residuary legatee, and to omit her name from the grant; but the learned Judge required that a notice to shew cause should first be served upon the father of the deceased as the sole next-of-kin. The requisite notice having been served.

Inderwick renewed the motion on the 5th of May. There were two questions involved: first, as to the character in which Miss Sharman signed the will; and next, as to the meaning of the residuary clause. As to the first, the affidavits shewed that she signed at the request, not of the testator, but of one of the attesting witnesses, and as legatee. Randfield v. Randfield (30 L. J. Ch. 177) was conclusive, that, under such circumstances she did not forfeit her interest. As to the second point, the whole object of the paper was to benefit one person, and that distinguished it from all other cases. The words "and all other chattels" clearly meant anything not included in the previous enumeration. He referred to Jarman on Wills, 721; Mitchell v. Mitchell (5 Madd. 69); Campbell v. Prescott (15 Ves. 500); Kendall v. Kendall (4 Russ. 360).

Lord Penzance.—Two questions arise in this case. The first is, whether the grant ought to go to the applicant of probate of this will with or without her name as a witness. As to that, there is the case decided by Sir Cresswell Cresswell—In the goods of Jane Forest (2 Swa. & Tr. 334), which was cited when this matter was last before the Court, and which was to this effect, that in ordinary cases it is not the duty of this Court to ascertain whether, when there are two attesting witnesses to a will, the name of a third person which also appears on the face of the instrument, was put there as an attesting witness or not. For, said Sir Cresswell Cresswell: "If I were to omit the name in the probate, the next-of-kin would be precluded from raising the question in a Court of construction." But in this case it is said, and I think rightly, that the duty of deciding that question is forced upon the Court, because the Court has to say, not only what was the will, but to whom the grant should go; and the question to whom the grant should go depends upon the previous question, whether the applicant has any interest under the will. If an attesting witness, she has no interest, as she forfeited it; if not an attesting witness, then she has an interest. I am satisfied from the evidence that she did not sign the will as an attesting witness. To whom then should the grant go? Is the applicant the residuary legatee? Upon the whole matter, I think she is. There is something in the suggestion that the will was a short one, and that its whole object and purpose was to give everything to his sister. I think the fair meaning of the language is, that he meant to give her everything; and then, after the enumeration, lest he should omit anything, he puts in the words "all other chattels." The grant ought to go to her as residuary legatee; and when it does go, it ought not to include her name as a witness.

Foreign Will—Will made after Death of Testator by Third Party on his behalf—Probate.

WILL.—The testator, a Spaniard, died at Bilboa, in Spain. On the day of his death he caused a document to be prepared by a notary, purporting to give authority to his wife to make a will on his behalf. In pursuance of this authority she made a will on his behalf after his decease, and appointed herself executrix. The Court being satisfied from the affidavit of a Spanish advocate that such a will was valid according to the law of Spain, decreed probate.

Don Eulojio Celis y Guttierez died at Bilboa, in Spain, on the 27th of January, 1869. On the day of his death he caused a document to be prepared by a notary, purporting to give authority to his wife, Doña Josepha, to make a will on his behalf. This document recited that Don Eulojio, being too unwell to execute it, had requested a third person to execute it on his behalf, and that it was in fact so executed and attested by witnesses.

On the 13th of March, 1869, Doña Josepha, acting in pursuance of this power, made a will on behalf of her deceased husband, and appointed herself executrix. It appeared from the affidavit of a Spanish advocate that a will so made is valid according to the law of Spain. It was also stated that the will had been admitted to probate by the Spanish Court, but there was no affidavit as to the fact.

C. A. Middleton, in moving for probate to the executrix, cited an unreported case, In the goods of Don Garcia, wherein a will similarly made was admitted to probate in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury in the year 1836.

LORD PENZANCE.—If the will has received the sanction of the Spanish Court, you are entitled to a grant of course. But I think you are also entitled to a grant as the case stands. The notion of a will made after a man's death is entirely opposed to our ideas of a will. We have, however, no right to impose our ideas on other people, and the only thing which the Court has to determine is whether this paper is or is not a valid will in Spain. We have an affidavit of a person versed in the law of Spain to the fact that it is, and I think I ought to grant probate.

Judicial Separation—Connivance—Agreement to Live Separate—Agreement silent as to Future Life of Husband—Unwilling Consent.

husband, but it was alleged that when it was entered into the wife was aware that he was living with another woman, and that the understanding was that the intimacy was to be continued:—The Court investigated the circumstances under which the agreement was made, and being satisfied that the wife had not connived at the husband's adultery, decreed judicial separation on her petition.

To constitute connivance on the part of the wife it is not necessary that there should be a willing consent to the adultery of the husband. She may be unwilling to consent to his living with another woman; but if under pressure of circumstances, short of force in the nature of duress, she should withdraw her scruples, that would amount to connivance.

This was a petition by the wife for judicial separation, by reason of the husband's adultery. The respondent did not deny the charge, but pleaded that the petitioner had connived at his adultery. The case was heard before the Judge Ordinary, on the 24th of April.

In support of the plea of connivance, there was put in evidence an agreement to live separate, which was entered into between the petitioner and respondent on the 26th of October, 1866. It recited that, " Whereas unhappy differences had arisen " between them, they had agreed to live separate and apart from each other, and provided that the respondent should pay to the petitioner the sum of 88*l*. a year for her maintenance and support. It contained no provision as to the mode of life of the respondent in the future, but it was alleged that at the time the agreement was signed it was well understood by both parties that the respondent should continue his intimacy with the woman, Maria Smith, with whom the petitioner charged the adultery to have been committed. Maria Smith had been a servant in the house.

In proof of this allegation Mr. Gill, the attorney who prepared the agreement, was called. He stated that he was first consulted by Mrs. Ross, in 1865, and that in the course of their interviews the fact of the respondent's living with Maria Smith was frequently referred to. He also saw the respondent, who proposed to continue his intimacy with Maria Smith. He mentioned it to the petitioner, and although she appeared shocked she did not forbid it. She never said that she would agree to the respondent living with Maria Smith, and on the day the agreement was signed the petitioner and respondent settled the terms themselves in a private room in his office at Wakefield; but his impression was that it was quite understood that the respondent was to continue to live with Maria Smith. He admitted that Mrs. Ross was at this time becoming very destitute, the respondent having deserted her for a considerable period, and added that if the respondent had refused to come to terms he should have brought the matter into Court. On behalf of the petitioner, Miss Ross was called. She stated that Maria Smith had been a servant in the house, and that from December, 1864, until September, 1865, the date of the desertion, there were frequent quarrels between her father and mother about her, and that on all those occasions the respondent denied the intimacy. On the day the agreement was signed her mother said that she would never consent to his living with Maria Smith. The respondent declared that he was not living with her, and never intended to do so, and on their way to the railway station, after the agreement was signed, he repeated the assurance.

Dr. Deane (with him Bayford), for the respondent, submitted that, on the whole case, the plea of connivance was established. It was true the agreement was silent as to the future life of the respondent, but the circumstances under which it was entered into implied leave and licence. It did not matter that the consent of the petitioner might have been an unwilling consent. —(He referred to Thomas v. Thomas (2 Sw. & Tr. 113).

Dr. Spinks (with him Pritchard), for the petitioner, in reply.—To constitute connivance there must be a willing consent.—Morris v. Morris (2 Sw. & Tr. 530; 31 L. J. Pr. & M. 69).

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—The principle on which the Court has to decide this case is this: The husband's adultery is proved, and the wife is entitled by law to a decree of judicial separation by reason of that adultery, unless he shews that she connived at it. Now connivance means consent. Volenti non fit injuria is the principle upon which the Court acts. It is said in this case that the wife has consented, and that the consent of the wife is shewn by her having executed a certain written agreement. The agreement, in substance, is an agreement on his part that she shall be allowed to live separate from him; that she may live where she likes and in what manner she likes; that he will not take any proceedings against her to bring her back to live with him; that she shall enjoy any property that may devolve upon her, and that he, the husband, will pay and allow her the sum of 88*l.* a year; and, upon her part, she promises not to contract any debts which the respondent may be called upon to pay; and that their young child, William Scarth Ross, shall be supported by her until he is five years old, when he is to be sent to school at the cost of the respondent. That is the substance of the agreement. It is to be observed that there is no agreement at all as to what the husband is to do. There is no statement to be found in the agreement as to the contemplated future life of the husband; and it is said, upon the authority of Thomas v. Thomas (2 Sw. & Tr. 113), that that is connivance. In Thomas v. Thomas (2 Sw. & Tr. 113), no doubt, the Court held that a deed of separation which recited the fact that the husband was then living with another woman, and that proceedings were actually pending in the Matrimonial Court on account of that adultery; and having recited these matters, the deed provided that the proceedings should be put an end to, and a certain sum of money should be settled on the wife, the Court held, that that was a sort of bargain between the parties that the husband was to continue to live in a state of adultery with the same person with whom he was then living. But it is obvious that there is a great distinction between the two cases. There is here no bargain at all; no recital about the woman Smith; and nothing is said about what the husband is to do. In Thomas v. Thomas (2 Sw. & Tr. 113), also, I find that the learned Judge relied very much upon a case in the Ecclesiastical Court, Barker v. Barker (Add. Ec. Rep. 285), and, on turning to it, I find it to be a very strong authority indeed, so far as the effect of a deed of separation is concerned. In that case it was said that the wife was living with another man, and that the deed constituted a licence or consent on the part of the husband that she should continue to do so; and I think it was so held in the first instance. But there was an appeal or some other proceeding, and upon that appeal Sir John Nicholl came to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the formal words in the deed that the wife might live separate and apart in such manner, in such place and with such person as she thought fit, as if she were sole and unmarried, the husband never did consent that his wife should live in adultery with another man. He said, "The presumption which it (the deed) would raise against the husband would, it is true, be the same in both Courts. But, whereas that presumption in the Court below was not, as I have said, rebutted by any evidence, it is in this appellate Court, I think, amply so rebutted. For the husband, in this Court, as he was fully entitled to do, has brought in a further allegation, pleading the circumstances under which the original separation was had, and the correspondence by letter which took place between him and his wife subsequent to the separation, as also the letter from the mother, in which she communicated to her son-in-law the information that he received of his wife's elopement. From the evidence taken upon this allegation and from the face of these exhibits, I collect both that the husband was not to blame in the matter of separation, and that the deed of separation was understood neither by husband nor wife as dispensing to either with the obligation of fulfilling the marriage vow in the article of fidelity so far as the consent of the other party was concerned, however the contrary might seem upon the mere wording of the deed." The learned Judge took what appears to me an extremely just and proper course. He forebore to rely wholly and solely upon the deed. He investigated the circumstances under which it was entered into, and he entertained the broad question whether, in point of fact, the deed and the circumstances that surrounded it were such as should satisfy the tribunal that the husband had connived at his wife's adultery. In these cases, it is in the interest of justice that the Court should take that view. In dealing with them nothing would lead to more injustice than what is called technical decisions. What a man writes is, no doubt, of greater force than what he says. What he does by deed has still greater stability or force in law than what he does by parol or simple writing, and the deed should be closely scanned to ascertain what it was that the parties were agreeing to. But, allowing all that, it is still proper to let in as much light as can be obtained by evidence; and then, when the whole matter is before the Court, it ought not to determine that the husband or wife consented to the adultery of the other, unless it is clearly proved that that was their intention when they entered into the agreement to separate. When we turn to the facts of this case, I am of opinion that there is no satisfactory evidence of connivance at all. There is not much difference in the case as made on the one side or the other; but it is remarkable that there is no proof before the Court that the respondent was carrying on an adulterous intercourse with the woman Smith at the time this agreement was made. When we come to the day on which it was signed, there is a discrepancy. Mr. Gill alleges that nothing was said. Miss Ross, on the other hand, swears that her mother declared she would never consent to the respondent living with Maria Smith, and that he assured her he had no intention of doing so; and it is to be remembered that Mr. Gill stated that they arranged the terms of the agreement themselves in a private room. On such evidence it is impossible to come to the conclusion that this woman ever did willingly, or in any terms, give her consent to a continuance of the intercourse with the girl Smith. I therefore think that the plea of connivance fails. In reference to what has been said on the subject of willing consent, if it were established that the wife had consented, as the consideration of obtaining the allowance, to the husband continuing this intercourse, it would, in my opinion, have amounted to connivance; even though the consent was extorted from her by pressure of the circumstances in which she was placed, unless the pressure amounted to that degree of force which would vitiate any agreement. She might be unwilling to consent; but if she withdrew her scruples in order to get the allowance, then I think she would have been guilty of connivance.

Judicial separation decreed.

petitioner the full costs of the suit in which she was successful, it was ordered that the respondent should have credit for the sum paid by him on account of her costs in the suit for nullity.

This was a petition by the wife for a dissolution of marriage, on the ground of adultery, cruelty and desertion. The respondent entered an appearance, but filed no answer.

The parties were married in 1854, and they cohabited at Dunkinfield, in the county of Chester, where the respondent carried on the business of an innkeeper. In February, 1863, he turned the petitioner out of the house, and they never afterwards lived together. In February, 1864, she instituted a suit for a decree of nullity, on the ground of the impotency of the respondent. The respondent answered and submitted to medical inspection, but did not appear at the hearing of the suit, which was dismissed—vide Tavernor, falsely called Ditchfield v. Ditchfield (35 L. J. Pr. & M. 51; L. R. 1 P. & D. 127).

The charges of adultery (which took place subsequently to 1863) and cruelty were proved, and the Court granted a decree nisi.

On the question of costs,

Searle submitted that the respondent ought not to be required to pay the costs of both suits. In the suit for nullity he had paid costs, on behalf of the petitioner, to the amount of 64*l*.

[The JUDGE ORDINARY.—In this suit he has failed; consequently it follows that he should pay the costs. But then comes the question whether he ought not to have credit for any costs he paid in the suit for nullity, which failed, and in my judgment properly failed.]

Dr. Spinks (with him Inderwick), for the petitioner.—It is hardly competent for the Court, so far as costs are concerned, to set off what occurred in a former suit as against this suit. Besides, in the suit for nullity the petitioner's case may have been perfectly true although she failed. The respondent's impotency might have been quoad hanc.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—I think that the respondent ought, in the costs he is condemned to pay in this suit, to have credit for the sum he paid in the former suit. I do not think it is competent for the Court in this suit to make any order as to the payment of costs in the other suit; but in ordering what is to be paid in this suit, it is competent for the Court to say that the whole or only a part of the costs shall be paid, and consequently it is competent for the Court to say that the whole of the wife's costs shall be paid after deducting the amount paid for her costs in the former suit. The respondent rendered himself liable by his misconduct in this suit, but he did not lay himself open to two suits. The wife, erroneously or improperly, took her first remedy against him and failed; and I therefore think that he ought not to be called upon to pay the costs of both suits.

Order accordingly.

Dissolution of Marriage — Husband's Petition — Marriage of Petitioner immediately after Decree Nisi—Decree made absolute—Discretion—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. s. 31.

for dissolution of the marriage, and a fortnight afterwards re-married. The Court being satisfied that in contracting the second marriage he honestly believed that the first had been dissolved by the decree nisi, and that he had no intention of committing adultery, exercised the discretion vested in it under the 31st section of the Divorce Act, and made the decree absolute.

This was the husband's petition for a dissolution of marriage by reason of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent. Neither the respondent nor the co-respondent appeared.

At the hearing, the petitioner (a tailor) conducted his own case, and the Court granted a decree nisi on the 28th of November, 1868. About a fortnight afterwards, on the 11th of December, 1868, the petitioner went through the ceremony of marriage with another woman, and cohabited with her. The matter having come to the knowledge of the Queen's Proctor, he entered an appearance on the 29th of April last, and filed affidavits with a view of shewing cause against the decree nisi being made absolute, on the ground that the petitioner had been guilty of bigamous adultery. The petitioner filed an affidavit in reply, in which he admitted the charge, but alleged that he had entered into the second marriage in ignorance of the law, believing that his first marriage was dissolved when the decree nisi was granted.

The Attorney General, Sir R. Collier (C. A. Middleton with him), for the Queen's Proctor, now shewed cause against the decree nisi being made absolute. —It might be true that the petitioner married in ignorance of the law; but in a criminal Court ignorance of the law would not be held as an excuse.

Inderwick, for the petitioner, submitted that the case was one for the exercise of the discretion of the Court under the 31st section of the Divorce Act. All the circumstances attending the second marriage of the petitioner proved that he was acting in the bona fide belief that his first marriage was dissolved. There was no concealment; the petitioner published the marriage in two of the papers at Ipswich, where he lived, and his adultery ought not therefore to be a bar to his relief.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—In any view of the case, the Queen's Proctor has done good service in bringing this matter to the attention of the Court. The ground on which the petition is said to have acted is want of knowledge of the effect of a decree nisi, and the greater publicity given to proceedings of this character the less likely is it that an occurrence of the same kind will come again before the Court. But the Court has now to consider whether it will exercise the discretion vested in it under the 31st section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. The first question is, whether the Court is satisfied as to the bona fides of the petitioner; and looking to the manner in which the second marriage was contracted, and all the steps taken in regard to the event, I am prepared to give credence to what the petitioner says. I believe he did think he was released by law from the obligation of the first marriage, and that it was that which induced him to contract the second marriage, and to enter into a cohabitation which was, in truth, adulterous. It is said that ignorance of the law does not excuse a person in the criminal Court. That is quite true; and neither would it be an excuse in this Court if the Court had not a discretion vested in it by law. The Court is obliged to find upon these affidavits that the petitioner has committed adultery; but, says the 31st section, "the Court shall not be bound to grant a decree if it shall find that the petitioner has during the marriage been guilty of adultery." The Court, therefore, may or may not grant a decree according to the circumstances of the case. In a late case which came before the Court, and in which the Court was asked to exercise its discretion, upon the ground that the petitioner's adultery was more or less pardonable, the Court refused to do so, but pointed out that there were cases in which the discretion vested in it would be most fittingly and properly exercised. A reference was then had to a case which occurred in this Court where a man had been induced by his wife to believe that she was dead, and under these circumstances he re-married, and then when she came to life again, and he proceeded against her for the adultery of which she had been guilty, she answered, recriminating the adultery involved in his second marriage. The Court thought that the man was innocent of all intention to commit adultery, and granted him his decree. I think the same considerations prevail in this case. The Court is satisfied that in entering into this second marriage the petitioner acted bona fide, and that he did not imagine he was committing adultery. Under these circumstances, I think the adultery ought not to stand in the way of the decree to which otherwise he would be entitled.

Decree absolute.

Revocation—Will destroyed with an Intention to revive a Will of earlier Date—Declarations of Testatrix after Act—Intestacy.

WILL.—The testatrix executed a will which revoked an earlier will. Two years subsequently, while alone in her bed-room, she destroyed the later will, and immediately afterwards told her daughter that she had done so with the intention that the earlier will might take effect:—Held, that the destruction of the instrument under the circumstances amounted to an absolute revocation.

The deceased duly executed a will in August, 1863, by which she gave her property to trustees for the use of her only child (a daughter) absolutely, and appointed executors.

In March, 1866, she executed another will, by which she left the whole of her property absolutely and directly to her daughter, and made her and another person executors. In the month of February, 1868, the daughter on entering the deceased's room on one occasion found her mother alone, and the will of March, 1866, lying torn in pieces in the fire-place. The deceased then told her daughter that she had torn up and destroyed the will with the intention that the former will of August, 1863, might take effect.

Dr. Middleton now moved for probate of the draft of the will of March, 1866. In Powell v. Powell (35 L. J. Pr. & M. 100) the testator executed a will which contained a clause revoking all former wills. He subsequently destroyed such will, with an intention expressed at the time that the earlier will should operate as his last will; and it was held that the destruction of the second will was only a conditional revocatory act, and that the condition failing the revocation was not effectual. Here also, the destruction of the second will was only a conditional revocatory act, and failing to revive the earlier will the revocation was not effectual.

SIR J. P. WILDE.—The case differs from Powell v. Powell (35 L. J. Pr. & M. 100). The declarations of the deceased did not accompany the act; I must reject the motion.

George Casmore, late of Yardley Street, Clerkenwell, Middlesex, stationer, made his will on a printed form, on the 16th of April, 1864. After he had written his name in the testimonium clause, he asked the witnesses to subscribe and attest the instrument, which they did in his presence, and he then wrote his name beneath their signatures, remarking that they were witnesses to his will.

The witnesses in their affidavits stated that they were in the house of the deceased on the 16th of April, 1864, and that he told them he wished to make his will, and to secure his property to his wife; that he had a printed form of a will which would suit, and that he asked them to witness it. He then produced a printed form of a will, which he filled up in their presence, and having written his name in the attestation clause, he asked them to subscribe and attest the will, which they did in his presence. He then signed his name underneath their signatures, remarking that they were witnesses to his will. They further stated that he sold printed forms of wills in his shop, and that they believed he was aware of the legal requirements necessary to make the execution of a valid will.

Dr. Spinks moved for probate of the will to the wife as executrix. The presumption was that the deceased intended his signature in the attestation clause as the signature to his will, and that the second signature was for greater security. He referred to In the goods of John Walker (2 Sw. & Tr. 354; 31 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 62).

LORD PENZANCE.—The case cited is very much in point. It appears to be substantially the same as this. I am satisfied from the account of the witnesses that the testator intended to sign the will when he put his name in the attestation clause. Probate will issue, the signature of the testator under the names of the witnesses being omitted.

Will—Appointment of Executor—Receiver of Real Estate—20 & 21 Vict. c. 77. s. 71.—Practice.

WILL.—The Court of Probate has no power to appoint a receiver unless the validity of the will by which the real estate is affected is in dispute. It therefore refused to appoint a receiver when the only question was as to the person who was appointed executor in the will.

John Grant died on the 22nd of February, 1868, having duly executed a will and codicil. In the will he appointed an executor in the following terms: "I appoint my nephew, Joseph Grant, executor of my will." One of the plaintiffs, Joseph Grant, was a nephew of the deceased's wife, had been brought up and educated by the deceased, and lately had managed the deceased's business. The defendant, Joseph Grant, was a son of the deceased's brother.

A petition, answer and replication had been filed, in which the parties respectively claimed to be the executor named in the will, but the validity of the will was in no way questioned by them.

Dr. Swabey, for the defendant, moved on affidavit for the appointment of an administrator pendente lite, and of a receiver of the real estate of the deceased.

LORD PENZANCE.—The Court is empowered, by the 71st section of the Probate Act, "to appoint a receiver of the real estate of any deceased person pending any suit in the Court, touching the validity of the will of any such deceased person, by which his real estate is affected." There is no such suit pending in this case, and I have no authority to appoint a receiver.

PROBATE. May 25, 1869.

Administrator pendente Lite—Concurrent Suits in Court of Chancery and Court of Probate.

WILL.—The Court refused to appoint an administrator pendente lite where the Court of Chancery had already appointed a receiver of the personal estate and effects of the deceased intestate, but intimated that, if the Court of Chancery entertained an application for payment of the debts of the deceased, it would then appoint an administrator, if such appointment were necessary to effect the purpose of the Court of Chancery.

This was an application, on behalf of a creditor, for the appointment of an administrator pendente lite; and the question was, whether the Court would appoint an administrator where the Court of Chancery had already appointed a receiver of the personal estate and effects of the deceased.

Besides the administration suit pending in the Court of Probate, raising the question as to the rights of the plaintiff and the defendant to a grant of administration of the estate and effects of Lady Tichborne, deceased, there was also a suit in Chancery pending between the same parties. In such suit, Stuart, V.C. appointed Mr. Richard Humphreys receiver of the personal estate of the deceased, and by the terms of the order the receiver was directed, after passing his accounts on a specified day in each year, to pay in the balance of the estate to the Accountant General to the credit of the cause.

Dr. Deane, on behalf of Mr. Norris, a creditor, moved the Court to appoint Mr. Richard Humphreys also administrator pendente lite.—As receiver, he has simply power to collect the estate; as administrator, he will have power to pay the debts. There can be no prejudice to the estate, as the debts must be paid at some time.

LORD PENZANCE.—Has the Court ever made a grant of administration pendente lite on the application of a person not a party to the suit?]

I know of no case to that effect, but the act of 1857 has extended the power of the Court in this respect.—(He referred to Bellew v. Bellew (34 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 125) and Veret v. Duprez (37 L. J. Ch. 552).)

Dr. Tristram, for the plaintiff, consented to the appointment of an administrator, but objected to the receiver of the Court of Chancery being appointed.

The Solicitor General (Sir J. D. Coleridge), with him Bayford, for the defendant, contra.—The Court of Chancery has already made an order for the payment of the funeral expenses of the deceased, and there is no reason to suppose that it has not also power to order payment of the debts. Veret v. Duprez is a case in point against the application. There Malins, V.C. refused to appoint a receiver where the Court of Probate had appointed an administrator pendente lite. Even if an administrator is appointed, how is he to get the estate out of the hands of the receiver?

Digitized by Google

[LORD PENZANCE.—The question is, whether the Court should give him additional powers by appointing him also administrator pendente lite.]

As receiver he is bound to pay the balance of the estate into the hands of the Accountant General, and to deal otherwise with the money would bring him into contempt in the Court of Chancery. The estate is small (1,500*l*.), and when the costs are paid very little will be left.

LORD PENZANCE.—There are many difficulties in the way of this application. I do not know if there has ever been an application before to appoint an administrator pendente lite, except at the instance of a party to the suit. At the same time I was struck on reading the papers with this, that if there is a creditor, say for 100*l*., and a sufficient estate, it seems contrary to justice and good sense that he should remain unpaid while the two relatives are squabbling as to which should take the administration. It would be desirable, at least, that provision should be made to deal with such a state of things, but, as I have said, I am not aware at present of an administrator pendente lite having ever been appointed at the instance of a person not a party to the suit. Then comes the more material question, whether it would be desirable to appoint an administrator when there is already a receiver appointed by the Court of Chancery. As to appointing any person but the receiver, that is out of the question. If any one else were appointed and the estate were not got in, there would be two persons making claim to it and contending for its possession. But even though the same person were appointed administrator and receiver, another difficulty presents itself. The person who has got in the estate has got it in under an order of the Court of Chancery, and that order is to the effect that, when he has got it in, he is within a certain time to file his accounts and pay in the balance to the Accountant General. Here, then, he has a distinct authority from the Court of Chancery to pay the money in the direction indicated by its order. If appointed administrator pendente lite, he would have authority to deal with the same money in an entirely different manner, and thus there would arise a sort of conflict between the Courts, which is very undesirable. Again, I am by no means satisfied that in a case like this, where there is a sufficient estate and a clear good debt, the Court of Chancery has not the power to order that debt to be paid. At any rate, it seems to me that the Court which has appointed the receiver, and under whose order the estate has been got in, is the Court to which application for the payment of this debt should, in the first instance, be made. I shall, therefore, for the present, refuse the application. But if the Court of Chancery should say that it would be desirable from any technical reason that an administrator should be appointed, I shall then be happy to make the order, and to carry out its purpose.

MATRIMONIAL. June 2, 3, 1869.

Dissolution of Marriage—Intervention by Queen's Proctor—"Neglect or Misconduct"—Connivance—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. s. 31.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—The "wilful neglect or misconduct" which, by the 31st section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, is made a bar to the husband's right to a decree is not that neglect or misconduct which may have led to any particular act of adultery after the wife's lapse from virtue, but the neglect or misconduct which has directly conduced to her fall.

In this case a decree nisi was granted for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the respondent's adultery with the co-respondent.

The Queen's Proctor subsequently obtained leave to intervene, and filed pleas in which he charged the petitioner with collusion, connivance, the suppression of material facts and misconduct conducing to the adultery of the respondent. The petitioner traversed these allegations. The facts are so fully set out in the judgment that a brief outline of the case will here suffice.

The petitioner, a solicitor, married the respondent, who was the daughter of an Irish gentleman, in September, 1859, and they cohabited first at Clifton and afterwards at Maidenhead. About the end of 1865, or early in January, 1866, Mrs. St. Paul went to a hydropathic establishment at Blarney, near Cork, where her father resided. While there she made the acquaintance of the co-respondent, Captain Duncan Anderson Farquhar, whose regiment was at that time stationed at Cork. At Easter, 1866, Mr. St. Paul visited his wife at Blarney, and was introduced by her to Captain Farquhar, who spent a few days with them by invitation. In the following July, the petitioner having in the meantime returned to Maidenhead, Mrs. St. Paul went to the Isle of Man, where she gave birth to a child, in January, 1867.

The petitioner (who was examined and cross-examined by permission of the Court) admitted that before her confinement he had entertained some doubt as to the paternity of the child, and that he had said if its hair were of a certain colour he should know that he was not the father, but he declared that his doubts were removed by the explanation of his wife, and that his remark as to the child's hair had no reference to Captain Farquhar. He was with his wife during her confinement, and learned from her incidentally that Captain Farquhar with some friends had been at the island and had called upon her, and had partaken of some refreshment. She returned to Maidenhead shortly after her confinement. She still complained of being unwell, and asked to be allowed to visit the petitioner's mother at Clifton, to which the petitioner consented. A few days afterwards she informed him that she had had the offer of a return ticket to Dublin, and suggested that he should allow her to avail herself of it in order that she might visit her father at Cork. She also stated that Captain Farquhar was going to Ireland at the same time and that he would act as her escort. The petitioner was himself anxious that she should see her father about a pecuniary matter in which he was interested, and assented to the proposed arrangement, it being understood that the respondent was to return from Cork to Bristol. She accordingly left for Dublin with Captain Farquhar, by the night mail, on Sunday, the 24th of February, 1867, and slept with him that night at Stafford. Arrived in Dublin she wrote to say that she should not be in Cork for the next week, and requested that letters or parcels might be forwarded to her hotel. To this the petitioner replied:

"27th February, 1867.

"My dear Lucy,—I cannot help saying I am vexed much that you did not go straight to Cork as intended. You were well aware a word in season might be beneficial in a certain matter. You would have been in ample time, since I have not as yet heard from father. I shall blame you greatly if the affair miscarries. If you knew of this before starting, you ought to have informed me. If, on the other hand, this is a new scheme, surely you ought to have told me in your letter with whom you are staying. If at a friend's house I might not see so much objection, but at a hotel to allow other people to incur expense is very wrong. I, of course, assume you are not reckless enough to incur such expense yourself. You keep far too much back from me. I cannot see why (as you are allowed every liberty) you should do so. I had before the receipt of your letter posted one to Cork. I have consequently been obliged to write to your father to explain why you were not with him. Please go at once to him on receipt of this letter. All letters will be forwarded."

A few days afterwards he received the following communication from his wife:

"Reynolds's Hotel, Dublin, 3rd March, 1867.

"My dear Albert,—Papa is here, and means to write to you to-night, and I scarcely know if the subject of his letter will surprise you; I think not. When I said good-bye to you on Sunday evening I meant it then and mean it now to be final. I shall never live with you again. You will have as little to do with me as though I never existed or that I was dead. This I feel sure will be some consolation to you, and will enable you to bring your bachelor habits and ménage to great perfection; and so I pray you grant my last request, the necessary separation. This can be soon arranged, in a few days, and so the whole matter settled, unless you require time for any consideration. Let me hear from you as soon as possible, as any unnecessary delay here will be inconvenient to me; and I presume in this matter I may look for as much courtesy from you as you would vouchsafe to a perfect stranger."

The petitioner immediately proceeded to Dublin, where he met the respondent's father, and went with him to her hotel. A reconciliation was effected, and the three dined with Captain Farquhar in the evening. Mr. St. Paul left the hotel after dinner, and the respondent and the co-respondent slept there together the same night, but he declared that when he left he was under the impression that Captain Farquhar had started for Newbridge, where his regiment was quartered. In the following May he discovered that his wife was still carrying on a correspondence with Captain Farquhar, and taxed her with her guilt, offering, however, to continue the cohabitation if she ceased all intimacy with him. This she refused to do, and ultimately, on receiving an undertaking in writing that no claim for damages would be made, both she and the co-respondent confessed the adulterous intercourse, placing the occasions of their guilt at Stafford and Dublin in February, 1867. This was the adultery charged in the petition; but the evidence adduced on behalf of the Queen's Proctor proved that the intercourse had been established as early as January, 1866. It was also proved that after the Queen's Proctor had intervened, the co-respondent's solicitor offered Mr. St. Paul 1,000*l.* to withdraw the petition, and that he indignantly refused it.

The case was heard before Lord Penzance, on the 2nd and 3rd of June.

H. Giffard (with him M'Intyre and E. J. Dunn), for the petitioner.

Pritchard, for the co-respondent.

Dering v. Dering (37 L. J. Pr. & M. 52; L. R. 1 P. & M. 531).

Lord Penzance.—The facts of this case force upon the Court a very difficult and very critical duty. I may say at the outset that no one who has heard the evidence can doubt that if Mr. St. Paul has suffered both by mental anxiety and by the costs incurred in these proceedings, he has only himself to blame. Because, whatever view the Court may take of the legal result of his conduct, nobody can doubt that he was wanting in decision, wanting in firmness, wanting in a manly assertion of his own rights, and I should say also, wanting in judgment with regard to the facts that were brought to his cognizance, and the course that he ought to take. It is these deficiencies on his own part that have led to these proceedings.

Turning from the petitioner to the respondent, it is equally plain from the evidence that she was a very self-willed, determined woman, who cared little or nothing for her husband from the outset, who was determined to have her own way, and who appears, as far as I can judge, to have obtained a sort of moral ascendancy over her husband, which enabled her to have that way whenever she was so minded. The Queen's Proctor, instigated, it is said, by the co-respondent, or, if not by him, by his father, who wishes to stand in the way of this decree being made absolute, has brought before the Court various facts and made certain charges; and I may say, in passing, that it seems to me to be no wrong whatever that a co-respondent or a respondent should furnish to the Queen's Proctor these facts in cases of this kind. It is for the Queen's Proctor, when he has the facts, to submit them to Her Majesty's Attorney General, and it is then for the Attorney General to consider and direct whether in the interests of the public the expense ought to be incurred of proving the facts with a view of stopping the decree. To my mind, therefore, it matters little or nothing from what source the information came. I have to deal with the facts as they are proved, and to ascertain to the best of my ability whether they support the Queen's Proctor's pleas.

The substance of the complaint against the petitioner is twofold. The first complaint against him is, that he was guilty of conduct conducing to his wife's adultery. The language of the statute is, that the Court may withhold a decree where it is satisfied that the petitioner has been guilty of "such wilful neglect or misconduct as has conduced to the adultery." Now that is a most salutary provision. It is salutary as regards the public, because it is some safeguard against a man first throwing his wife into temptation, first allowing her to be exposed to the addresses of other men, and then afterwards casting her aside. But it is also a measure of fairness to the wife herself, because if a wife can come to this Court and say, "Notwithstanding that I have sinned my sins really have been brought about or very much helped forward by the carelessness, neglect and indifference of my husband," that is a matter which clearly ought to be taken into consideration even in favour of the wife who is herself a sinner.

But this is very delicate ground, and the Court must be very careful in applying the provision of the section, that it is able to see its way pretty clearly to the conclusion that the conduct of the husband did really conduce to the adultery of the wife before refusing a decree. The statute says, "conduce to the adultery," but in reflecting upon those words of the statute the conclusion at which I have arrived is this: That the legislature did not mean that a husband should be deprived of his remedy if his conduct had conduced to any particular act of adultery after his wife's first fall from virtue, but that it meant that his remedy should be withheld from him, if he had so acted as to bring about the fall of his wife or the loss of her virtue. What the legislature appears to me to be pointing at under the word "adultery" is the lapse from virtue of the wife. And I think the intention was, that the husband, who had led to that lapse by his own conduct, should not afterwards take advantage of it. But it is quite consistent with that that a case might arise in which a husband would be perfectly blameless as to his wife's adultery in the first instance, and that after she had established her adulterous intercourse with another man the two together might throw dust in his eyes, and his conduct might appear more or less neglectful. It seems to me that the neglect which is followed by a subsequent act of adultery, after the loss of virtue by the wife, is not the neglect which the statute meant; it must be that neglect which conduced to the fall of the wife.

Now the circumstances of this case bring that distinction into prominent relief. The lady went in 1865 or the beginning of 1866 to stay at a hydropathic establishment, about seven miles from Cork, where her father resided. It was at her father's instance that she went to this place; and, looking to the sort of life that the petitioner and his wife had led,—her determination to be as little with him as possible—the want of affection that appeared to exist between them, at any rate on her part, and the little control that he had over her, it is impossible to say that allowing her to go to that hydropathic establishment, avowedly for the sake of her health, was a matter that can be imputed to the petitioner as an act of wilful neglect. She goes there, and the Court fortunately has a date from the mouth of the groom of the co-respondent which fixes the period of her guilt; it does not indeed fix the first time, but it fixes a time at which this adulterous intimacy undoubtedly subsisted. The groom says, "About January, 1866, I saw the respondent go to the co-respondent's room at the barracks. After that she used to come with him once or twice a week. Sometimes she came on horseback. She always used to come with the co-respondent. She used to go into his room and remain alone with him for hours." It is quite plain, therefore, that in January, 1866, this adulterous intercourse was thoroughly established, and that, so far as the wife's loss of virtue is concerned, whenever it first took place it had taken place long before the period which is afterwards spoken to as the date of the husband's visit. The husband never went to the hydropathic establishment until Easter, 1866. Well, what took place? The wife, carrying on at that time this illicit intercourse, persuaded the husband to ask the co-respondent over to the hydropathic establishment as his guest. He did so, and the co-respondent, I think, made himself agreeable to him, and offered to take him over to his rooms at the barracks to see some races or some other amusement that was going on. They also used to play billiards together, and were apparently on friendly terms. The Court has very little doubt that then, at that very time, whenever opportunity offered, the same adulterous intercourse was going on. But it is impossible up to this period to put one's finger upon anything that the husband had either done or omitted to do which led to the wife's misconduct. He had done nothing and omitted to do nothing. His position was that of a man who was hoodwinked for the time—who had no reason to suspect anything, because those who saw the lady and the co-respondent at the time, even the nurse who was constantly in the room with her, and living with her, declare that they never saw any signs of familiarity between these two people. Therefore, there really was nothing to shew the husband at that time that anything wrong was going on. It is said that he allowed her to go out riding with the co-respondent, but on turning to the evidence of the groom, I find he says he only took the horses over to the hydropathic establishment once while the husband was there, and the husband swears that it was so; that the horses were brought there once, but that he rode out with them, and was by his wife's side the whole day. Therefore, carefully looking at the evidence at this period of the transaction, the Court is really unable to discover anything in the charge against the petitioner as to neglect or misconduct.

The subsequent history of the case is, no doubt, very different. In Easter, 1866, this visit of the husband was paid. The lady remained at the hydropathic establishment until the month of July following. She then writes to him and says she wishes to go to the Isle of Man. I put the question to him, and he swears positively that he objected to her going to the Isle of Man. There does not seem to have been any reason for it. The reason that she assigned was, that they were badly off, and the Isle of Man was a cheap place; but to the Isle of Man she went, and after she had been there some time she came back to the mainland and went down to Maidenhead, where her husband was living. She then returned to the Isle of Man; and after she had got back, as far as I can gather dates correctly, the co-respondent seems to have come and stayed there three or four days.

Now, to shew the footing the parties were on at that time, the husband had "asked" her (that was his expression) to be allowed to come and see her at the Isle of Man, and she refused. Well, he seemed to have acquiesced in that refusal, and accordingly went to spend his Christmas with his relatives at Clifton. When he returned to business he again wrote to her, saying, "Your confinement is about to take place, and may I come and see you?" She answers by telegraph, "Yes, you may." Thereupon he did so. He arrived a week before her confinement and stayed with her during her confinement. Now, the Court is at a loss to see any other object in the petitioner going there at that time, except the pleasure of indulging his affection and being with his wife. She was about to undergo her confinement, and it appears to the Court that the petitioner had a most praiseworthy motive in going and remaining by her side on the occasion. When he got there, he said at first that he did not learn that Captain Farquhar had been in the island. It afterwards turned out, upon better reflection, that he did learn the co-respondent had been there, but then it came out incidentally. It was said he had been there with some other gentlemen, and it arose upon the question how some wine came into the house, which the wife explained in that way. Well, up to that time the Court must bear in mind that there is not a tittle of evidence to shew that Mr. St. Paul knew of the adultery that had taken place at the hydropathic establishment while the respondent was resident there. There is not a tittle of evidence to shew that any familiarity had been seen or known to have taken place between her and the co-respondent. We now know that there was flagrant, open adultery carried on from week to week, from day to day, the lady visiting the barracks where this man lived; but the petitioner did not know that, and the mere fact that she told him that Captain Farquhar and some other gentlemen had come over to the island and had called and asked for refreshment, which led her to send for some wine, in the then state of the petitioner's knowledge, is not such a fact as, it seems to me, ought to have led him to take any definite step with a view to his wife quitting the Isle of Man or dropping the acquaintance of Captain Farquhar.

She was confined in January, 1867. She came over to England on the 18th of February in that year. She went down to Maidenhead with her husband. The next thing that happened is that, on Sunday, the 24th of February, or the day before, she announced to her husband her intention of going to Clifton—so he says. She seems never to have been easy and at rest when she was at home at Maidenhead. He combated the idea of going to Clifton, but ultimately yielded; and then she said she had had a return ticket given to her to go to Dublin, and that she should also like to go to Cork and see her father, who was said to be unwell. There was likewise a pecuniary matter involved in this proposed visit to Ireland—some bill that had to be renewed or taken up, or an account guaranteed; and the husband was interested in her going to see her father. Well, the Court bearing in mind the position of the parties at that time, that the wife was carrying on this adulterous intercourse and wanting to get away from her husband in order that she might consort with the co-respondent, and that the petitioner was ignorant of it—the Court can understand perfectly well, that the wife might wheedle him into consenting to the proposed arrangement, or if she did not wheedle him into consenting, that she might be strong enough of her own will to force him into it. His representation is, that he consented reluctantly to her going. She did not seem to have made any concealment as to Captain Farquhar accompanying her, because she said that Captain Farquhar happened to be going to Ireland at that time, and that he had consented to escort her.

Now, no one can doubt that the arrangement by which this young lady was to travel down by the night mail to Holyhead, with Captain Farquhar, was a very imprudent one; but supposing that the husband saw no reason to suspect Captain Farquhar at that time, it is not an imprudence of that kind that would lead the Court at once to come to the conclusion that he had been guilty of wilful neglect or misconduct.

However, I have already pointed out what the Court has to inquire into at this period of the case, is not whether there was neglect or misconduct, but whether there was connivance; and in that aspect of the case everything that fell from all three of the parties, every expression used by the wife, by the respondent, and by the co-respondent, appears to me to negative the idea of connivance. She was making excuses. She was pretending about a return ticket, she was invoking her father's illness, she was raising this matter about the bill, all for the purpose of deluding her husband, and he was, no doubt, more or less deluded by it. When I say "more or less" I mean that a more vigilant man, a man of stronger temperament, would have probably burst the sort of veil that was thrown over this relation, and would have seen his way clearly to the thing that really existed. She went to Dublin, and then several letters passed between her and the petitioner. He thought she was going straight through to Cork. She writes from Reynold's Hotel, Dublin, and tells him that she is stopping there, upon which he writes and expresses his displeasure at it, and in doing so makes use of an expression about the expense, which very strongly attracted the attention of the Court in the first instance. He says, "Surely you ought to have told me with whom you were staying"— that is when he finds that she is staying in Dublin. "If you knew before you started of this" (that she was going to stop at Dublin) "you ought to have informed me. If, on the other hand, this is a new scheme, surely you ought in your letter to have told me with whom you are staying—if a friend's private house I might not see so much objection; but at a hotel, to allow other people to incur expense is very wrong. I of course assume that you are not reckless enough to incur such expense yourself." The natural suspicion that crosses the mind of the Court on reading that passage is this. He knew she had been there with Captain Farquhar, and who else did he think was paying the expenses, except this man with whom she had gone? But that may not have been, I think, what he meant, although it is open to that construction. The Court ought to see its way very clearly before it comes to an adverse conclusion on that matter, and when I look at this letter by the light of his subsequent conduct I see nothing to induce me to believe that he at that time knew that she was under the charge of Captain Farquhar, and that he was paying her expenses, although of course he might have suspected it, and probably did suspect it from what he afterwards said. He goes to Dublin, and then took place those various meetings that have been referred to at length in the evidence. The sum and substance of them is this: that his wife had before he got there pressed upon her father the necessity for a separation; that appears most distinctly from the father's letter written at the time. It is equally plain from the father's statement, and from the statement of the petitioner himself, that he opposed a separation. He went to the father, and with the father he went to the hotel and saw his wife. The account he gives of that interview sheds a pretty strong light on the temperament and nature of this lady and the terms they were upon. The father said that he found upon consideration, and after talking with his son-in-law, that there was no need for a separation, upon which the wife called him an "old weathercock," and got very angry with him for having changed his opinion. When he burst out crying she said he was an old fool, and that his tears were very near his eyes. That seems to have been a somewhat boisterous meeting, and in the course of it no doubt the petitioner ascertained by finding a great-coat in the room that Captain Farquhar had been there. Afterwards he saw Captain Farquhar. The question is, upon all that took place between them, was there anything to lead the Court to the conclusion that the petitioner either knew of the adultery, or so strongly suspected the adultery of his wife on sufficient grounds, that he could be said to have connived at or acquiesced in it? It seems to me that the whole tendency of the evidence is the other way. He wanted her back; he was averse to a separation. The father and the co-respondent both tried to persuade him, and succeeded in doing so, that nothing wrong had taken place. He went down stairs to ascertain whether his wife and the co-respondent had been living at the hotel as man and wife, and was told that they had not, that they had separate rooms; and he tried also to ascertain whether the co-respondent had undertaken to pay for his wife, and could get no satisfactory answer about that. The result of the whole is, that there was a good deal of weakness on his part, and want, as I said before, of proper spirit and determination in the matter; but I do not think that there was connivance.

Well, then, the rest of the history is soon told. He gets his wife back to London, and endeavours, but in vain, to withdraw her from this man, the co-respondent. He more and more suspects her guilt, and charges her with it. At first she admits it, and declares that she will give him the proofs. Afterwards she retracts the confession and leads him to believe that there was no guilt; and then, at last, there comes the meeting at Maidenhead, when she and the co-respondent openly and unblushingly tell him that they had been guilty over and over again, placing the first occasion of their guilt at Stafford.

Now, here, again, if I am asked whether there was connivance—whether all this was taking place with the consent of the husband—I say here is a letter of the co-respondent, written on the 8th of May, which dissipates the possibility of any such conclusion, because it is an answer to a letter in which the petitioner had charged this man with being guilty with his wife, and in terms desired that he would cease all correspondence with her, and here is the manner in which that communication was answered: "Cambridge House, Piccadilly, May 8th, 1867. —Dear Sir,—I am only just in receipt of your letter, dated Maidenhead, 6th of May. In answer, I beg to say that I have no intention to explain what you ask, as I have nothing to explain. I was on an intimate acquaintance with both your wife and yourself, and until you give me some reason to withhold correspondence in a friendly way with your wife, I shall always act as I have hitherto done. I can but ascribe your ridiculous epistle as an after-dinner ebullition of temper, and as such I treat it. If your lucid memory had been of any service to you when you penned your epistle, you would have remembered that in Dublin (of which time you speak) you asked me to assist you in inducing your wife to return to England. I consider your conduct somewhat strange, especially as you yourself had made arrangements for me to escort your wife to Ireland. Did not I treat the insinuation in your letter with the ridicule it deserves, I should take matters into my own hands." A high-handed, impudent letter, in which the co-respondent is repudiating the slightest insinuation against him, and openly telling the petitioner that inasmuch as he has nothing with which to charge him, nothing which he can put on paper and prove, he shall continue to carry on his correspondence with his wife. It is impossible, unless the Court believes that letter to be part of a plan or a scheme to defeat the ends of justice, or to cause a false complexion to be put upon this case—treating that as genuine, it is impossible to imagine that the husband, who wrote the letter to which that is an answer, was all the time conniving at the wife's adultery. It seems to me, therefore, that upon the whole facts of this case, neither the charge of collusion nor connivance has been made out against this gentleman.

As I have said before, there was much in the case that the Court might reprehend. There was much in his conduct in 1867 which, if it had been followed for the first time by his wife's adultery, might have led to a very different result to that at which the Court now arrives. There was much in his conduct in the spring of 1867—the visit to Dublin, his conduct at Dublin, and even in his subsequent conduct, which, if it had led to the first adultery and loss of virtue by his wife, might have induced the Court to come to the conclusion that the wife's sin had been caused by the husband's neglect or carelessness; but bearing in mind that the real adultery, the real seduction, the real loss of virtue by the wife, was a whole year before this, the Court can only look upon the matter in this light, that the two people who were principally concerned successfully contrived to throw dust in the eyes of a very weak and not very wise man.

It only remains for the Court to state what its finding is on the several issues which the Queen's Proctor has put forward. His Lordship then went through the several pleas, and found that the petitioner had not been guilty of collusion, connivance, the suppression of material facts, or of conduct conducing to the adultery of the respondent, but added that the Queen's Proctor had done right in bringing the matter before the Court.

Judicial separation at suit of Wife—Permanent Alimony—Custody and Maintenance of Children—22 & 23 Vict. c. 61. s. 4.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—The wife obtained a decree for judicial separation, on the ground of the adultery of the husband, who was of very profligate habits. The father and sister of the respondent offered to take charge of the two children of the marriage, daughters, and to bring them up in a manner suitable to their position in life.

The Court declined to deprive the mother of the custody of the children, and, in addition to permanent alimony at the rate of one-third of the joint income (798l.), ordered that the respondent should contribute 30l. a year towards their maintenance and education.

This was a suit, originally promoted by the wife for dissolution of marriage, on the ground of adultery coupled with cruelty. On the hearing of the petition she proved gross profligacy on the part of the husband, but failed to establish the charge of cruelty; and on the 18th of December, 1866, the Court pronounced a decree of judicial separation on the ground of adultery. Against this judgment she appealed to the House of Lords, but the appeal was dismissed.

The matter now came before the Court on application by her for permanent alimony and an allowance for the maintenance and education of the children of the marriage—two daughters, aged respectively twelve and ten years.

The Registrar reported the net income of the respondent at 550l. and that of the petitioner at 248l. per annum; both sums were taken by agreement. On behalf of the respondent, affidavits were filed by his father, a banker at Exeter, and his sister, who stated that they were willing to take charge of the children, and to bring them up in a manner suited to their future position in life.

Dr. Spinks (with him Dr. Tristram) submitted that the petitioner was entitled to at least one-third of the joint income as permanent alimony, and also to the custody of the children. No charge of misconduct was made against her.

Dr. Deane (with him Searle), for the respondent, contended that it would be for the advantage of the children to have them brought up by their grandfather, and that the Court ought to be influenced by that consideration. If, however, the petitioner elected to retain their custody, she was not entitled under the circumstances to claim from the respondent an allowance for their maintenance—Marsh v. Marsh (1 Sw. & Tr. 312; 28 L. J. Pr. & M. 13); Boynton v. Boynton (1 Sw. & Tr. 324); Whieldon v. Whieldon (2 Sw. & Tr. 388; 30 L. J. Pr. & M. 174); were referred to.

Lord Penzance.—I am clear in this case that the children ought not to be taken away from the wife and handed over to the husband's father, and for this simple reason, that the wife was clearly without blame in the suit. No charge is made against her, and she has done nothing whatever to forfeit her natural rights as a mother, or the indulgence of her affections in the possession and care of her children. All that has happened in the case has been the husband's doing. He was proved to have lived a very profligate life, and the wife has obtained a decree of judicial separation on the ground of that profligacy. In considering what ought to be done in regard to the custody and maintenance of the children, the Court always looks to see whose fault it was that led to the breaking up of the common home. In this case it was undoubtedly the husband's fault. Not only did he so act as to bring about the separation, but his misconduct was such that the Court could not possibly place these two children, both of them girls, under the control and supervision of such a man. All these cases must depend on their circumstances. It is impossible to lay down a principle one way or the other; but I am clear from the reasons I have stated that the children ought to live with their mother.

The next question is, whether any allowance ought to be paid by the husband towards their maintenance? Looking at the circumstances I have mentioned, the disqualification of the husband and the fact that his home could not be a proper resort for his children; and looking also at the incomes, I think that I ought to make some allowance. I allot to the petitioner permanent alimony at the rate of 266l. a year (one-third of the joint income); and, in addition, the respondent must pay 30l. a year towards the maintenance of the children; both orders to go from the date of the decree.

Will—Memorandum of Revocation—Probate—Practice.

WILL.—On the death of H. his will was found cancelled, and beneath the signature there appeared this memorandum, which was duly executed: "This my last will is hereby cancelled, and as yet I have made no other." The Court, following Brinchley v. Still, 2 Robert. 162, admitted the memorandum to proof.

The testator, Mr. Algernon Hicks, late of Connaught Square, Hyde Park, died on the 26th of April, 1869. On his death a will, dated the 4th of August, 1864, was found. It had been duly executed, but several bequests and the signature of the testator had been struck through with a pen, and beneath the signature was written this memorandum:

"14 August, 1868. Mem. This my last will is hereby cancelled, and as yet I have made no other.

"A. Hicks.

"Witnesses, { Ann Carter, cook, Mary Coles, housemaid."

There was evidence that the memorandum was duly executed by the deceased in the presence of the witnesses.

Dr. Tristram moved the Court (June 1) to decree letters of administration with the memorandum at the end of the will annexed to Mrs. Priscilla Hicks, the widow of the deceased.—He referred to Brinchley v. Still (2 Robert. 162).

LORD PENZANCE.—The will is revoked, and you are entitled to administration; but I doubt whether it ought to include the "memorandum." It seems to me to fall within the words of the statute as simply a "writing declaring an intention to revoke" and not entitled to probate.

The matter was again mentioned on the following motion day, and In the goods of Hubbard (35 L. J. Pr. & M. 27; 1 L. R. P. & D. 53) was referred to.

Cur. adv. vult.

LORD PENZANCE (June 22)—The question in this case was whether a paper signed by the deceased, and which in terms revoked a will under which it was written, was or was not properly executed. The Court, upon the whole, came to the conclusion that it was, and was prepared accordingly to let the administration go. But then the question arose whether the administration should go with this paper annexed as being of a testamentary character, or whether it should go without the paper annexed. Now, the section of the statute (1 Vict. c. 26. s. 20) which deals with the revocation of wills says that, "No will or codicil, or any part thereof, shall be revoked otherwise than as aforesaid, or by another will or codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, or by some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same," &c. The language of the statute therefore implies that a will may be revoked either by a subsequent will, or by something which is neither a will nor a codicil, namely, "some writing declaring an intention to revoke" the will. I had serious doubts whether this paper ought not to be looked upon merely as "some writing," and consequently neither a will nor a codicil, so as properly to be made the subject of a probate or administration with the will annexed. A case was however cited—Brinchley v. Still (2 Robert. 162)—in which a paper, not quite similar to this, inasmuch as the writer began by calling it a codicil, but which in substance was the same as this, because it did nothing and effected nothing except the revocation of a previous will; and there the learned Judge thought that probate ought to go of the paper. In deference to that authority, I think that in this case also the proper course will be to allow the grant to go with the paper annexed.

Dr. Tristram.—Will the grant include the revoked will?

LORD PENZANCE.—No. In Brinchley v. Still (2 Robert. 162) the previous papers that were revoked were not annexed.

Will—Execution—Codicil, Execution in accordance with the Forms of, although not Valid by, the Law of the Country where made—Confirmation—Foreign Law—24 & 25 Vict. c. 114.

WILL.—A testator made a will in India, and added a codicil at Florence. They were not witnessed, and were invalid both by the law of England and Italy. He wrote on the back of the will, at Genoa, a second codicil, which was also not witnessed, but which was well executed, though not valid, according to the law of Italy:—Held, that in determining the question whether a paper is valid as a testamentary instrument under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 114, the Court can have regard to the law of one country only at a time. It therefore declined to regard so much of the Italian law as held the second codicil well executed, and then, recurring to the English law, to apply the principle of confirmation, and refused probate of all three papers.

The testator, Capt. Horace Seymour Kerr Pechell, late of the Royal Artillery, died at Alton House, Alton, in the county of Hants, on the 20th of December, 1867, leaving behind him a paper writing purported to be a will, which was executed, in India, in 1863, but was witnessed by only one witness. On the back of the will he wrote two codicils, one at Genoa, the other at Florence; but neither was witnessed. They were as follows:

"Codicil, April, 1866.—I hereby leave (being of sound mind) 50*l.* to Caroline Anne Pechell, Bix Henley, Oxon.—Horace Seymour Kerr Pechell, Florence."

"Second codicil.—I hereby leave to Signor Zenone Pineschi 500 francs annuity, payable by my bankers, Messrs. Fleury Héraud, Paris.—Horace S. K. Pechell. Genoa, June 20, 1867."

The defendant Hilderley, as representative of the residuary legatee named in the will, propounded all the papers; the material allegation in the declaration being that they were testamentary documents made by the deceased, wholly in his handwriting, and signed by him; and that the last indorsement was a codicil and testamentary disposition confirming and incorporating the preceding written disposition, and was made by a British subject then residing in parts beyond the seas, to wit, Genoa, in the kingdom of Italy, and was wholly in his handwriting, and was executed in a manner valid according to the provisions of the laws of Italy. The plaintiffs denied the validity of the papers; and the case was heard before Lord Penzance on the 22nd of May.

Signor Ottolenghi, an Italian advocate, deposed that, by the law of Italy, the first codicil was void as a testamentary disposition, the day of the month being wanting to the date therein written; and as to the second codicil, his affidavit thus proceeded:

"And I further say that, according to the said testamentary laws of Italy, the second indorsement, assuming that the whole and each word thereof was written by the testator, would, taken by itself, so far as the extrinsic form is concerned, be valid as a testamentary disposition, but as a codicil containing merely an amendment to a will, the Italian Courts would not give it an independent existence, and would consider it to be valid or invalid according as the will to which it related is valid or invalid.

"And I lastly say that, by the testamentary laws of Italy, a will which is not itself executed in accordance with the requirements of the civil code of that country, and which is therefore invalid, will not acquire validity by the fact that a testamentary disposition properly executed is afterwards indorsed upon the back of it, even although such testamentary disposition refers in express terms to the date or contents of such will."

Underdown, for the defendant, argued that the Court was not bound to look to the character or effect of the second codicil according to the Italian law. It was a codicil, it was well executed, and it confirmed or incorporated the will. —He referred to Gordon v. Reay (5 Sim. 274).

Dr. Middleton, for the plaintiff.—The principle of incorporation does not apply. According to the English law no one of the documents is good; according to the Italian law no one of them is good. To make them valid the principles of both laws must be combined; but the Court will not do that. It will have regard either to the principle of the English law or the Italian law. Even assuming the second codicil to be valid, it will not suffice to confirm the will. There is no case in which the word "codicil" alone has been held sufficient to set up the contents of an unexecuted paper.—He referred to In the goods of Allnutt (3 Sw. & Tr. 167; 33 L. J. P. M. & A. 86).

Cur. adv. vult.

Judgment was given on June 8, as follows:—

Lord Penzance.—The testator in this case left behind him a paper writing purporting to be a will. It was executed by him in India, and at that time was not witnessed by more than one witness, if witnessed at all. This paper, it is admitted, fails for want of due execution, unless it is set up by one or other of the two codicils which are indorsed upon it. The first codicil appears to have been written three years after the will, when the testator was at Florence. It is holograph and signed by the testator, but not witnessed. It is also dated so far as the month and year are concerned, but not the day of the month, for it is headed, "Codicil, April, 1866." The second codicil is also holograph and signed by the testator, and is further fully dated. It is headed, "Second codicil." This codicil was executed in Genoa. Neither of these codicils having been duly executed according to the English statute, the first question that arises is, whether either of them was so executed as to constitute a valid testamentary disposition according to the law of Italy. The affidavit of the Italian advocate, which has been laid before the Court, establishes the contrary. As to the first codicil, it appears that the execution of it fails for want of the full date, including the day of the month, being inscribed thereon. As to the second codicil, it appears that the execution is sufficient, but that, being only a codicil to a will, it would not be upheld by the Italian law as an independent paper; and that, unless the will were valid, the codicil must fail with it. The affidavit further states that by the Italian law this codicil would have no operation upon the will, though indorsed upon, and referring to it. The will, therefore, being originally invalid, and the codicil having neither the effect of establishing it nor the right to be considered a testamentary paper standing alone, neither of these papers would be held valid in Italy, the country where they were made. It was, however, further argued that by regarding the validity of these papers, partly according to the Italian law and partly according to the English law, a valid will and codicil would be the result. The Court was invited to regard so much of the Italian law as held the second codicil well executed, and then, dropping the Italian law and recurring to the English, to hold that this paper being well executed, indorsed upon the will, and referring to the will, operated as a republication of the will, and thereby established it. Whether such would be the effect of applying the English law in the manner proposed, it is not necessary to discuss; for I am of opinion that, in determining the question whether any paper is testamentary, regard can be had to the law of one country only at a time, and that the mixing up of the legal precepts of two different countries can only result in conclusions conformable to neither. The Court, therefore, pronounces against all the papers; the costs of both parties to come out of the estate.

Will—Execution—Signature of Witnesses in Presence of Deceased—Evidence.

WILL.—A testator made his will, which purported to be witnessed by B, an attorney, and H, his clerk. On the death of the testator B. made an affidavit, in order that the executors might obtain probate in common form, as to interlineations and the due execution of the will, and this affidavit was filled in by H, who knew its purport. B. died about a year afterwards. H. then stated for the first time that the will was not witnessed in the presence of the deceased, and there was no evidence the other way. The Court, not being satisfied under all the circumstances with the evidence of H, declined to act upon it, and pronounced for the will.

The testator, Mr. Thomas Pearce, late of Albion Grove West, Barnsbury, in the county of Middlesex, died on the 4th of April, 1868, leaving a will, dated the 2nd of April, 1868, in which he appointed the defendants executors. The will was prepared by Mr. Charles Bell, a solicitor of large experience, from instructions given by the deceased, and had the following attestation clause:

"Signed, published and declared by Thomas Pearce, the testator, in the presence of us and in the presence of each other (all being present at the same time), who at his request and in his presence have subscribed our names as witnesses hereto.

"C. Bell, solicitor, 36, Bedford Row, London.

"J. E. Haynes, clerk to the above-named C. Bell."

Probate in common form was granted to the executors on the 23rd of April, 1868, an affidavit as to interlineations and due execution having been first made by Mr. Bell. This affidavit was on a printed form, and the blank spaces were filled up in the handwriting of Mr. Haynes. Mr. Bell died on the 17th of March, 1869. A few days afterwards Mr. Middleton, of the firm of Belfrage & Middleton, who succeeded to his business, requested Mr. Haynes to write out a rough statement of the circumstances which attended the execution of the will. Mr. Haynes thereupon furnished the following account of the transaction:

"I accompanied Mr. Bell in a cab to Mr. Pearce's, and, on the street-door being opened, we were admitted into the house by Miss Whipp and shewn into the parlour. Mr. Pearce was lying on a bed in the front parlour, and Mr. Bell went to the bedside. I waited in the back parlour, and at that distance I observed what took place, the parlours having folding-doors, which were thrown open and enabled me to do so. Mr. Bell first read to the deceased or said something to him about a deed of revocation,[1] and laid it down on the table, and then he read the will. When Mr. Bell had finished reading the will he beckoned to me to come into the front room, and the bell was rung for pen

(1) The object of the deed was to revoke a post-nuptial settlement made by the testator in 1854, in order that certain leasehold property therein mentioned might pass under the will. It was prepared by Mr. Bell, and was taken by him with the will to be executed by the deceased.

and ink. Miss Whipp answered the bell (she had been previously requested by Mr. Bell to retire) and produced the pen and ink, and raised the testator up and so held or supported him while he executed the will. Having executed the will the testator sank down in the bed in a very exhausted state, and, as I thought, in a dying state, and Mr. Bell seemed to have the same impression, for he said to me, on retiring to the back room, 'That was a very near thing.' Miss Whipp remained in the front parlour, and was shortly afterwards joined by Mr. Bell. After waiting in the back parlour about an hour, I saw Miss Whipp beat an egg and mix it with a liquid which she put to testator's mouth, and he swallowed it. He appeared to revive a little, but not sufficient to be enabled to sit up, and Miss Whipp tried to raise him in bed, but was not strong enough; whereupon she summoned Mr. Windred into the room, who lifted Mr. Pearce into a sitting position, in which position Miss Whipp supported him, and Mr. Windred left the room. The testator then received the pen from Mr. Bell and executed the revocation, but being to weak to write Mr. Bell directed me to guide the testator's hand, and the matter was completed. The anxiety consequent upon Mr. Pearce's condition, and my and Mr. Bell's watchfulness for the opportunity to get the deed of revocation executed, which, pro forma, should have been done before the execution of the will, caused us to neglect the attestation of the will in the presence of the testator. In fact, neither the will nor the deed of revocation was attested until we returned to the office; for as soon as the deed of revocation, which had been so anxiously watched for, had been executed Mr. Bell hastily snatched up both documents unattested. Mr. Bell being anxious to get back to his business, we hastily left the testator's house, jumped into a cab and returned to the office; and upon arriving at the office I immediately pointed out to Mr. Bell that the will had not been attested, whereupon Mr. Bell said, off-handedly, that it did not matter, and, at Mr. Bell's request, both the deed of revocation and the will were attested by us at Mr. Bell's office, in Bedford Row."

In his first draft of this statement Mr. Haynes said nothing about the attestation, either of the will or of the deed of revocation, but when his attention was called to the matter by a note in the margin by Mr. Middleton, "Query, whether the will was attested in the front or back room," he then added the further particulars as to the attestation taking place in Mr. Bell's office.

The probate having been called in at the instance of the plaintiff, the defendants propounded the will. The plaintiff pleaded that it was not executed in accordance with the provisions of the statute 1 Vict. c. 26; and the case was heard before Lord Penzance on Tuesday, June 15.

Keane (with him Dr. Swabey), for the plaintiff.

Dr. Spinks (with him Dr. Tristram), for the defendants.

Ballantine, Serjeant (with him Inderwick), for the intervener, who was beneficially interested under the will.

Mr. Haynes was called, and repeated, in substance, the account given by him in the above statement as to the execution and attestation of the will. On cross-examination he stated that he was cashier and accountant to Mr. Bell, and that he had attested two or three wills before. Mr. Bell was an experienced attorney, and had a large practice, and as a general rule was a man of great accuracy, and it was not until after his death that witness mentioned the matter about the attestation to anyone. He filled up the affidavit, and knew its purport.

Mrs. Winterburn (née Jane Whipp) was also called. She stated that she left the room at Mr. Bell's request, and did not see the will executed.

LORD PENZANCE.—The will in question was made by the testator, on the 2nd of April, 1868, in the presence of an attorney and his clerk. It was drawn by the attorney, a gentleman of large practice and forty years' experience; it was copied by his clerk, and it has a perfect attestation clause. So far as presumption is concerned, prima facie there could not be a stronger case upon which the Court would properly presume that the will was duly executed. But the matter does not end there, because after the death of the testator an affidavit was drawn out by Mr. Bell to swear to; the written parts of it were filled in by the clerk, and the parts so filled in by him, coupled with the printed matter, represented that the will was duly executed; that it was signed by the testator in the presence of the witnesses, and that the witnesses signed in his presence. The will was then proved. Mr. Bell died, and two or three days after his death Mr. Middleton, whose position in the matter I do not know, but who was then the employer of Haynes, asked him to make a statement in writing of the circumstances under which the will was executed; and thereupon Haynes made the statement which now lies before me.—[His Lordship read the statement, and continued]—This statement having been made, and Mr. Middleton observing that nothing was said about the attestation, put this query in pencil, "Was the will attested in the front or back room?" I asked Haynes whether he had told anyone as to the defect in the attestation, because if he had it might have come to Mr. Middleton's ears, and might have led him to make this inquiry; but it appears that Haynes had never mentioned it to anybody, and therefore the query of Mr. Middleton was rather a curious one. It may, however, have been a perfectly proper inquiry, and the Court is not disposed to place much reliance on it. The query was put down and answered, and when in the witness-box Mr. Haynes repeated the story. Now, I think too much has been said about his coming here with a fraudulent desire to conceal the truth. There is another and, as I think, a more proper question to ask, namely, whether the Court can rely altogether upon his memory in this matter. There was a deed to be signed as well as the will, and he may have mixed up the two things, and so satisfied himself that the will was not attested in the presence of the deceased when the circumstances may have occurred only in the case of the deed. The presumption, as I have said, is in favour of the will. The presumption is of course capable of being rebutted; but when two persons, one of them a professional man of large experience who well understood what the law required, have signed an attestation clause duly worded, the Court ought to have the strongest evidence to induce it to believe that the statement in the clause is not true. Nothing would tend more to greater uncertainty in the proving of wills than a contrary practice, and the consequence is, that where there is a duly worded attestation clause the Court is always in the habit of presuming as largely as possible in favour of the due execution of the instrument. The proof of the due execution lies upon those who set up the will, and when the two attesting witnesses come and swear that the will was not duly executed, and there is no evidence the other way, the Court has nothing upon which to take its stand in maintenance of the presumption. That was the case in Croft v. Croft (34 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 44; 4 Sw. & Tr. 10). In this case the Court has the evidence of only one witness to the fact that they did not sign in the presence of the deceased; and when I find that he stood by and assented to an affidavit made by his fellow witness, to the effect that the will was duly executed, and also remained so long without disclosing the alleged defect in the attestation, I cannot rely upon his recollection of what took place. Under all the circumstances I am not satisfied with the evidence, and I shall therefore hold that the will was well executed.

PROBATE. June 22, 1869.

Concurrent Suits in Court of Chancery and Court of Probate—Receiver of Personal Estate—Administrator pendente Lite at Instance of Creditors—Practice.

WILL.—Concurrent suits were pending between the same parties in the Court of Chancery and Court of Probate, and the former had appointed a receiver of the personal estate of the deceased. The Court, being satisfied that no conflict of jurisdictions would arise, and that the justice of the case required the order, appointed the receiver of the Court of Chancery also administrator pendente lite at the instance of the creditors of the deceased, with the view of enabling them to obtain speedy payment of their debts.

In this case the Court was moved (on May 25), on behalf of a creditor, to appoint the receiver, under the Court of Chancery, of the personal estate of the deceased intestate also administrator pendente lite. The Court refused the motion, but intimated that it would again entertain the application if the Court of Chancery thought that an administrator should be appointed before the debts of the deceased could be paid. The estate was solvent and the debts were admitted—see 38 L. J. P. & M. 55.

On the 12th of June, the matter was brought before Stuart, V.C., on a motion that an account of the intestate's debts might be taken in the suit, and a sufficient part of her personal estate appropriated for their payment. The Vice Chancellor was of opinion that a legal personal representative of the deceased should first be appointed, and recommended that the application to the Court of Probate should be renewed; adding that, if an administrator were appointed, his first duty would be to apply to the Court of Chancery to discharge the receiver, and that he would administer nothing without first going to the Court of Chancery.

Dr. Deane (Ramadge with him), on behalf of Mr. Norris, a creditor, now renewed the application, and stated that it was made on the suggestion of Stuart, V.C.

Dr. Tristram, for the plaintiff, consented to the appointment of an administrator, but objected to the receiver of the Court of Chancery being appointed.

Bayford, with him the Solicitor General (Sir J. D. Coleridge), for the defendant, opposed the motion.

LORD PENZANCE.—The argument in opposition to this motion starts with what is a palpable injustice; namely, that certain persons who are creditors of the deceased should wait to get their debts paid until two members of the deceased's family, or those who profess to be members of her family, have ascertained by a long litigation which of them is entitled to take out administration. That is a dispute plainly in which the creditors have no interest; and unless good reason were shewn, it would be a great hardship that they should be kept waiting for their debts, which I assume are not denied, until that litigation is concluded. Therefore, I should be strongly disposed to use any power that the Court has to help them on their way towards payment of their debts. This Court has no power to order their debts to be paid, but it has the power to take the first step towards it by appointing an administrator pendente lite. The first difficulty in the way of such an appointment is a technical one; namely, that no such order has hitherto been made at the instance of a person not a party to the suit. By the practice of the Prerogative Court, perhaps, that could not be done. But this Court has statutory powers, conferred by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77. s. 70, which says, "Pending any suit touching the validity of the will of any deceased person, or for obtaining, recalling or revoking any probate or any grant of administration, the Court of Probate may appoint an administrator of the personal estate of such deceased person," &c. There is no qualification in these words; there is nothing to limit the powers of the Court to cases in which the application for such an appointment is made by parties to the suit. The words are perfectly general, and seem to me to confer on this Court this power. Directly there is a suit either touching the validity of a will or touching the rights of different parties to a grant of administration, this Court has the power, upon the application of any person, if it think it just and proper so to do, to appoint an administrator pendente lite. Therefore, if there had been no precedent, I should be prepared to make one. The difficulty I had with the former application was this: I was told that a receiver had been appointed by the Court of Chancery, and that he had got in the estate; and it appeared to me that I should be creating a conflict of jurisdictions if I appointed an administrator pendente lite. But the remarks of the Vice Chancellor have relieved me from that difficulty. He suggested, as I understand, that the parties might again make an application to this Court for the appointment of an administrator pendente lite, and I gather from what he said that, as soon as he found anybody clothed by this Court with the power and position of an administrator, he would then discharge the order which he had previously made for a receiver; but that the Court of Chancery, would hold its hand over the administrator and make such order for payment of the deceased's debts as it thought right. Under these circumstances it seems to me that there is no danger of any conflict of jurisdictions, and, in fact, no difficulty or trouble whatever in the matter. It is, however, said that the appointment of an administrator will be worth nothing, inasmuch as by the rules of the Court of Chancery the costs of the suit must be first paid out of the estate. I do not know how that may be, but I must say it is hard justice if those who are the creditors of an intestate should not have their debts paid because the relatives of the deceased want all the money to carry on their litigation. But with that I have nothing to do. All that I have to do is, to see that I put these persons in the way of getting their debts paid. The order for the appointment of an administrator pendente lite will therefore go. The next question is, who should be the administrator? And as to that, I have no doubt that Mr. Humphreys, the receiver under the Court of Chancery, is the proper person to be appointed.

Dr. Deane asked that the creditors might be allowed the costs of the application.

LORD PENZANCE.—I think they ought to have their costs out of the estate, for the application was a part of the necessary process for getting their money.

Testamentary Suit—Guardian ad Litem—Next-of-Kin of Minor—Citation—Practice.

WILL.—The testator, by his will, appointed his wife sole executrix and guardian of his child, a minor of the age of eight years. The Court refused to appoint the paternal uncle of the minor guardian ad litem, with the view of contesting the validity of the will, until the mother was first cited.

The testator, David Jenkins, died on the 28th of November, 1867, leaving a will, dated the 26th of November, 1867, in which he appointed his wife guardian to his only child, eight years of age, and sole executrix.

Mrs. Jenkins proved the will on the 14th of December, 1867.

Bayford moved the Court to appoint John Jenkins, the paternal uncle of the minor, his guardian, for the purpose of calling in the probate and contesting the validity of the will of the deceased. As the minor was living with his mother he was not in a position to elect an independent guardian. He referred to the practice in the Court of Chancery—1 Sidney Smith's Chancery Practice, 7th edit., pp. 271-273.

LORD PENZANCE.—Does he propose to give security for costs?

Bayford.—I presume he will. He will at all events be liable for them.

LORD PENZANCE.—But may it not be a vexatious suit? I cannot grant the application behind the mother's back. You must first cite her to shew cause why the uncle should not be appointed guardian ad litem.

Petition for Alimony pendente Lite—No Answer—Respondent's Faculties proved by Affidavit—Practice.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.—The wife petitioned for alimony pending her suit for judicial separation. The respondent, who carried on the business of a quack doctor at Kingston-on-Hull, filed no answer.

The Court, in order to save expense, allowed the respondent's faculties to be proved by affidavit; but required that notice should be served on the respondent that the affidavits had been filed in the Registry, and that it was intended to ask the Court to allot alimony upon them.

This was a petition by the wife for judicial separation. No appearance was entered on behalf of the respondent. The matter now came before the Court on the petitioner's application for alimony pendente lite. In the petition she alleged that the respondent carried on business as a quack doctor at Kingston-on-Hull, in Yorkshire; that he had also property there, and that his net income was not less than 250*l*. per annum.

Dr. Swabey, for the petitioner, asked the Court to allow the respondent's income to be proved by affidavits. She had no means of her own, and the expense of bringing witnesses from Kingston would be very great.

LORD PENZANCE.—I think, in order to save the expense of bringing witnesses from the other end of the kingdom, that I should grant the motion; but you must give notice to the respondent that you have filed the affidavits in the Registry where he can see them, and that you intend to ask the Court to allot alimony upon them.

Affidavits as to the respondent's faculties were filed in the Registry, and on the 20th of July, alimony pendente lite, at the rate of 52*l*. a year, was allotted to the petitioner.

Dissolution of Marriage—Desertion—Agreement by Wife not to insist upon her Right to Cohabitation—Subsequent Petition for Restitution of Conjugal Rights.

father, not to insist upon her right to live with him. Subsequently she filed a petition for restitution of conjugal rights, but was unable to serve it on her husband, who left the country. On his return to England she again applied to him, but in vain, to provide a common home, and to renew the cohabitation:— Held, in a suit by the wife for dissolution of the marriage, that the wife having agreed to live apart from her husband, and cohabitation never having been resumed after such separation, the husband was not guilty of desertion.

This was a petition by the wife for dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery and desertion.

The respondent appeared, but filed no answer.

The marriage, which was a clandestine one, took place on the 20th of November, 1861, at the parish church of St. Marylebone, in the county of Middlesex. On the same day the petitioner and the respondent returned to their respective homes, the one to her sister's house at Houghton Regis, the other to his father's, at Doolittle Mill, near Barnstaple, the respondent promising that he would endeavour to prevail upon his parents to find a home for them. A few days afterwards the petitioner went to the respondent's father's house, but his parents would not allow them to cohabit; and ultimately, in consideration of a sum of 100*l.* paid to her by the respondent's father, she signed an agreement that she would not further molest him.

In March, 1862, she applied to her husband for further assistance, which was refused, and in the following April she filed a petition for restitution of conjugal rights, but was unable to serve the petition on the respondent, who sailed for Australia in the month of September in the same year. He returned to England in July, 1864, and in December, 1866, paid the sum of 10*l.* to the petitioner's solicitors in settlement of the costs incurred in respect of the petition for restitution. On his return from Australia the petitioner again applied to him, but in vain, to provide for her a home.

The case was heard (June 11) before Lord Penzance.

Inderwick, for the petitioner.

The charge of adultery was proved, and judgment was reserved on the question of desertion.

Judgment was given (June 29) as follows:

Lord Penzance.—In this case the Court took time to consider whether the petitioner was entitled to a dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery and desertion. The adultery was proved, and the question was as to the desertion. It appears that the parties were married unknown to the family of the husband, and that after the marriage they returned to their homes, he to his father's, the wife to her sister's house. Her account of the matter is this; she says: "We returned the same day to our own homes. He was to endeavour to get his parents to consent to find a home for me. Receiving no letter I went to the 'Mill' (his father's place), and he still said he would find a home in a day or two. I had to sleep away from him because his parents would not allow me to sleep in the house. He was much under the influence of his parents. I saw Mr. Chambers, and asked his advice. He saw my husband's parents, and the result was that I should take 100*l.* not to molest him any more." The receipt or the undertaking is not forthcoming, but the solicitor was called, and he says it was an agreement that in consideration of 100*l.* the petitioner should abstain from molesting her husband by insisting upon her right to live with him. The upshot of the matter then is this, that the wife consented shortly after the marriage not to insist upon her rights; that, in short, she resigned them for the sum of 100*l.*, and that they had never lived together since. According to the principle that I have endeavoured to lay down in one or two previous cases, that I think does not constitute desertion on the husband's part. The wife chose to bargain with him that they should not live together, and unless the cohabitation was afterwards resumed it seems to me that there could be no desertion. All that the wife is entitled to is a decree of judicial separation on the ground of adultery.

Clogstoun v. Walcott (5 Notes of Cases, 623), and Grimwood v. Cozens (2 Sw. & Tr. 364), considered.

The testator, Ebenezer Black, late of Grindon, in the county of Northumberland, farmer, died on the 8th of May, 1868. He made a will on February, 1865, and added a codicil in October, 1866. The codicil substituted an annuity of 100*l.* a year for a bequest of forty shares in the West Hartlepool Dock and Railway Company, which he had given by the will to his daughter Ann Jobling, and directed his trustees to dispose of his interest in his farm of Fenham Hill, farming stock, &c., and to hold the moneys arising therefrom in trust for the five children of his said daughter Ann Jobling. By a deed of gift dated the 25th of May, 1867, and in the terms following, he gave the same farm of Fenham Hill to his daughter and her children:

"I, Ebenezer Black, of the township of Grindon, in the parish of Norham, and also the occupier of the farm of Fenham Hill, in the county of Northumberland, on a lease of seven years unexpired, at the yearly rent of seven hundred, paying all rates and taxes, do give and devise all the property of the stocks, crops and implements of husbandry on the said farm of Fenham Hill aforesaid, to my daughter Ann Jobling and her children, under the covenants and conditions as stated in the lease, for their benefit respectively; my grandson Thomas Jobling to have the management of the farm as steward and keep regular accounts from year to year, and also to pay all servants' wages, rents, taxes and cesses from the produce of the farm during the continuance of the lease; and for so doing the said Thomas Jobling is to have 15*l.* a year; and after the expiration of the lease, the whole of the stock, crop and implements of husbandry will be sold and converted into money, and equally divided, share and share alike, amongst my five grandchildren, having already made a provision in my will in favour of my said daughter Ann Jobling, by giving her an annuity of 100*l.* a year during her life; as witness my hand this 25th day of May, 1867.

"EBENEZER BLACK.

"Witness to the signing hereof,
Adam White, writing clerk,
Berwick."

Subsequently he executed the following testamentary paper and gave it to his grandson, Thomas Jobling, the defendant, who retained possession of it until his death:

"Grindon, 19th October, 1867.

"I, Ebenezer Black, farmer, Grindon, parish of Norham and county of Northumberland, having already bequeathed to my five grandchildren, issue of my daughter Ann Jobling, to wit, Mary, Thomas, Jane, William and Ann Jobling, the lease, stock and profits, with everything upon and relating to the farm of Fenham Hill, they paying all rents, taxes and whatever charges may come against the said farm of Fenham Hill: in addition to which I now bequeath to each of the above-named children of my daughter Ann the sum of 300*l.* sterling money, when they attain the age of twenty-one years, out of my capital, to be paid to them individually by my executors.

"Signed by the testator as a codicil to his last will and testament in the presence of us, who in his presence and in the presence of each other have hereunto subscribed our names as witnesses.

"EBENEZER BLACK.

"Thomas Hood Mitchell.

"Andrew Elliott."

The will of February, 1865, and the codicil of October, 1866, were in the possession of the deceased, but they could not be found after his death.

The defendant, as a legatee named therein, propounded the paper of the 19th of October, 1867. The plaintiff pleaded that it was not executed according to the provisions of the statute 1 Vict. c. 26; that if well executed it was executed as a second codicil to his last will and testament; and that he destroyed the said will and first codicil with an intention to revoke the same and also the said alleged codicil.

The case was heard, before Lord Penzance, on Saturday, May 29th.

T. H. Mitchell proved the due execution of the paper. He stated that on the day it bore date the testator called at the Berwick Union Workhouse, of which witness was the master, and asked him to write a "codicil to his will," observing that his capital was increasing, that he had 1,500*l.* which he wished to give to the family of his daughter, and that he "had already provided a little for them by a farm and the stock upon it." The witness then wrote out the paper, copying the attestation clause from a printed form, and when it was executed the testator took it with him, saying that he should put it aside with his will and other papers.

Thomas Jobling, the defendant, deposed that in December, 1867, the deceased gave him the paper and said that it was something for the family, and that he did not wish his son James Black (the plaintiff) to know of it.

Dr. Deane (with him Pritchard), for the plaintiff.—The deceased meant to do something in addition to his will. At the time he executed the paper he had the will present to his mind, and he told the draftsman to "write a codicil to his will." It is dependent on the will and falls with it.

A. Staveley Hill (with him Dr. Tristram), for the defendant.—The deed of gift had practically annulled the first codicil. The reference in the paper is to the deed and not the will; and the evidence shews that it was the intention of the deceased that it should be independent of the will. The intention being clear, the paper is entitled to probate as a substantive instrument—Barrow v. Barrow (2 Lee. 335).

Judgment was given on the 29th of June as follows:

LORD PENZANCE.—In this case the deceased died having made several wills, but upon his death no will was found. There was, however, in the hands of a legatee an instrument made by the testator, and called a codicil, of the 19th of October, 1867. The codicil recited that the testator had already "bequeathed," as he called it, to his grandchildren everything upon and relating to a certain farm, and it then goes on to say, "in addition to which I now bequeath to each of the above-named children of my daughter Ann the sum of 300*l.* sterling money, when they attain the age of twenty-one years, out of my capital, to be paid to them individually by my executors." And the question in the case is, whether that paper can be admitted to probate. The codicil, I should say, speaks of his having "bequeathed his farm." It is in evidence that he had previously disposed of it by deed of gift, but the person who drew the codicil, and who was called as a witness, could not say whether or not the deceased was at the time speaking of the deed of gift which he made in May, 1867, and which was produced to the Court.

The ground relied upon against the codicil was that a codicil stood or fell with the will. No doubt that was a general proposition which obtained in the Prerogative Court, but it was subject to certain exceptions. I took the trouble to ascertain what under the old law were the exceptions, but the result of the cases does not appear to me to be by any means satisfactory. The earliest case is the case of Barrow v. Barrow (2 Lee. 335). There the testator made a will and a codicil, the whole effect of the codicil being to give the residue of his property to his wife. He afterwards burned the will, saying "it was useless, Mr. Wood (the gentleman who drew the codicil) having made his will for him." And here the Court held that it was clear the codicil was not destroyed by the burning of the will, but was a substantive instrument or testamentary schedule. The codicil gave the residue, and no one could say what was the residue unless he had read the will which disposed of the other portions of the property, but the Court nevertheless held that it was not destroyed by the burning of the will, but was entitled to probate as a substantive testamentary instrument. The next is the case of Medlycott v. Assheton (2 Add. 231), which was decided in 1824. There the will was made in April, 1820, and in December, 1820, the testatrix wrote a codicil, giving 100*l.* each to the two trustees named in her will, and dividing some trinkets among her family. In January, 1824, she looked over the papers in her writing-desk, several of which she burnt, and a few days afterwards wrote to her attorney, desiring him to destroy her will. The Court held that it was altogether a question of intention, and that the legal presumption that the codicil fell with the will might be rebutted by shewing that the testatrix intended the codicil to operate notwithstanding the revocation of the will, and as the circumstances were not sufficient to establish such an intention the codicil was held invalid. The next was the case of Tagart v. Hooper (1 Curt. 289), which was decided in 1836. The paper was found in the writing-desk of the deceased, and it commenced thus: "This is a codicil to my last will, and to be taken as a part thereof." The Court, in pronouncing for the paper, held that in all cases where a codicil had been considered void by the destruction of the will there were circumstances which shewed that the codicil was dependent upon the will. That put the burden of proof the other way. In the other cases it was laid down that the presumption was that the codicil was revoked when the will was revoked; but in this it was held that where the codicil was so revoked there were circumstances which shewed that it was dependent on the will.

These are all the cases on the point before the passing of the statute, and certainly their consideration leaves upon the mind no very definite idea of what is meant by "dependent on the will." In one sense, any codicil that makes any disposition of property at all must be considered to be dependent on the will which disposes of the rest; for the codicil conveys only a part of the testator's intention regarding his property, and the motives inducing that particular part of his intention cannot with any certainty be dissevered from the motives which induced the disposition of the rest. It is difficult, if not impossible, to predicate of a particular bequest in a codicil that the testator would have made it if he had disposed of his other property in any different manner than that expressed by his will. It may be that the independence of the will spoken of must be something of a more limited character. And the meaning of the cases may be that a codicil is independent of the will, unless it is of such a character that the giving validity and effect to it without the will to which it was intended to be attached would produce some manifest absurdity. I am not sure that even this rule is capable of being easily applied to all the cases that might arise; and I have serious doubts whether such a rule is to be gathered from the cases with sufficient distinctness to justify the Court in adopting it.

But all these cases occurred before the Wills Act. Now the 20th section of that act is most distinct and positive in its terms. It says: "No will or codicil, or any part thereof, shall be revoked otherwise than as aforesaid (marriage), or by another will or codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, or by some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same, and executed in the manner in which a will is hereinbefore required to be executed, or by the burning, tearing or otherwise destroying the same by the testator." There certainly is language as plain as language can be, to the effect that no will or codicil can be revoked except by some of the methods specified in the statute; and I should have had no hesitation in holding that the intention of the section was to do away with all implied revocations and relieve the subject from the doubt and indistinctness in which the cases had involved it. But there have been two cases decided since the act. The first of these is In the goods of Halliwell (4 Notes of Cases, 400). There the codicil was dated the 5th of September, 1845, and commenced thus: "This is a codicil to the will of me R. H., and which I desire to be added to my will"; and it related solely to accounts between himself and his partner, containing no bequest or appointment. The testator died on the 7th of September, 1845, and he expressly declared, shortly before the making of the codicil, that he had made a will and that it was then in existence. In that case the Court said that, supposing the will to have been destroyed by the deceased, the codicil would, upon the general principle, fall with it, but held that there was an exception in favour of the paper, inasmuch as it seemed to have been made for a particular purpose, and admitted it to proof. Then comes the case of Clogstoun v. Walcott (5 Notes of Cases, 623), in which the will was made in 1840 and the codicils in 1842. In April, 1846, the testator destroyed the will, and in doing so expressed anxiety about the codicils, observing to his brother, "It will not affect the codicils, will it?" In that case, for the first time, the Wills Act was cited, and the way the learned Judge referred to it was as follows: "Under the old law, the effect of destroying a will was, by presumption, to defeat the operation of the codicils to that will; but by the present law there must be an intention to destroy. Here, however, the deceased did not mean to destroy the codicils, which remain entire, but, on the contrary, he expected at the time, and declared afterwards, that the parties interested in the codicils would have the benefit of the legacies he had given them. I am of opinion that the Court is bound to pronounce for the validity of the two codicils, and I decree probate of them to the brother, who is executor according to the tenor in the first codicil." Since this Court was established a case occurred—Grimwood v. Cozens (2 Sw. & Tr. 364)—which was heard in 1860, and in that case Sir Cresswell Cresswell said, "I think it has been established by the cases cited at the bar, that previous to the passing of the 1 Vict. c. 26. a codicil was prima facie dependent on the will, and that the destruction of the latter was an implied revocation of the former; and, moreover, that Sir H. J. Fust was of opinion that no alteration of this principle was made by the passing of the statute. The question, then, is entirely one of the intention of the deceased. Where a will and codicil have been in existence, and the will is afterwards revoked, it must be shewn, by the party applying for probate of the codicil alone, that it was intended by the deceased that it should operate separately from the will; otherwise it will be presumed that, as the will is dstroyed, the codicil is also revoked."

Now, in reviewing these decisions, I cannot perceive that the effect of the statute has been fully considered by the Court. Sir Cresswell Cresswell seems to have thought that it had been decided that the statute made no difference, and passed it by as having been so; and Sir Herbert Jenner Fust dismissed the point without any reasoning whatever, merely affirming that the statute had made it necessary that there should be an intention to revoke. But the statute says nothing of the kind; and unless it makes an actual revocation necessary, it does not interfere with the existing law at all. In this unsatisfactory state of decision, I think I shall do best in such a case as the present by adhering to the statute, and by holding that as this codicil has never been revoked in any of the modes indicated by the statute as the only modes by which a codicil is to be revoked, it remains of full force and effect, and is entitled to proof.

Probate of the codicil decreed.

Practice—Testamentary Suit—Examination de bene esse of Surviving Attesting Witness—20 & 21 Vict. c. 77. s. 32.

WILL.—In a testamentary suit, pending in the Court, an order was made, on the application of the executors, the plaintiffs, for the examination de bene esse of the surviving attesting witness to the will, upon affidavits which stated that he was sixty-five years of age, and that the plaintiffs could not safely proceed to trial without his evidence, but were silent as to his then state of health.

The plaintiffs, as executors, propounded in a declaration the will of Mr. E. B. Brown, late of Ealing, in the county of Surrey, who died in May, 1869. The defendant pleaded that it was not executed according to the statute 1 Vict. c. 26; that certain alterations in it were not made prior to its execution by the testator; that at the time of its execution the testator was not of sound mind; and that he did not know and approve the contents thereof.

Dr. Tristram, for the plaintiffs, moved the Court to grant an order for the examination de bene esse of James Secker, the surviving attesting witness to the will. He submitted that the Court was empowered to make the order by the 32nd section of the Probate Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), which confers on it in such matter all the powers exercised by the Courts of Common Law at Westminster. And in support of the application, he relied on two affidavits: one by the plaintiff, to the effect that Secker frequently suffered from ill-health; the other by the plaintiff's solicitor, to the effect that Secker was sixty-five years of age, and that the plaintiff could not safely proceed to trial without his evidence.—He referred to Daniel's Chancery Practice, vol. 1, p. 853.

Bayford, for the defendant, opposed the application.—Secker was, no doubt, the surviving attesting witness; but Mrs. Hamonts, a legatee, was also present, and could be examined as to the due execution of the will. Further, his cross-examination would disclose the defendant's case. The cases in Chancery did not apply; and, as to the practice of the Courts of Common Law, the witness at the time of the application should be in such a state of health, certified by a medical man, as to render it improbable that he would be able to attend the trial before an order for his examination would be made. Here there was no such statement or certificate.—He referred to Lush's Practice, vol. 1, 3rd edit. 511.

LORD PENZANCE.—The first question is, whether the Court has power to grant the application? I think it has. The 32nd section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77. not merely confers upon the Court this power; but it also in so many words confers upon the Court all the powers given to the Courts of Common Law at Westminster by the 13 Geo. 3. c. 63. and the 1 Will. 4. c. 22. I am therefore clear that the Court has the power. It is said that, under the circumstances of the case, the Courts of Common Law would not grant an order for the examination of the witness. But that is one of the misfortunes of their practice, because the Court of Chancery might, in the meantime, step in and grant the relief refused by the Court of Common Law; and nothing, I think, is of greater evil than that a suitor should be obliged to go from the Court in which the suit is pending to some other Court to get that relief which the Court in which the suit has been instituted has the power of granting. I am satisfied that the Court of Probate has the power, and ought to exercise it where the testimony of the witness is so material that its loss by his death would be a serious injury to the suit. It is said that the witness is under seventy years of age; but it is idle to draw a distinction whether he is sixty or seventy. The substance of the matter is this: is his testimony so pertinent to the point at issue as to make it of that valuable character that if it were lost the interests of the suitor would be seriously compromised? I think that is the only way in which the Court can apply the rule. This witness being an attesting witness, falls within the category I have named, and I think he should be examined. On the other side, the only real objection is, that they would disclose their case by his cross-examination. But that is the case in Chancery where a bill of discovery is filed, and is the case at Common Law where interrogatories are delivered. The notion that an advantage is to be gained by leaving a case in the dark is, I am happy to say, exploded in modern times. The advantage is, I think, the other way. I am therefore not at all pressed with the difficulty suggested on the part of the defendant, and shall make the order for the examination of the witness.

Examination ordered.

Bridget Gaynor, late of Athlone, in the county of Westmeath, Ireland, died intestate in 1841, leaving William Gaynor, her lawful husband, her surviving. She had no property in possession at the time of her decease, but was entitled to a sum of 200*l.* on the death of Barbara Smith, who died in December, 1863.

William Gaynor died in 1848, without having taken out letters of administration of his wife's personal estate and effects, and by his will appointed John Gaynor sole executor and residuary legatee. John Gaynor proved the will in the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Armagh, in Ireland, and died in 1865, leaving a will whereof he appointed James John Gaynor, George Atkinson and William Stanley executors. The executors proved the will in Ireland in September, 1865, and in May, 1869, the Irish probate was re-sealed in the principal registry of the Court of Probate in England.

M'Mahon now moved the Court to grant letters of administration of the personal estate and effects of Bridget Gaynor to William Stanley, executor of John Gaynor. He submitted that the chain of representation was complete, and referred to Williams on Executors, vol. 1, 5th edit., 274; Shaw v. Storton (1 Freem. 102); M'Mahon v. Rawlings (16 Sim. 429); Fowler v. Richards (5 Russ. 39); In the goods of Powell (3 Hagg. Cur. adv. vult.

Judgment was delivered (Aug. 5) as follows:

LORD PENZANCE.—An application was made to the Court on Tuesday last for a grant in this case. The intestate, Bridget Gaynor, was the wife of William Gaynor. She predeceased him, and William Gaynor died in 1848, before this Court was established. William Gaynor made a will, whereof he appointed John Gaynor executor. John Gaynor proved the will in the Prerogative Court of Armagh, in Ireland, but did not prove the will in England. He died, having made his will, by which he appointed three persons his executors. They have proved, and they now represent him, and this is an application on their part for a grant of administration of the estate of the deceased wife of William Gaynor, the first testator. The objection which was made to the grant in the registry was in conformity with the practice of the Court. The applicant being the executor of John Gaynor, and John Gaynor never having proved the will of his testator in this country, it was said that the chain of representation was broken. It was insisted upon the other side that the effect of John Gaynor having proved the will in Ireland, although it gave him no power over assets in England, was yet sufficient to continue the chain of representation, and that is the question for the Court to consider. Now, after the best consideration that I have been able to give to the case, I have come to the conclusion that the applicant is not entitled, and that the chain of representation is not continued. The matter may be simplified by considering it as if it arose during John Gaynor's life. Mrs. William Gaynor having died, her property passed to her husband. He died after having made his will, whereof he appointed John Gaynor executor. John Gaynor proved the will in Ireland. Question: Can he take a grant of administration of the goods of Mrs. William Gaynor without first proving William Gaynor's will in this country? And it seems to me that he cannot, for after all this system of taking the grant of probate to form the chain of representation is in fact nothing but following the interest. Under the Irish probate, John Gaynor had no control over the effects of William Gaynor, his testator, in England. That grant gave him no power to deal with such assets, and could certainly give him none. At the time of William Gaynor's death he was possessed of assets in England, namely, his wife's assets; and therefore if John Gaynor wished to possess himself of those assets he must have taken a grant of probate of his testator's will in this country. Having obtained no such grant, he was entitled to no control over them. His executors cannot stand in a better position than he stood in. Whatever rights they have are transmitted rights. But if he had no rights himself—if he could not come to this Court and ask for this grant, a fortiori those to whom he has transmitted his rights cannot do it. There are a great many cases that throw considerable doubt upon the matter, but it seems to me that in principle the case of Twyford v. Trail—the marginal note in which runs thus—"A. died in India. B, one of his executors, proved the will in India. B. died, and C, his executor, proved his will in England. C. is not the personal representative of A."—decides the question with which we are now dealing. It was suggested that some sort of difference existed between the full rights of an executor, with which it was conceded the party here was not clothed, seeing that he had only taken the grant in Ireland, and a certain sort of partial rights sufficient to continue the chain of representation. The Court, with the object of avoiding superfluous grants, has very much considered that view of the case, to see if it rests upon any solid foundation, but I am unable to ascertain that it does. Therefore, I think that in this case the grant cannot go as moved for. The applicant, however, will have no difficulty in getting a grant, because it turns out that John Gaynor, as well as executor, was also residuary legatee, and therefore through that interest he will be entitled to take the grant in the ordinary way.

Grant of letters of administration refused.

CLEARE AND ANOTHER v. CLEARE.

Practice—Proof in Solemn Form—Plea that Deceased did not know and approve of Contents of Will—Burden of Proof—Right to Cross-examine—Notice under Rule 41.—Liability for Costs.

WILL.—The burden of proving that a testator knew and approved of the contents of his will lies upon the party propounding it. A party who pleads that the deceased did not know and approve of the contents of his will may therefore upon that question cross-examine the witnesses produced by the plaintiff without being liable to costs, if he has given the notice required by rule 41.

Charles Cleare died on the 7th of December, 1868, leaving a will. After directing the payment of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, the will contained the following clause: "I give, devise and bequeath all the residue of my real and personal estate to H. Cleare and G. F. Forster, in trust, to apply to such uses as I may hereafter instruct them; but in case no such further instructions are left, then I give the same to them absolutely, trusting in their Christian love that they will carry out my wishes as they have been verbally explained to them; and I hereby appoint H. Cleare and G. F. Forster executors."

The plaintiffs, as executors, filed a declaration propounding the will in the usual form:

The defendant, the brother and next-of-kin of the deceased, pleaded, 1, that the will was not duly executed; 2, incapacity; 3, that the deceased at the time of the execution of the said alleged will did not know and approve of the contents thereof. The following particulars were filed as to the case intended to be set up under the third plea:

"The substance of the case which the defendant intends to set up is, that the alleged will was not read over and explained to the deceased before its execution, and he was not aware that its effect was to give the whole of his property absolutely to the plaintiffs."

The defendant with the pleas also gave notice under rule 41. of Rules and Orders, 1862, that he merely required the will to be proved in solemn form, and that if both the attesting witnesses were produced by the plaintiffs he only intended to cross-examine the witnesses produced in support of the will.

Bayford moved the Court to order that the third plea should be struck out.—The defendant having given notice that he intends only to cross-examine the witnesses called by the plaintiffs, he has no right to raise the question whether the deceased knew and approved of the contents of the will. He can only cross-examine those witnesses as to matters the burden of proving which lies upon the plaintiffs, viz., due execution and capacity. The burden of proving that the deceased knew and approved of the contents of his will does not lie upon the plaintiffs. When they have proved that the will was duly executed and that the deceased was competent, they have done all that is required by the Wills Act to constitute a valid will; and unless there be special circumstances in the case the presumption would be that the deceased knew and approved of the contents of the will. If there be such special circumstances the onus of proving them lies upon the defendant. The third plea is not a traverse of any allegation in the declaration, and the onus of proving the issue raised by it therefore does not lie on the plaintiffs.

[LORD PENZANCE.—It is simply a question of the burden of proof, and it stands upon the same footing as the question of capacity. The law presumes that everyone is capable of making a will, but directly the defendant gives any evidence, by cross-examination or otherwise, that the deceased was of unsound mind the burden of proof shifts, and the onus lies on the parties propounding the will to satisfy the Court that he was not; as was laid down in Sutton v. Sadler (3 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 87; 26 L. J. C.P. 284).]

The third plea does not stand upon the same footing as the plea of incapacity. If the third plea is not struck out, the notice ought to be withdrawn, for in this case the will is in a peculiar form, and no written instructions were left by the testator. The questions which must arise under the third plea will involve a long and expensive inquiry, which the plaintiffs ought not to be compelled to undertake except upon the usual terms that the defendant, if unsuccessful, must pay costs. He cited Ireland v. Rendall (35 L. J. Pr. & M. 79); Hastilow v. Stobie (35 L. J. Pr. & M. 18); Goose v. Brown (1 Curt. 707); Barry v. Butlin (2 Moore, P.C. 80); and 1 Williams on Executors, edit. 1867, 337.

Searle, for the defendant.—The application is premature, for it amounts in reality to a question of costs, which can best be settled at the hearing. The proposition relied on by the plaintiffs is contrary to principle and authority. It is not true that the plaintiffs are only bound to prove due execution and capacity; they are also bound to shew, as alleged in the declaration, that the instrument propounded is the will of the deceased. A traverse of that allegation was held by Sir C. Cresswell to be a good plea, and under such an issue the plaintiffs would have been bound to give some evidence that the deceased knew and approved of the contents of the will. The third plea is a novel substitution for that traverse. According to the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, the plaintiffs were bound to produce the attesting witnesses, and the defendant might put any question to them as to the factum of the will, viz., as to the instructions for the reading over or custody of the will, without being liable to pay costs. If he should go further, and unsuccessfully impute fraud, undue influence or other improper conduct, he would be liable for costs. He cited Barry v. Butlin (2 Moore, P.C. 80); Goodacre v. Smith (36 L. J. Pr. & M. 43; L. R. 1 P. & M. 359); Croft v. Day (1 Curt. 782); and Leeman v. George (37 L. J. Pr. & M. 13; L. R. 1 P. & M. 542).

Bayford, in reply, cited Barry v. Butlin (2 Moore, P.C. 80).

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord Penzance.—This was an application to strike out a plea, or, at any rate, a notice filed by the next-of-kin. The next-of-kin having traversed the due execution of the will and the capacity of the deceased, further pleaded that the deceased did not know and approve of the contents of the will, and gave notice that he only intended to cross-examine the witnesses produced by the plaintiffs in support of the will. I hold it to be clear, since the careful decision in the case of Sutton v. Sadler (3 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 387; 26 L. J. C.P. 284), that in all cases, whether through the medium of a presumption unrebutted, or of positive evidence to that end, the party who puts forward a document as the will of a testator must establish the fact that the testator was competent to make a will when he executed it.

This competency forms part of the proposition that a will was made. For if there is no competency, no testable capacity, there can be no will. I am of opinion that the testator's knowledge of the contents of his alleged will stands upon the like footing. That he knew and approved of these contents is a proposition implied in the assertion that a will was made by him. For if a man were to sign a paper of the contents of which he knew nothing, it would be no will—Hastilow v. Stobie (35 L. J. Pr. & M. 18).

That the testator did know and approve of the contents of the alleged will is therefore part of the burden of proof assumed by every one who propounds it as a will. This burden is satisfied, prima facie, in the case of a competent testator by proving that he executed it. But if those who oppose it succeed, by a cross-examination of the witnesses or otherwise, in meeting this prima facie case, the party propounding must satisfy the tribunal affirmatively that the testator did really know and approve of the contents of the will in question before it can be admitted to probate. It follows from this reasoning that the next-of-kin may cross-examine the witnesses brought to support a will upon this matter, as well as upon the capacity of the testator or the execution of the will, without exposing themselves to costs, provided they give the notice required by the rules.

This is sufficient for the decision of this case. But on consulting the authorities in the Prerogative Court, it appears that the liberty of the next-of-kin to cross-examine the witnesses upon proof made in solemn form, without exposing themselves to costs, was not confined in all cases to those matters the proof whereof lay on the party propounding. And it is open to question, therefore, whether the same system ought not to prevail in this Court.

Administration Bond—Failure to duly Administer—Case in which Bond not assigned for Purpose of suing Surety.

WILL.—An administrator swore the estate under 20l., and gave the usual bond with A. for surety. Subsequently, he re-swore the estate under 600l., and gave a fresh bond with two other sureties. He then became bankrupt without having duly administered. The Court ordered the second bond to be assigned, but refused to order the assignment of the first until after the action on the second bond should be decided, it appearing that the estate had been duly administered to the amount for which the surety to the first bond was liable.

F. C. Irving died, in July, 1867, intestate, a spinster, without parent. Her nephew R. B. Johnston took out letters of administration in December, 1867, and made oath that her personal estate did not amount in value to 20*l.* W. A. Ward joined with him in a bond in the penal sum of 40*l.* for the due administration of the effects of the deceased. Johnston afterwards re-swore the value of the deceased's estate as under 600*l.*, and, on the 24th of March, 1868, he executed a fresh bond in the penal sum of 1,200*l.*, J. H. Nuttel and T. C. Hutton being sureties. At the time of her death the deceased owed 8*l.* to Messrs. Hope & Mackay, who were also creditors to the amount of 18*l.* for rent and 13*l.* 13*s.* for the funeral expenses of G. A. Irving, a brother of the deceased who survived her, and was entitled to a share in her estate, no part of which had been received by him.

In June, 1868, Johnston received on account of the deceased's estate a sum of money, out of which, after payment of debts and funeral expenses, there would have remained 290*l.* for distribution. Johnston neither paid the debts nor distributed the estate amongst the parties interested, and, in August, 1868, he was adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition. There was no fund out of which the claims on the deceased's estate could be satisfied except by suing the sureties to the administration bonds. Johnston had not filed an inventory or account. An order had been made by this Court calling upon the sureties to the two bonds to shew cause why the bonds should not be assigned for the purpose of being sued upon. The order was served upon two of the sureties. Hutton could not be found. Ward appeared and, in an affidavit, stated that he had executed the bond upon the faith of Johnston's statement that the value of the deceased's estate did not exceed 20*l.*; that he was afterwards requested to execute a bond for a larger amount, but refused, and was then told that the bond he had executed had not been used and was of no use; and that he executed the bond in the belief that after Johnston had paid the expenses of taking administration there would only remain 10*l.*, for the due administration of which he would be liable.

Dr. Spinks, for Ward.—The Court ought not to order the first bond to be assigned unless a prima facie case is made out that, if it be sued on, the plaintiff will succeed. Ward's liability has been discharged, for as far as he is concerned the estate has been duly administered by payment of the expenses of obtaining administration, which exceed 10*l.*, the amount for which he undertook to be liable.—He cited In the goods of Stark (35 L. J. Pr. & M. 42).

Searle, for the creditors.—Ward's liability on the first bond cannot be discharged or increased by the execution of the second. His liability is limited to the amount of the first bond. He can set up any answer that he may think fit in the action, and the Court ought therefore not to refuse to assign the bond.

LORD PENZANCE.—I think it will be more equitable and fair to proceed first against the sureties to the second bond. I shall therefore order the second bond to be assigned, but hold my hand as regards the first bond until I know the result of the action.

Practice—Amendment of Grant—Probate of Will wrongly Dated—Amendment of Probate by stating true Date.

WILL.—An original will and the copy of it in the probate bore a wrong date. The Court ordered the probate to be amended by stating the true date.

Administration with the will of C. Allchin annexed was granted in August, 1865. The will was executed on the 11th of January, 1864, but by mistake the original will and the copy of it in the letters of administration bore date the 11th of January, 1863. The error was discovered during the progress of a suit in Chancery to administer the estate of the deceased, and Vice Chancellor James suspended the proceedings in order that the letters of administration might be amended.

R. Pritchard, for the administrator, moved the Court to order that the date in the will and in the copy of the will in the grant should be rectified, or that the true date of the execution of the will should be entered or notified upon the proceedings filed in the registry and upon the letters of administration.

Bayford appeared for the widow and two children of the deceased.

LORD PENZANCE.—I think it is the function of this Court to ascertain the date of the execution of a will as well as the fact of its execution. I am satisfied that the true date of the will is "January 11th, 1864," and I shall order the grant to be amended so as to shew on the face of it that the will was executed on that day.

Will, Execution of Power of Appointment by—Subsequent Marriage—Revocation—Persons entitled as Next-of-Kin—1 Vict. c. 26. s. 18.

WILL.—A. by his will gave a power to B. to dispose by will of certain property, which, in default of appointment by her, was to devolve on the person or persons who, at her decease, should be her "next-of-kin." B, in pursuance of such power, executed a will in favour of C, whom she afterwards married, but who died in her lifetime:—Held, that B.'s will fell within the exception of the 18th section of the Wills Act, and was therefore not revoked by her subsequent marriage.

Mary Ann McVicar, late of Waterloo, Lancashire, widow, died on the 3rd of April, 1869, leaving her surviving Nicholas Magraw, her lawful uncle and one of her next-of-kin. Nicholas Magraw the elder, by his will gave and devised to the trustees named therein (Morris Hore and Edmund Joseph Hore, who were also appointed executors) certain real and personal property, upon trust to permit his great-niece, Mary Ann Bagraw (afterwards Mary Ann McVicar), to have the use and enjoyment thereof during her life, and from and after her death in trust for her children, and in case there should be no child, in trust for such person or persons, and in such manner generally as she should by her will appoint, and in default of such appointment in trust for the person or persons who, at her decease, should be her "next-of-kin."

On the 14th of January, 1863, Mary Ann McVicar, then Mary Ann Magraw, duly executed her last will and testament in writing; in which, after reciting the power given to her by the will of her great-uncle, and referring to her then intended marriage, she directed and appointed that the trustees or trustee for the time being of the will of her said great-uncle, Nicholas Magraw, should stand seised and possessed of the said trust property, upon trust to raise and pay thereout to her old servant Margaret, the wife of Oliver Petty, a sum of 50*l*., and that subject thereto the said trustees should stand seised and possessed of all and singular the said trust property, upon trust for Duncan McVicar, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, absolutely, according to the nature and quality thereof respectively; and she appointed the said Duncan McVicar sole executor. After the execution of this will Mary Ann Magraw intermarried with the said Duncan McVicar, who died in her lifetime. Mary Ann McVicar died possessed of considerable personal estate in her own right, and in addition to the property over which she had a power of appointment.

Bayford moved the Court to decree administration with the will of Mary Ann McVicar annexed to Nicholas Magraw, her lawful uncle and one of her next-of-kin. He submitted that the will came under the exception of the 18th section of the 1 Vict. c. 26, and was not therefore revoked by the subsequent marriage of the deceased. The words "next-of-kin," used simpliciter, are to be taken to mean "nearest of kin," and not those entitled under the Statute of Distributions. He referred to Elmsley v. Young (2 Myl. & K. 780); Jarman on Wills, vol. 2, p. 94; In the goods of Sir C. A. Fitzroy (1 Swa. & Tr. 133); and In the goods of Charlotte Fenwick (36 L. J. Pr. & M. 54; L. R. 1 P. & D. 319).

LORD PENZANCE.—That, I think, is the true view of the case. In Elmsley v. Young (2 Myl. & K. 780), when decided on appeal, it was held that the words "next-of-kin," taken alone, do not imply the same class of persons as the next-of-kin under the Statute of Distributions. In this case the will under which the power was given provided that, in default of appointment under the power, the property should go to those who, at the time of the death of the deceased, should be her "next-of-kin." The only question therefore is, whether, under these circumstances, adverting to the terms of the 18th section of the Wills Act, the property in default of appointment would pass to her heir, customary heir, executor or administrator, or the person entitled as her next-of-kin under the Statute of Distributions. But when once you get so far as this, that the words "next-of-kin" as ordinarily used in a settlement or will mean something different from next-of-kin under the Statute of Distributions, it is quite plain that in this case the property would not go in default of appointment to the persons who would be entitled under the statute. The will therefore falls within the exception of the 18th section of the Wills Act, and Testamentary Paper — Condition — Validity dependent upon Option of Individual.

WILL.—A. made a will and codicil. He subsequently executed a second codicil, which concluded as follows: "I give my wife the option of adding this codicil to my will or not, as she may think proper or necessary." The widow, who was also sole executrix, having exercised her option by refusing to recognize the validity of the second codicil, the Court decreed probate of the will and first codicil only.

The deceased died on the 3rd of June, 1869, having made and executed a will and codicil, bearing date respectively the 24th of August, 1844, and the 21st of February, 1860. On the 15th of May, 1867, he with his own hand drew out and executed a paper, which he described as a second codicil to his last will and testament, and this concluded as follows:

"I give my wife the option of adding this codicil to my will or not as she may think proper or necessary."

The widow, who was also the sole executrix appointed by the will, in an affidavit, stated that she had decided not to add the paper to the testator's will or to avail herself of the powers intended to be given to her by it.

Dr. Spinks accordingly moved the Court to decree probate to issue of the will and first codicil only.

LORD PENZANCE.—There is no doubt of this proposition that the mere fact of a man having executed a paper in the form of a will does not necessarily make that paper testamentary. There must be the animus testandi. A man must intend the paper to operate as a testamentary instrument to make it such. What the testator has here done is this: he has endeavoured to leave to his wife the right of saying whether this paper shall be testamentary or not. He has not said that its testamentary effect should depend on his disposition at the time he signed the paper, but on an event that should happen after his death, namely, the determination of his wife to treat it as testamentary. It is the business of this Court to carry out a man's intentions so far as it can be law; and the only question in the case is whether there is anything illegal in the testator's object. It seems to me that there is not. It is quite true that a testator cannot confide to another person the right of making his will after his death, nor can he leave in the hands of another the power of revoking a paper which is testamentary at the time of his death, because the statute says the revocation must be done in his presence; but I do not know of anything in the statute which would prevent a testator from saying that the question whether a paper shall be testamentary or not shall depend upon an event to happen after his death, and that event may be the assent of an individual. I have looked into the books for a case bearing on the point, and the only one I can find is Parsons v. Lanoe (1 Ves. sen. 190), which, however, I think is conclusive that such a thing can be done. I think in this case that the testator's object was lawful, and as the widow has exercised her option by refusing to recognize the validity of the second codicil I shall decree probate of the will and first codicil only.

Salvage—Increasing and Diminishing Amount—Practice.

SHIPPING.—Although a party who seeks, by appeal to the Judicial Committee, to increase or diminish the remuneration awarded in the discretion of a Judge before whom a case of salvage is brought undertakes a difficult task, yet the Judicial Committee will diminish as well as increase the quantum of salvage, where the amount awarded is exorbitant or manifestly excessive.

These were two appeals from a decree of the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England.

The causes from which these appeals were brought arose out of certain salvage services rendered by the schooner "Annie Grant" and by the steamers "Dublin," "Tintern," "William Wallace," "Gipsy" and "Camilla," to the ship "Chetah" and her cargo.

The circumstances of the case were as follows: The "Chetah," a ship of 759 tons register, manned by her master and a crew of twenty-one hands, sailed from Macao in China, with a general cargo for London. The ship, cargo and freight were of the value of about 50,000*l*. On the 17th of March, 1866, the "Chetah," when in latitude 48 deg. 46 min. N. and longitude 9 deg. 39 min. W., met with a gale of wind, in which her rudder-stock was broken and her rudder broke adrift, and on the following day was lost. A jury-rudder was constructed by the crew of the "Chetah." In the meantime the "Chetah" was steered by means of her sails.

On the 22nd of March, at about 4 p.m., whilst the crew of the "Chetah" were employed in shipping the jury-rudder, the schooner "Annie Grant" came to the "Chetah" and offered to assist her; and the master not having ascertained that the jury-rudder would enable him to steer, arranged that the "Annie Grant" should lie-by during the night, and that, in the event of the jury-rudder not proving efficient, the "Annie Grant" should tow the "Chetah" into the English Channel. The following day the jury-rudder broke adrift, and at about 6 a.m., the weather having become moderate, the "Annie Grant" came under the lee of the "Chetah," and it was arranged that the "Annie Grant" should take the "Chetah" in tow, and at 9 a.m. a hawser was made fast between the vessels, and the "Annie Grant" endeavoured to tow the "Chetah"; but in a short time it was found that the "Annie Grant" would not steer, and she got down on the starboard-quarter of the "Chetah," and the bridle parted. The "Annie Grant" remained by the "Chetah" until 1.30 p.m., when she again made fast to and commenced to tow her, but in a short time became unmanageable and fell astern on to the port-quarter of the "Chetah," and carried away the spritsail-yard of the "Chetah" and damaged the hawser. The "Annie Grant" again made fast to the "Chetah," which, with the aid of her jibs and by working her yards, succeeded in steering after her until 6 a.m.

of the 24th of the said month, when the " Annie Grant " became unmanageable and went astern. The ends of two other hawsers were then got on to the damaged hawser, and at 10 a.m. the " Annie Grant " again went ahead and got a spring on the hawser. She continued her effort to tow the " Chetah " until 11.40 a.m. of the 25th of the said month, when the Bishop's Rock Lighthouse was sighted. The weather being too boisterous for towing, the " Annie Grant " remained by the " Chetah " until 4 p.m. of the 26th, when the mate of the " Annie Grant " boarded the " Chetah," and it was arranged that the " Annie Grant " should still remain by the " Chetah," which she did till the following day, when the mate of the " Annie Grant " again boarded the " Chetah," and it was arranged that the " Annie Grant " should make fast astern of the " Chetah " and endeavour to steer her. At 9 a.m. of the said 27th day all sail was made on the " Chetah," and the " Annie Grant " having been made fast astern to her, the " Chetah " proceeded under sail, towing the " Annie Grant " towards the coast of Ireland until 4 p.m., when Cruach's Hill was sighted, bearing north by west, and the " Chetah " stood on, towing the " Annie Grant " until 9.30 p.m., when the Hook of Waterford Light was made out bearing north by west, and the Conningbeg Light was also made out bearing north-east by north, and at 10 p.m. sail was shortened, and at midnight the " Chetah " wore to the south, and stood off shore, still towing the " Annie Grant " until 4 a.m. of the following day, when she again wore, and stood in towards the land until 9 a.m., when a screw steamer, called the " Dublin," was seen coming out of Waterford, and was signalled to come to the " Chetah," which she did, and at 10 a.m. passed a rope to the " Chetah," and began to tow her and the " Annie Grant " towards Waterford. In a short time, it being found that the " Dublin " was not powerful enough to tow the " Chetah " and " Annie Grant " to Waterford, it was arranged that the " Chetah " should bring up, and that the " Dublin " should return to the shore for further assistance, and the " Chetah " accordingly let go an anchor, and brought up. The " Chetah " remained brought up, with the " Annie Grant " hanging astern of her, until 5.40 p.m., when the " Gipsy " came to the " Chetah " and made fast to her. The " Chetah " then slipped from her anchor and chain, and the " Gipsy " then proceeded to tow her, with the " Annie Grant " astern. The " Gipsy " so towed the " Chetah " until 9 p.m., when the " Dublin " again came to her, but finding her in tow of the " Gipsy," kept off at a distance from her. At 10 p.m. the steamship " Camilla " came and attempted to make fast to the " Chetah," but did not succeed in doing so, and at 10.30 p.m. the two steam-tugs, the " Tintern " and " William Wallace," came and made fast alongside the " Chetah," and began to assist in steering her after the " Gipsy." At this time the " Gipsy " had passed inside the Hook Light at Waterford. The " Chetah " proceeded in tow of the " Gipsy " with the " Annie Grant " astern of her, and the said two steam-tugs alongside, until shortly before midnight, when she let go her anchor, and the services of the " Annie Grant " terminated. Salvage suits were instituted on behalf of the owners, master and crew of the schooner " Annie Grant," and of the owners, masters and crews of the steam-vessels " Dublin," " Tintern," " William Wallace," " Gipsy " and " Camilla " against the " Chetah," her cargo and freight. Both suits were heard on the 20th of December, 1867.

The learned Judge of the Admiralty Court awarded to the master and crew of the " Annie Grant " by way of salvage for their services, the sum of 3,150*l.*, together with the sum of 535*l.* in respect of alleged damage and loss sustained by the owners of the " Annie Grant " in rendering the services. He also awarded to the steamers for their services sums of money amounting in the whole to 355*l.*

From this judgment the present appeals were brought, on the grounds that the amount awarded to the owners, master and crew of the vessel " Annie Grant " was excessive; and that the amounts awarded to the owners, masters and crews of the five steam-tugs were inadequate.

LORD CHELMSFORD delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—These appeals are from the sentence or decree of the High Court of Admiralty in causes of salvage for services rendered by a schooner called the "Annie Grant" and by five steam vessels, called respectively the "Dublin," the "Camilla," the "Gipsy," the "Tintern," and the "William Wallace," to a vessel called the "Chetah," of the value, with her cargo and freight, of 50,000*l*.

The learned Judge of the Court of Admiralty awarded to the "Annie Grant" a sum of 3,150*l*. for her services, and, in addition, a sum of 200*l*. for damages sustained, and 335*l*. for detention of the vessel while rendering the services, making in the whole the sum of 3,685*l*.; and for the services of the five steam vessels he awarded a sum of 355*l*., which he distributed amongst them in certain proportions.

The owners of the "Chetah" have appealed from the decree in favour of the "Annie Grant," on the ground of the amount awarded being excessive. And the owners, masters and crew of the five steam vessels have appealed on the ground that the sum of 355*l*. is wholly an inadequate reward for their services.

In dealing with these cases their Lordships have felt some degree of embarrassment, in consequence of the unwillingness which has been invariably shewn by this committee to interfere with the judicial discretion which has been exercised in questions of salvage where the quantum awarded was alone the subject of appeal.

Thus, in the case of "The Carrier Dove" (2 Moore, P.C. 243), Lord Justice Knight Bruce, in delivering the opinion of their Lordships, said, "It has never been the rule or practice of the Committee to enter into the question of quantum where there has been nothing (to use a familiar expression) to shock the conscience, nothing gross, nothing extravagant." In the case of "The Clarisse" (12 Moore, P.C. 340), the same learned Judge, expressing the opinion of the Judicial Committee in less forcible terms, said, "It is a settled rule, and one of great utility, particularly with reference to cases of this description, that the difference ought to be very considerable to induce the Court of Appeal to interfere upon a question of mere discretion."

In the case of "The Cuba" (Lush. 14), which was an appeal from an award of salvage by Justices of the Peace, Dr. Lushington said, "The question for me to decide is, whether the sum awarded by the Justices is so exorbitant, so manifestly excessive, that it would not be just in me to confirm it."

And, lastly, in the case of "The Fusileer" (3 Moore, P.C. 5), it was said, "Their Lordships would always be slow to disturb an award of salvage by the learned Judge of the Court of Admiralty, on the ground of his having given too large a sum to the salvors, unless they were satisfied beyond all doubt that he had made an exorbitant estimate of their services."

These cases shew that a party who seeks by appeal to increase or to diminish the remuneration which, in the discretion of a Judge before whom a case of salvage is brought, is a proper estimate of the value of the services rendered, undertakes a very difficult task.

It was agreed by the counsel on both sides that no case was to be found where, upon an appeal from a decree for salvage services, the amount awarded had ever been reduced. The deduction which the counsel for the "Annie Grant" rather left to be drawn than drew himself, from the absence of such precedents, seems to have been that this Committee would never disturb the award of the Judge in this direction. But there are cases in which their Lordships have increased the amount awarded for salvage services, on the ground that the Judge had formed too low an estimate of the value of such services; and, in principle, there can be no difference between increasing and diminishing an amount awarded in these cases, both being equally an interference with judicial discretion. The fact of no instance being found of the reduction of a decree for salvage upon appeal may possibly be accounted for by the very natural desire which must always be felt to accept the most liberal estimate of services, which are usually of a highly meritorious character, and generally attended with peril of life and property. But however this may be, to assume, from there being no case in which a decree for salvage services has been reduced in amount upon appeal, that it ought never to be done, would be to draw an inference in opposition to the authorities previously mentioned; which, stating negatively that the Committee will not interfere with the discretion of a Judge as to the quantum of salvage, where there has been nothing exorbitant, or manifestly excessive, in his estimate of the value of the services rendered, necessarily imply that where such excess or exorbitance exists, they will exercise their own judgment as to the proper remuneration to the salvors, and reduce it to a just and reasonable amount.

After the most careful consideration of the circumstances upon which the claim of the "Annie Grant" is founded, and with an anxious desire that the salvors should receive not merely a fair but a liberal remuneration for their services, their Lordships have come to a conclusion as to the value of the services rendered widely differing from that of the learned Judge of the Court of Admiralty. The first and most important question in cases of this description is the degree of danger to which the vessel was exposed, and from which she was rescued by the salvors. The learned Judge formed his opinion of the peril in which the "Chetah" was originally placed upon evidence to which the appellants could have no possible objection, viz., the protest of her master. But not being assisted with the advice of nautical assessors, he seems to have considered that that document described a state of things in which the "Chetah" was in imminent danger of being lost, unless prompt assistance had been afforded. Possibly, their Lordships, reading the protest by the light of their own understandings, might have arrived at the same conclusion with the learned Judge; but they are advised by the nautical gentlemen, to whose knowledge and experience they have referred, that the description of the condition of the "Chetah" at the time when the "Annie Grant" tendered her services by no means indicates that degree of peril which the learned Judge seems to have supposed. She had, indeed, lost her rudder; but this loss might have been supplied by some temporary expedient, for which there were materials on board.

The most important element in a claim for high salvage reward, viz., the imminent peril of destruction of the vessel to which assistance is rendered, is therefore wanting in this case.

Again, the mode in which the services of the "Annie Grant" were first applied, appears to their Lordships to detract considerably from their merit. They are advised that it was a very injudicious course to attempt to tow the "Chetah," being without a rudder, with a small schooner like the "Annie Grant." That this opinion is well founded is proved by the fact that, in the course of the towing, the "Chetah" over-reached the "Annie Grant," and occasioned part of the damage which she sustained, and for which a compensation has been awarded. The learned Judge of the Admiralty, adverting to this attempt at first to tow the "Chetah," says, "It may be, for all I know, that this was an imprudent attempt, and that greater nautical skill and knowledge would have told the "Annie Grant" that it would turn out, as it did, a failure." He adds, indeed, that "no remonstrance was made on behalf of the "Chetah," but, on the contrary, the "Annie Grant" seems to have acted under the direction of the "Chetah." Whether this was so or not, it is clear, that as salvage is a reward for benefits actually conferred, not for a service attempted to be rendered, all the period during which the "Annie Grant" was unsuccessfully endeavouring to tow the "Chetah," should have been left out of the account in estimating her merit and the value of her services.

With respect to the risk incurred by the "Annie Grant" (which is always a circumstance to be considered in determining the amount of a salvage reward), it is observable that the greatest peril to which she was exposed was the consequence of her own injudicious and imprudent act of taking the "Chetah" in tow.

The really meritorious services of the "Annie Grant" commenced when, abandoning the repeated unsuccessful attempts to tow the "Chetah," she was made fast to the "Chetah's" stern, in order that she might act as a steerage-power upon her. Unless this course had been adopted the "Chetah" would have been unmanageable at a time when, being near the Irish coast, she would have been exposed to the greatest danger. But with the assistance thus afforded by the "Annie Grant," the "Chetah" was enabled to wear and stand off shore, and afterwards, on the following day, to run in towards the land, so as to be able to avail herself of the services of the steam vessels whose claim is the subject of the other appeal.

That the "Chetah" was rescued from a situation of considerable peril by the exertions of the master and crew of the "Annie Grant," and by the application of proper means for securing her safety at a time when, being crippled by the loss of her rudder, she would most probably, if not inevitably, have been driven on shore, there can be little (if any) doubt, and the services of the "Annie Grant" have, therefore, been the means of saving very valuable property from impending destruction. That they are entitled to a high salvage reward it is impossible to deny. But their Lordships are of opinion that the learned Judge of the Court of Admiralty, acting upon his own unassisted judgment, has greatly overrated the value of the services rendered by the "Annie Grant," and that it is a case in which they are bound to reduce the amount awarded.

They think that if the owners, master and crew of the "Annie Grant" receive a sum of 1,500*l.* for the salvage services of the vessel, they will be most liberally and abundantly rewarded.

They will, therefore, recommend to Her Majesty to alter the decree of the Court of Admiralty in the case of the "Annie Grant," by reducing the sum of 3,150*l.* for salvage to the sum of 1,500*l.*, and to affirm the decree as to the sum of 535*l.* for the damage and detention of the vessel, and that there should be no costs of the appeal on either side.

As to the case of the steam vessels, their Lordships will humbly recommend Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the High Court of Admiralty, and to dismiss their appeal, with costs.

Judicial Committee—Appeal—Questions of Fact—Practice.

SHIPPING.—On an appeal to the Judicial Committee, if their Lordships find that, in the Court below, there was clear and distinct evidence upon one side, and possibly evidence which the appellants might think to be clear and distinct on the other side, nevertheless, if the Judge in the Court below, in his discretion, having the opportunity of seeing the witnesses and observing their demeanour, has come, on a balance of testimony, to a clear and decisive conclusion, those who undertake to reverse that conclusion, on the ground that the Judge has erred in giving credence to one class of witnesses rather than to the other, undertake an almost impossible task.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England.

The cause from which the appeal was brought arose out of a collision which occurred between the screw steamer "Alice," belonging to the appellants, and the paddle-wheel steamer "Princess Alice," belonging to the respondents. There were cross-actions between the same parties, arising out of the same collision. The pleadings in these two causes raised the same questions, and the cases were heard, in the Court below, at the same time and depended upon the same evidence.

The collision occurred between 6.30 p.m. and 7 p.m., on the 15th of November, 1867, in the river Tyne, at or about a place called The Narrows. The "Princess Alice" was coming up, and the "Alice" was going down the river. Both the vessels had the usual regulation mast-head and coloured side-lights exhibited and burning.

The case on the part of the "Princess Alice" was, that she was proceeding, under steam alone, slowly and carefully up the north side of the River Tyne, that being her proper side; that the red and mast-head lights of the "Alice" were seen on the port bow, and at the distance of about a quarter of a mile from the "Princess Alice"; that the helm of the "Princess Alice" was ported, and that, upon the green light of the "Alice" coming into view, the engines of the "Princess Alice" were stopped; but the "Alice" with her stem struck the "Princess Alice" with great violence on her port midships, doing her so much damage that her master was compelled to run her ashore to save her from sinking.

The owners of the "Princess Alice" alleged the collision to have been occasioned by the improper navigation of the "Alice"; and they, in particular, charged the "Alice" with four distinct grounds of blame: first, with not having navigated on the south side of the river; secondly, with having omitted to duly port her helm; thirdly, with having improperly starboarded; and fourthly, with having improperly neglected to slacken her speed, or to stop or reverse her engines.

The owners of the "Alice," on the other hand, alleged that the "Alice" was keeping as close along the south shore as was practicable; that the "Princess Alice," instead of being on the north side of the river, was improperly coming up on the south side, and even further over to that side than the "Alice" herself was; and that the "Princess Alice" brought about the collision by altering her course under a port helm, and bringing herself across the bows of the "Alice."

The learned Judge of the Court below delivered judgment in both cases, pronouncing the "Alice" to have been alone to blame for the collision, and decreed accordingly.

From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

The Queen's Advocate (Sir Travers Twiss) and Butt, for the owners of the "Alice."

Milward and Clarkson, for the owners of the "Princess Alice," were not heard.

LORD JUSTICE PAGE WOOD.—In the course of the argument on this case, one of their Lordships has already cited the decision in the case of "The Julia" (14 Moore, P.C. 210), which laid down in very clear and precise terms the course that this Board thinks it right to take with reference to appeals from the judgment of the Court below upon matters which are entirely matters of fact. If this Board finds that, in the Court below, there was clear and distinct evidence upon the one side, and possibly evidence which the appellants might think to be as clear and distinct on the other side, nevertheless, if the Judge in the Court below, in his discretion, having the opportunity of seeing the witnesses and observing their demeanour, has come, on the balance of testimony, to a clear and decisive conclusion, those who undertake to reverse that conclusion, on the ground that the Judge has erred in giving credence to the one class of witnesses rather than to the other, undertake, as expressed in the case of the "Julia," an almost impossible task. This Board has no opportunity of seeing the witnesses, of considering in what respect credence should be given to one class rather than the other from the mode in which their evidence has been given; and it would have to perform a duty of a most painful character if it were not merely to reverse the decision of the Judge below with reference to the finding that he has come to adverse to the appellants, but had, in such a state of circumstances, to do that which would be a necessary corollary from such a step, viz., to give a deliberate judgment in favour of the respondents, without the same means of ascertaining the real truth as was possessed by the Judge of the Court below. Now, it is of course not wise at any time to lay down rules of such extreme accuracy of definition as would induce a Court of Appeal to hold itself bound upon any future occasion to a fixed and determined line, which cannot be overpassed on the one side or the other. We have had to consider that question, on a different subject-matter, during this very day, with reference to the course to be taken by this Board as to the augmenting or diminution of the amount which may be awarded in salvage cases.[1] A useful line had been drawn by the decided case of the "Alice" with reference to our proceedings in such a case as that, viz., that it requires a case of extreme and overwhelming pressure to induce us to vary from the decision of the Court below as to the amount of damage with reference to salvage. Still, such a case may occur; and we, sitting here, have this very morning decided that such a case has been laid before us. It is just possible to suppose that some such case might be produced with reference to this question of evidence, and it might be possible to shew that the Judge had so plainly, manifestly and clearly erred upon the face of documents before us, that we ought to reverse his judgment. But it is not shewn on the face of the evidence before us, either from the character of the deposition of the witness whose veracity it is sought to impugn, or from that which is found recorded as his evidence, that his testimony is so utterly inconsistent in itself, so contrary to all human probability, that a Judge must have been guilty of error who could give credit to a witness of such a character.

But, on the contrary, what we are asked to do is this: we are asked to reverse the judgment of the Court below in a case in which the principle established by the decision in the "Julia" is most singularly applicable, because the learned Judge, finding a conflict of testimony, as unfortunately in most of these cases of collision there must be, has relied very strongly on the evidence of a pilot, a witness of the name of William Young, and has thus characterized that witnesses evidence: he says he has had the assistance of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, and he gives it as the joint opinion of those gentlemen and of himself, "That William Young, the witness from the tug 'Mary Usher'—whose evidence has been very much discussed—proves that the 'Princess Alice' was running up on the north side of the channel. It has been very properly admitted that this witness gave his evidence in a manner which entitled him to the credence of the Court; and he proves, in my opinion, beyond all controversy, that the 'Mary Usher' came up on the north of the mid-channel, with the 'Princess Alice' between her and the north shore, as far as the Middle Scarp Sand, and that there the tug passed ahead and was proceeding onwards up the river. He says also, that he looked back and saw the collision, and that the 'Princess Alice,' at the time of the collision, was still to the north of the mid-channel. He gave strong evidence also to this effect: that the 'Mary Usher' having passed the 'Alice,' he observed that she altered her course and came across towards the north shore. He said that his belief was that those on board the 'Alice' had not seen the 'Princess Alice,' and that their attention was occupied with the dredgers and hoppers which were on the south shore." Therefore the learned Judge tells us that this is a witness who is not only unconnected with the case, but a witness who has given his evidence in a manner peculiarly entitling him to credence in the opinion of the learned Judge and his assessors; and, indeed, he says (and we have no reason to suppose that it is in any way an error) that he was admitted so to have given his evidence. If that be so, we entirely concur in the observation of the learned Judge, that the evidence of that witness may properly be applied to turning the balance of the conflicting evidence, such as it may be, upon the rest of the case. He has been worthily adopted as a witness of credit, whose evidence ought materially to assist the Judge in coming to the conclusion which he came to, founding it in a great measure undoubtedly upon that person's evidence. Have we, then, been shewn anything in his evidence which, to our minds, makes it clearly erroneous that such weight should have been given to the evidence of that particular witness? Does not his evidence, if believed, prove the case? Clearly and manifestly it does, because his evidence is to this effect, that he himself was somewhere about mid-channel, or slightly on the north side of the river, being in a tug called the "Mary Usher," which was so situated, because it had been looking out for employment at the time the "Princess Alice" was coming up; he had found that the "Princess Alice" was in the hands of a certificated pilot, and did not want his assistance as a pilot; and he says that he then went for some time alongside, as it were, of the "Princess Alice," but finding that she went slower than he was desirous of doing, or rather than the tug was desirous of doing, for he does not appear to have been in command of the tug, the tug went ahead; but at the same time, he says, up to the time of the tug going ahead, the "Princess Alice" was on the north side of him, and clearly on the north side of the mid-channel, and in her proper position. Now, is he not confirmed in that? It is curious enough that Reid (that, I think, is the man's name)—speaking of a vessel which he does not name, but which clearly is, and was stated by the Queen's Advocate to be the very "Mary Usher" in which Young was—says that the tug which then passed him was on the north or proper side of the river, and was proceeding in her proper course. The captain of the "Alice" himself also described the "Mary Usher" as coming up about the same time; therefore it is plain that she was on the right side of the river, and that the "Princess Alice" was to the north of her, and, if we may use such an expression, more in her right place than the "Alice." Well, that being so, it is said, how came he to be so near as to be capable of giving the exact account which he does of this collision? Of course it is a remark fit and proper to be made on all occasions with reference to observations made by strangers, that you must have some sort of explanation as to what it is that causes them to take notice of a matter which by itself would be uninteresting to them, such as the position of this other vessel. But this man gives abundant reason for having taken such notice, because he had advanced but a very little way (and the captain says that the "Mary Usher" passed him when they were close to the dredgers); therefore the "Alice" was near the dredgers, in the immediate vicinity of which the accident happened at the time she was passed by the "Mary Usher," and the "Mary Usher" cannot have got very far before the collision took place: and this witness gives a very suitable and proper reason for seeing so much of it as he did, for he says, "When I felt that a collision was likely to take place, from noticing these vessels. I immediately had the tug I was in first stopped and then backed, in order that I might be of use in saving life, in the event of any such collision occurring." What could be more natural, and what could be a more proper and reasonable account to give of his making the observation he did? Then, by that operation he was brought so near that there can no longer be any doubt of his having had abundant facilities for seeing what took place. He then gives a reason for what afterwards did take place, which meets the observation of the Queen's Advocate as to the improbability of this man's evidence. He explains the cause of the "Alice" passing out of her course and throwing her head across the river towards the north, and so going on her wrong side at the time of the collision. His remark is this, "I think she did not see the 'Princess Alice' steamer." Now it is a curious thing that the captain of the "Alice," in giving his evidence, as to what he saw after the "Mary Usher" had passed, and on being asked when it was that he first saw the "Princess Alice," gives this account: he says, "I saw some lights," and then Mr. Butt asks, "What did you take those lights to be? A. A steamer's lights.—Q. Any particular sort of steamer? A. The steamer attending on the hoppers at the dredgers.—Q. Did you see any hoppers? A. Yes, there were two hoppers.—Q. Where were the two hoppers? A. Alongside of the dredger." Therefore he really indirectly corroborates this observation of Mr. Young, in itself not an unnatural one to make. Nobody would have run across the river if they had seen a steamer; of course nobody wished to occasion a collision or a disaster of this description; but he says, "I do not think he saw her"; and what turns out to be the case is this (the captain is giving his own account of it): on first seeing the "Princess Alice," he did not take her to be a vessel coming up the river with which he was likely to come into collision; but, judging by his eye, he thought it was a tug in attendance on the hoppers, and not, therefore, in the position of the "Princess Alice," which was navigating and coming up the river. We mention these things as shewing that, so far from any ground having been laid to lead their Lordships to conclude that the Judge has erred in trusting to Mr. Young, because, on the face of his evidence, it is inconsistent and improbable, and therefore not such evidence as on the very face of it ought to be trusted to, it appears that all the collateral circumstances, as far as we have other evidence in the case, tend rather to assist and corroborate the view taken by the learned Judge as to Mr. Young's evidence. And I may say in conclusion, that the map which was proved, and which has been laid before us, shewing the position of the vessels immediately after the accident, tends exactly to the same conclusion, because, as has been observed by one of their Lordships, it is difficult to see how such a state and position of the vessels could have been brought about upon any such theory as that presented to our minds by the appellants, whereas it is entirely consistent with that presented by the respondents.

(1) See the case next preceding.

But, in the opinion of their Lordships, the principal point upon which we should rest our decision is this, that following the doctrine laid down in the case of the "Julia," we should be most unwilling to come to a conclusion different from that of the Judge of the Court below merely upon a balance of testimony; and on its being affirmed by the appellent that the testimony ought not to have been credited by the Judge of the Court below. He had an opportunity of testing, in the most ample manner, the conduct and demeanour of the witnesses, and we should require evidence that would be overpowering in its effect on our judgment with reference to the incredibility of the statements made by any witness, and the general testimony to which credit has been so given, before we could venture to come to a conclusion, not only in favour of an appellant in a case of this kind, but of course a conclusion adverse to a respondent, thus inflicting on the respondent a loss occasioned by the Board coming to a conclusion different from that which was come to on evidence, as to the value of which we have not the same facilities and means of forming a judgment as were possessed by the learned Judge who decided in the first instance.

It is therefore our opinion that we must advise Her Majesty, in this case, to affirm the judgment of the High Court of Admiralty, and to dismiss the appeal of the "Alice," with costs.

Salvage—Compensation—Discretion of Admiralty Court—Judicial Committee—Practice.

SHIPPING.—The Judicial Committee will not interfere with the discretion exercised by the Judge of the Admiralty Court in awarding compensation for salvage service, unless the difference between the amount awarded and the amount due in the judgment of the Judicial Committee is very considerable.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty in England.

The appellants, the owners, masters and crews of the steam-tugs " Knight Templar " and " Royal Arch," sued the ship " England," her freight and cargo, for reward due to them for salvage services.

The " England " was an iron screw steamship 2,596 tons gross burthen, and at the time of the salvage services rendered, she had a heavy cargo on board. The value of the ship, freight and cargo was 122,820*l.*

The " Knight Templar " and " Royal Arch " were steam-tugs, belonging to the port of Liverpool.

The circumstances under which the salvage services arose were as follows: On the afternoon of the 16th of July, 1867, the " England " was lying in the Bramley Moore Dock, in the river Mersey, laden with a cargo, and was about to proceed to New York. The " England," being a large and long vessel, required the services of a steam-tug in getting out into the river Mersey, and the steam-tug " Phœnix " was employed to perform the service. The " England," by working her own engines, came out of the Bramley Moore Dock, through the Wellington Half-tide Dock, into the Sandon Basin, and the " Phœnix " was there ready to pull the head of the " England " round into such a position as to enable her to steam out into the river. The wind at the time was blowing a moderate gale from the westward, and it was about half an hour before high water. The " England " had two check-ropes out: one of them was fast to the island, between the two entrances of the Wellington Half-tide Dock, and the other was fast to the south pier. Before the " Phœnix " had got into position the " England " had got so far into the basin that the first check-rope fast to the island had become nearly parallel with the side of the ship, and ceased to be of further use, but in consequence of the strain upon it it broke. The " Phœnix " then attempted to get into position, but in doing so, from some mismanagement, she fell across the remaining rope, and broke it, and carried away her own funnel and masts, and so became useless. Under these circumstances the " England " drifted into the north-east corner of the Sandon Basin, where she would have remained until the following tide. It was, however, desirable that the " England " should at once proceed into the river, and it being evident that the head of the vessel would be more expeditiously got round by employing the services of a steam-tug, signals were made for that purpose. The tug " Retriever " came into the basin, and having been engaged, she made her hawser fast to the " England," and proceeded to pull the head of the " England " into position, but the hawser broke. Another hawser was then passed from the " Retriever " to the " England," and the master of the "England" engaged another tug, called the "Rock Light," for the sum of 20*l*., to pull the head of the "Retriever" round into a proper position to enable her to tow the "England." Before, however, the "Rock Light" could make fast to the "Retriever" the tug "Knight Templar," which had been engaged by the Superintendent of the National Steamship Company whilst the master of the "England" was making the bargain with the "Rock Light," made fast to the "Retriever." The master of the "Knight Templar" then hailed the steam-tug "Royal Arch," and her hawser was made fast to the steam-tug "Knight Templar," and both tugs pulled the "England" until her head was pointed to the Sandon Basin entrance, when she went out by means of her own steam power, without receiving any further assistance.

The Judge of the Admiralty Court having heard counsel on both sides pronounced the sum of 60*l*. to be due to the master, owners and crew of the steam-tug "Knight Templar," and the sum of 20*l*. to the master, owners, and crew of the steam-tug "Royal Arch," together with costs.

From this decree the present appeal was brought.

Aspinall and Lushington, for the appellants, referred to "The Saratoga" (Lush. 318).

Milward and Clarkson, for the respondents, were not heard.

SELWYN, L.J., delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—Their Lordships had occasion so very recently to consider the principles upon which this Board acts in reviewing the decisions of the Judge of the Court below, in respect of sums allotted for salvage services, that it will be quite unnecessary to go again through the authorities. But their Lordships think it material to observe that, in the judgment which was pronounced yesterday, it was not the intention of this Board to enunciate, nor in terms did they enunciate, any new principle; but that judgment consisted mainly in a citation of the previously existing authorities, and to those authorities, then and now, their Lordships are determined to adhere. It is unnecessary to refer to them at any length, but there are two principal ones in the same volume of Moore's Reports, "The Clarisse" (12 Moore. P.C. 340), and "The Neptune" (12 Moore, P.C. 346). In the latter case Lord Kingsdown, in expressing the opinion of the this Board, says, "It is a settled rule, and one of great utility, particularly with reference to cases of this description, that the difference ought to be very considerable to induce a Court of appeal to interfere upon a question of mere discretion." That which we therefore have to determine is whether it is right in the present case for us to interfere with the judicial discretion which has been exercised by the Judge of the Court below?

Now, it has been justly observed that we have first to consider the position of danger and difficulty in which the property that was rescued was at the time; and in the argument it has been contended that this ship, the "England," was in a position of very great difficulty and danger, and in the case of "The Saratoga" (Lush. 318) has been cited as an analogous case. Their Lordships think that case is very useful by way of contrast to the present case; because here, although there was no doubt a gale of some violence blowing (the witnesses differed as to the extent), it must always be remembered that this ship was a ship with its own steam power perfectly ready to be exercised —a ship in a condition to go to sea which had met with no casualty whatever, and which was not only within the harbour and within the river, but actually within the Sandon Basin, no doubt in a position of considerable difficulty. Therefore, it may fairly be said she was in a position which might expose her to some considerable risk of detention, and possibly to some risk of loss, by straining, or otherwise; but she was not, by any means, in the position in which "The Saratoga" was, that having been a ship which was in a dismasted and crippled condition. It is admitted here that if she once got her head in the proper direction to the entrance into the river, she would, by means of her own unaided steam power, have been able to proceed upon her voyage.

Then we have to consider the amount of risk. We are told in the argument that these steam-tugs were rendering services of danger and peril to themselves. Their Lordships have consulted the nautical assessors upon this subject, and their opinion entirely concurs with that which their Lordships had formed for themselves on the evidence, viz., that the tugs on this occasion incurred no danger and no peril. It appears that one tug had already entered into an engagement to liberate this vessel, and by reason of an accident which occurred to that vessel in the peculiar circumstances in which she was placed, she had lost her funnel and her mast; but the other tugs had merely come through the open entrance into the basin, and then endeavoured to liberate the "England" from the position in which she was. It appears that a bargain was actually made with one of these vessels—a number of them having been collected together by the signals which had been sent up—a bargain was actually made with one of them, the "Rock Light," to perform that very service; and there was no evidence to shew that the "Rock Light" was unable or unwilling to perform that very service, which is called a service of peril and danger, but which in our opinion was neither perilous nor dangerous, for a sum of 20*l.*; but by the superior skill or good fortune of the "Knight Templar" the "Rock Light" was anticipated by the "Knight Templar," and the "Knight Templar," with the assistance of the "Royal Arch," which performed a comparatively trifling service, succeeded in towing this vessel round.

We think, therefore, considering the position in which the "England" was at the time, considering that the services rendered by the tugs were rendered in what may be called the ordinary course of their business, and rendered in a manner which exposed them to no danger or difficulty, there is nothing whatever to induce this Board to believe that the sum which was awarded by the learned Judge was other than a reasonable remuneration for the services rendered. And then, when we consider the principle referred to at the commencement of these observations, viz., that the difference ought to be very considerable to induce a Court of Appeal to interfere on a question of mere discretion, we think there is no foundation for this appeal, and that it is our duty to advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the Court below, and to dismiss the appeal with costs.

Jurisdiction—Damage—Loss of Life—Action by Representative.

SHIPPING.—The High Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction in a suit by the representative of a deceased, for injury to the latter by collision between two vessels.

The plaintiff in this suit is the mother and administratrix of John Bousted, who was one of the crew of a fishing lugger, which on the 3rd of January last, at about four p.m., was sunk off Brighton, by a collision between that vessel and the "Guldfaxe."

Digitized by Google

The plaintiff, in her petition, stated the circumstances of the collision, and alleged that it was caused by the neglect, default and mismanagement of the "Guldfaxe."

E. C. Clarkson, for the owners of the "Guldfaxe" (defendants), moved the Court to reject the petition.—This Court has no jurisdiction to award damages at the suit of the representative of a person killed by a collision. No Court has any such jurisdiction except under Lord Campbell's Act, and that statute, from its terms, does not refer to this Court, but is applicable exclusively to Courts of common law.

Butt, for the plaintiff.—If the injury in this case had not resulted in death the defendants' ship would have been liable—"The Sylph" (37 L. J. Adm. 14). Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93. s. 1.) gives a new right, and not merely a new remedy. The Admiralty Court Act, 1861, s. 7, gives the Court jurisdiction in any claim for any damage, and therefore it is bound to entertain the suit. As to the objection that the damages are to be assessed by a jury, even if that were necessary, this Court has power to summon a jury—"The Ruckers" (4 C. Rob. 73, notis); or it might direct an issue for the purpose, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 11—"The Harriet" (1 New Rep. 439). The present suit is not without precedent. In the "Rouen" the Court awarded damages under similar circumstances—see Taylor v. Dewar (5 Best. & S. 50; 23 L. J. Q.B. 141). In certain cases the legislature has directed this Court to assess damages for loss of life—"The Borodino" (5 L. T. 291).

Pritchard, on the same side.—The question is not whether the legislature, in passing Lord Campbell's Act, intended it to apply to the Admiralty Court Act, but whether the provisions of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, have reference to Lord Campbell's Act. The words of the 7th section of the former are large enough to include the present case, and the right of action given by Lord Campbell's Act can be separated from the form of remedy therein prescribed. The words of that statute as to a jury are discretionary only, and there is no occasion for a jury to assess damages in the Admiralty Court, as that Court has already the machinery for doing so in the registrar and merchants, and constantly exercises it.

Sir R. J. Phillimore.—Though it has been suggested, and is possible that this Court may at one time have exercised original jurisdiction in such a suit as the present, I do not think that there is sufficient evidence to be derived from the records of the Court, or from other sources, to warrant me in pronouncing in favour of the jurisdiction of the Court upon this ground. If the Court be competent to entertain this suit it must have derived such competence from statute law, and the counsel for the plaintiff have mainly—I might almost say exclusively—relied upon certain recent statutes, as having conferred this jurisdiction upon the Court.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine these statutes. In the year 1846 the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, commonly called Lord Campbell's Act, entitled "An act for compensating the families of persons killed by accidents," was passed. That statute recited, that "no action at law is now maintainable against a person who by his wrongful act, neglect or default, may have caused the death of another person, and it is oftentimes right and expedient that the wrongdoer in such case should be answerable in damages for the injury so caused by him;" and it proceeds further to enact, that "whensoever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect or default, and the act, neglect or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then and in every such case the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony." The effect of this statute, then, was to give a new right previously unknown to the common law, according to which all suits founded on a personal injury or tort died with the person. The statute proceeds to specify the person for whom, and the manner in which the action shall be brought, and the remedy which shall be applied for the injury as follows (section 2): "that every such action shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent or child of the person whose death shall have been so caused, and shall be brought by and in the name of the executor or administrator of the person deceased; and in every such action the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought; and the amount so recovered, after deducting the costs not recovered from the defendant, shall be divided amongst the before-mentioned parties in such shares as the jury by their verdict shall find and direct."

This statute, though it effected the material alteration in the Common Law which I have mentioned, conferred no jurisdiction upon the Admiralty Court. The next statute I have to consider is the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. s. 514), which enacted as follows: "In cases where any liability has been, or is alleged to have been incurred by any owner in respect of loss of life, personal injury, or loss of or damage to ships, boats or goods, and several claims are made or apprehended in respect of such liability, then subject to the right hereinbefore given to the Board of Trade of recovering damages in the United Kingdom, in respect of loss of life or personal injury, it shall be lawful in England or Ireland for the High Court of Chancery, and in Scotland for the Court of Session, and in any British possession for any competent Court to entertain proceedings at the suit of any owner for the purpose of determining the amount of such liability, subject as aforesaid; and for the distribution of such amount rateably amongst the several claimants; with power for any such Court to stop all actions and suits pending in any other Court in relation to the same subject-matter; and any proceeding entertained by such Court of Chancery, or Court of Session, or other competent Court, may be conducted in such manner, and subject to such regulations as to making any persons interested parties to the same, and as to the exclusion of any claimants who do not come in within a certain time, and as to requiring security from the owner, and as to payment of costs, as the Court thinks just."

The Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 13, conferred upon the High Court of Admiralty the same jurisdiction which the Court of Chancery possessed under the former statute. It is clear, therefore, that if in this very case of damage there had been several claimants, including the present plaintiff, and if the defendant had instituted a suit in this Court for the purpose of limiting the amount of his liability, and for the distribution of such amount rateably amongst the claimants, it would have been the duty of the Court to have entertained the suit. And it follows from this proposition that the intervention of a jury would not be a necessary or the only means of enforcing the remedy against a wrong-doer under Lord Campbell's Act.

The Admiralty Court Act, 1861, enacts by its 7th section, "that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship." Following the precedent set me by my learned predecessor, I have already ruled that the words of this section embrace the case of damage inflicted by a vessel upon other property than ships and upon persons—"The Sylph" (37 L. J. Adm. 14; L. R. 2 Adm. 24). It is true that Lord Campbell's Act contemplates only an action against the person; but then the 35th section of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, enacts as follows: "The jurisdiction conferred by this act on the High Court of Admiralty may be exercised either by proceedings in rem, or by proceedings in personam;" and it was admitted by the counsel for the defendant that the argument to be derived from the language of Lord Campbell's Act was as strong against the jurisdiction of this Court in rem as in personam. In the much-considered case of Taylor v. Dewar (5 Best & S. 58; 23 L. J. Q.B. 141), I find the following passage "The vessel insured under this policy, the "Rouen," having come into collision with and run down another ship called the "Magyar," and the master and five of the crew of the latter having been drowned, the owners of the "Rouen" have, by the judgment of the Court of Admiralty, been condemned to pay damage to the personal representatives of the deceased, and such damages have been paid accordingly." The jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court appears, from the report of the argument, to have undergone some discussion, but it seems to have been assumed that this Court did possess and had rightfully exercised such jurisdiction.

I referred to this decision in the previous case of "The Sylph" (37 L. J. Adm. 14; L. R. 2 Adm. 24), but I had not then caused any inquiry to be made into the history of the cause in the Admiralty Court. But since the institution of this suit I have caused such inquiry to be made, and the result is very remarkable. No trace can be found that either the Court itself or the Registrar acting on behalf of the Court, came to any decision upon the question of payment of damages to the personal representatives of the deceased; or, indeed, as far as I can find, entertained the question at all—perhaps it was an arrangement made out of Court; certainly the declaration assumed the fact that the Court of Admiralty had decided on the case. This case, therefore, it is right to say, does not furnish the assistance to the Court which the passage in the judgment to which I have adverted would at first sight appear to afford. The question is by no means free from difficulty; but upon the whole I have arrived at the conclusion that I ought to pronounce for the jurisdiction of this Court, and accordingly, though not without doubt and hesitation, I do so. But I will give leave to the defendant to appeal from this decision should such be his desire.

Bottomry—Loss of Ship—Average Salvage.

SHIPPING.—A bottomry bond contained a stipulation that, "in case of the loss of the ship, such an average" should be paid "as by custom shall have become due on the salvage, or if on the said voyage the said ship shall be utterly lost, cast away or destroyed," then that the bond should be void. The vessel subsequently was compelled to put into another port for repairs, and there condemned and sold, and the proceeds were remitted to this country:—Held, that the whole of the proceeds were liable for satisfaction of the bond.

This was a cause of bottomry instituted on behalf of the holders of a bottomry bond on the ship "Great Pacific," against the proceeds of the sale of that vessel. A mortgagee of the ship had intervened, and put in an answer to the plaintiffs' petition; and the case came before the Court on a motion by the plaintiffs to reject so much of this answer as alleged—first, that nothing was due on the bond; and secondly, that the plaintiffs were only entitled to an average on the proceeds of the sale.

The "Great Pacific," a ship of 2,088 tons, chartered for a voyage from Callao to the Chincha Islands, and thence to Great Britain, put into Sydney, N.S.W., in need of repairs; and in order to obtain funds the master was obliged to borrow from the plaintiffs, on bottomry of his ship and freight, the sum of 5,037*l*., which, with maritime interest for the voyage at 45*l*. per cent., amounted to the agreed sum of 7,301*l*. After the ship had been refitted, she proceeded to the Chinchas and loaded a cargo of guano, with which she sailed for England. She encountered bad weather on her voyage, was compelled to put into Valparaiso, and was there condemned and sold as unworthy of repairs, and the proceeds of the sale, 3,628*l*., were remitted to England and brought into Court in this suit. The bond contained the usual provision that the vessel and freight were assigned for security, and should be delivered to no other purpose until payment of the bond and interest; and it was conditioned to become void in case of payment of the sum of 7,301*l.* before twelve hours after safe arrival, "or in case of the loss of the said ship or vessel, such an average as by custom shall have become due on the salvage," or in case the ship should be utterly lost, cast away, or destroyed by perils of the seas, &c.

C. P. Butt and Cohen, for the plaintiffs.—As between shipowner and bondholder there is no such thing as a constructive total loss of the ship; the ship must cease to exist to relieve from the obligation of the bond. The "Great Pacific," so far from being destroyed, had been sold as a ship; and it was the voluntary act of her owners by their election not to repair which had prevented her arrival in England, and therefore the bondholders are entitled to be paid and to receive the proceeds of the sale; there is no salvage in this case within the meaning of the bond; and salvage is not used therein in reference to the case of a constructive total loss and a voluntary sale, but to the fragments and relics that might be saved from a total wreck. The use of the phrase may be traced back to the times when it was usual to borrow on bottomry the amounts required to fit out Spanish galleons for the Indies, and such a form of bottomry bond on the "Queen of the Angels" and "St. Charles," bound from Cadiz to Vera Cruz, is to be found in Weskett on Insurances, edit. 1731.

T. C. Mathew and E. C. Clarkson, for the defendants.—The "Great Pacific" has been lost within the meaning of the condition. For all practical purposes she ceased to be a ship when she could not be repaired, and had been prevented by perils of the sea from completing her voyage. A bondholder is not entitled to any salvage, and the proceeds of this sale were salvage; at all events, an average only on this salvage was due to the plaintiffs, and it is for the registrar and merchants to determine what that average is.

Sir R. J. Phillimore.—The questions which the Court has to decide are, whether a valid defence is set up against the holder of the bottomry bond, who claims to be paid the full amount of his loan.

There is no question as to the validity of the bond, and the freight has been wholly lost. As to the first position, namely, that nothing is due on the bond, it is necessary in this case, as in all cases of the same description, to look carefully at the terms of the instrument itself, although it has always been the practice and is clearly the duty of the Court to put a reasonable and liberal, and not a technical, construction upon them.

The bond contains the usual statement that the "Great Pacific" and her freight are assigned over for the security of the respondentia taken up by the said William Baillie aforesaid, "and shall be delivered to no other use or purpose whatsoever until the payment of this bond is first made with the premium that may become due thereon." The condition of the bond is, that the vessel shall with all reasonable speed duly prosecute and complete without deviation her voyage, the perils, damages, casualties and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation excepted; and that within twelve hours of the safe arrival of the ship at the port of her destination the money due on the bond shall be paid to the lender; and then follow these words, upon which the contention of the defendant has been mainly founded, "or in case of the loss of the said ship or vessel, such an average as by custom shall have become due on the salvage, or if on the said voyage the said ship or vessel should be utterly lost, cast away or destroyed," then the bond was to be void and of no effect.

An examination of the authorities and decided cases upon this subject satisfies me that, generally speaking, money advanced on a bottomry bond becomes due and payable to the lender not only when the vessel arrives in safety at her port of destination, but whenever her voyage is ended at some intermediate place, as in this case, by the voluntary act of her master, the servant of her owner; and that under the category of voluntary acts must be included the sale of the vessel by him at an intermediate port, because the expense of her necessary repairs would exceed the reasonable value of the vessel herself—see cases collected on this point in 2 Parsons on Maritime Law, p. 409, book 1, c. 19; 2 Arnould on Insurance, "Chapters on Absolute Total Loss and Constructive Total Loss of Ship," Thompson v. the Royal Exchange Assurance Company (1 M. & S. 31), and "The Elephanta" (15 Jur. 1185; 18 L. T. 248). I will assume that in this case there was what is called a constructive total loss of the ship, which would have entitled her owners to recover from the underwriters the whole amount of her insurance, but there has not been that actual or absolute total loss which would discharge from his liability the borrower of money upon bottomry, inasmuch as the ship existed in specie at the time of her sale. Such being the general law, can it be successfully contended that the words of the bond to which I have adverted prevent the application of the law to this case? It has been pressed upon me that by these words a distinction was intended to be drawn between the loss and the utter loss of the vessel. That in the latter case the bond was to be entirely void, and the borrower to take no interest whatever; and, in the former case, only an average of the salvage such as by custom might be due; and that the amount obtained from the sale of the vessel represents the total salvage of which the lender, if he be entitled to anything, is entitled to an average, for it can hardly be said to have been seriously contended that to this, at least, he was not entitled. I am unable to accede to the construction of the words in the bond contended for by the defendant. It appears upon an examination of the old forms of bonds (copies of which are to be found in the early editions of Abbott on Shipping, and the work of Weskett—a complete digest of the laws of insurance—edit. 1781, pp. 46, 48, 58) that a stipulation couched in these very words was of common occurrence, derived probably from the mercantile usage of Spain with respect to vessels trading with the Spanish West Indies; and that it referred to cases in which the ship had been so wrecked that portions of her alone remained, such as planks, spars, rigging and the like, when, to use the expression of Emérigon (chap. xvii. sec. 8. vol. ii. p. 213, edit. 1827), "Les débris du navire naufragé existent, mais le navire n'existe plus." It is not necessary that I should express an opinion whether, in the contingency of such a wreck, the lender would or would not be entitled to this kind of salvage by the common law merchant, or whether, in order that he should have this right, the insertion of these words was necessary. In my opinion, they contemplate an event which has not happened in this case, and have no effect on the application of the law to the event in the present instance, which has rendered these proceeds that represent the ship liable to the claim of the bondholder, namely, the sale by the master of the ship at an intermediate port which the law in cases of bottomry like the present holds to be equivalent to the safe arrival of the vessel at her port of destination. I pronounce, therefore, for the prayer of the bondholder, and direct the articles in question to be struck out of the answer.

Damage—Arrest of Ship after subsequent Sale—Maritime Lien.

SHIPPING.—In March, 1866, the French vessel C. A. having come into collision with the R., the master of the C. A. gave in satisfaction of the damage a bill of exchange for 82*l.* 5*s.*, payable on the arrival of the C. A. at her destined port of S. in Scotland. The C. A., instead of proceeding to S., went to France, where she was sold by the syndics of her owner's estate. In December, 1867, the vessel again came to England, and was arrested for the damage:—Held, that the lien for damage was not lost by laches or the subsequent sale of the vessel.

This was a cause of damage in which the owners of the English schooner "Risk" proceeded against the French schooner "Charles Amelia" to recover for the loss resulting from a collision between the two vessels.

The facts were undisputed, and were stated in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court on the questions of law involved.

On March 13, 1866, the "Charles Amelia" came into collision with the "Risk" in Bridlington Bay. The French captain admitted that his ship was to blame, and, in order to save her from being arrested, on March 19 drew what purported to be a bill of exchange on his own owner, M. Lapégue, of Bayonne, for 82*l*. 5*s*. (the agreed damage), in favour of the owners of the "Risk," payable three days after the arrival of the "Charles Amelia" at Sunderland, to which port he represented that he was bound. The owners of the "Risk" took no steps at the time to arrest the "Charles Amelia," and she put to sea, but, instead of going to Sunderland, sailed home to France. In February, 1867, Lapégue became bankrupt, and in August, 1867, the "Charles Amelia" was sold by auction by the syndics of his estate, under the provisions and with the forms prescribed by the Code de Commerce. She was purchased by her present owners without any notice of the collision with the "Risk," and made one or more voyages as their property, and did not return to England until December, 1867, when, the amount of the bill of exchange not having been paid, she was at once arrested in the present suit by the owners of the "Risk."

V. Lushington, for the plaintiffs, insisted that the case was governed by the English and not French law; that a maritime lien attached to the "Charles Amelia" at the time of the collision, which had never been lost by laches on the part of the plaintiffs, and therefore affected the vessel in the hands of her new owners; that taking the bill of exchange did not destroy their lien; that the sale of the ship in France was not a sale en justice, and if it was, that it would not be noticed by an English Court, because it was not of the nature of a proceeding in rem.

C. P. Butt, for the defendants, relied on the proposition that, where one or two innocent persons must suffer, he who has been guilty of laches, or who, having the opportunity, has neglected to enforce his rights, must bear the loss; that the plaintiffs had voluntarily omitted to arrest the "Charles Amelia," and had shewn a want of reasonable diligence in not taking proceedings against the owner in his domicil, or making their claim under his bankruptcy; and also that the sale of the ship by the syndics was what the French Code calls la vente en justice, and gave to purchasers who had complied with its requirements a clear title to the vessel of which an English Court would take notice.

SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE.—This is a special case, the first I believe which has been brought before this Court, in which the facts stated therein have been agreed upon by both parties, and upon which facts so stated the opinion of the Court as to the law applicable to them has been sought by both parties. It is also agreed that the Court may draw any inference of fact from the statement in the case.

It is necessary to state, as concisely as I can, the facts to which I am to apply the law. On March 13, 1865, the French schooner "Charles Amelia," of which the owner was a Frenchman, by name Lapégue, and which was under the command of a Frenchman by name Guicheney, came into collision with an English schooner called the "Risk," in Bridlington Bay, and in British waters. The master of the French schooner admitted his liability to make good the damage caused by the collision, and signed the following agreement:

"Bridlington Bay, March 15, 1866.

"Memorandum of agreement made this day between Robert Benzie, owner of the schooner 'Risk,' of Rochester, one the one part, and Captain Bernard Guicheney, of Bayonne, on the other part.

"That the said Robert Benzie hereby agrees to receive the sum of 45*l*. clear money as a full discharge of his claim against Bernard Guicheney for the damage of his, the said Robert Benzie's schooner, 'Risk' has sustained in the fouling of the two vessels; but the sum does not include the claim of the boatmen who assisted the 'Risk' into this place, nor any law expenses that may be contingent on the adjustment of the same, the whole of which, namely, the salvage of ships and other charges, are to be fully and entirely borne by the said Bernard Guicheney.

"Furthermore, the said Robert Benzie does not hereby prejudice any claim that he may have to make in this matter if the money is not paid at the agreed time, nor does he bind himself to consider this as a proper compensation should he ultimately have to sue for the cost of the damage the 'Risk' has sustained.

"B. GUICHENEY.
"ROBERT BENZIE.

"Witnesses, to both signatures,
"T. A. Murray.
"Hy. W. H. Knocker, Com. R.N."

It appears that a further expense was incurred of 33*l*. 13*s*. for the payment of the boatmen who took the "Risk" into harbour. The master of the French schooner declared that he was going to Sunderland, and in order to avoid the arrest of his vessel he, at the suggestion of the French Consul, gave to Benzie and Day the following bill of exchange drawn upon the French owner of the vessel:

"Bridlington Quay, March 19, 1866.

"£82 5 0.

"Three days after my arrival in Sunderland pay to the order of Benzie and Day, of Maidstone, in the county of Kent, eighty-two pounds and five shillings, for value received on behalf of my ship the 'Charles Amelia.'

"B. GUICHENEY.

"To Mr. Armand Lapégue,
"Shipowner, Bayonne."

The plaintiffs in consequence forbore to arrest the French schooner, which sailed from Bridlington on March 19, but the master, in fraud of his agreement with the plaintiffs, took her to France, and she has never since been to Sunderland.

On March 27 the plaintiff's solicitor wrote to the French owner Lapégue as follows:

"27, Leadenhall Street, London,
"March 27, 1866.

"Sir,—Your vessel called the 'Charles Amelia' recently caused some damage to a vessel called the 'Risk,' and Captain Guicheney ultimately agreed that the amount of damage so caused was 82*l*. 5*s*. For this sum he drew a bill of exchange upon you, which he handed to Messrs. Benzie and Day, the owners of the 'Risk.' He promised to pay the amount of this bill of exchange so soon as the ship arrived in Sunderland, but up to the present time we cannot find he has arrived; at all events the bill remains unpaid, and we have now to request that you will be good enough to instruct your correspondents in this country to pay, either to Messrs. Benzie and Day, or to us on their behalf, the said sum of 82*l*. 5*s*., in exchange for the bill of exchange drawn by the captain upon you."

This letter was answered on March 30, and such answer was received by the solicitors on April 2. It was as follows:

"J'ai en mon pouvoir votre de 27 courant. Il est vrai que le Capitaine Guicheney a signé un traité, mais après ce qu'il m'écrit cette signature lui a été extorquée. Aujourd'hui en il est sur territoire Français; il proteste, et je ne peux vous dire si je paierai sette somme avant d'avoir lu son rapport."

No part of the 82*l*. 5*s*. has ever been paid, and the bill of exchange has been brought into Court.

Some time in January or February, 1867, as I was informed by counsel (a blank being left for the date in the case), Lapégue, while still sole owner of the "Charles Amelia," became bankrupt at Bayonne. According to the French law certain persons were duly appointed syndics or assignees of his estate; and, on August 26, after taking the preliminary measures required by the French law, they caused the schooner to be sold by public auction. The present defendants being the highest bidders, and, having no notice or knowledge of the collision, purchased the schooner, which was in due form of law transferred to them. She made a sea voyage in their name and at their risk, but it has been admitted by counsel that this fact in no way affects the case. The schooner returned to British waters in December, 1867, and was arrested at Dover in the present suit.

The following propositions of fact and law are therefore uncontroverted: first, that the "Charles Amelia" has been a wrongdoer, and would, in ordinary circumstances, notwithstanding the change in her ownership, have remained liable to make compensation to the English vessel for the wrong done to her; secondly, that the document referred to as a bill of exchange, whatever be its proper title, has left this liability of the res or ship unaffected. The case of "The Bold Buccleugh" (7 Moore, 267) establishes the legal proposition that the obligatio ex delicto arising from the collision constituted a maritime lien which travelled with the ship to whatsoever owner she might belong. But it has been contended by the defendants in this case that there are peculiar circumstances which take it out of the operation of the principle of law referred to. These circumstances are, first, the laches of the plaintiffs in the prosecution of their claim; secondly, the sentence of a French Court of justice which transferred the ownership of a vessel free from all liabilities or claims to the defendants. The laches is alleged to have taken place at two distinct periods. First, in not immediately arresting the ship, but allowing her to depart in the circumstances which I have stated. It is urged that the plaintiffs had six days at least during which it was competent to them to have arrested this vessel, and that having foregone their right and lost their opportunity they cannot now enforce it to the detriment of the present innocent owners of the vessel. It was further contended that the plaintiffs were at all events guilty of laches in not taking proceedings at Bayonne, which they knew to be the domicil of the then owner of the ship; and in support of these positions the following passage from the case of "The Bold Buccleugh" (7 Moore, 267) was relied upon: "This rule, which is simple and intelligible, is, in our opinion, applicable to all cases. It is not necessary to say that the lien is indelible, and may not be lost by negligence or delay where the rights of third parties may be compromised, but when reasonable diligence is used, and the proceedings are had in good faith, the lien may be enforced into whosesoever possession the thing may come." The case of "The Europa" (Bro. & Lush. 91; 32 L. J. Adm. 188) was also referred to. Having regard, however, to the admitted facts in this case, I am of opinion that the lien attached to this vessel by the wrongful act of her master has not been obliterated by any laches of the plaintiffs upon either of the occasions which have been adverted to. Not upon the first occasion, for the plaintiffs had every reason to rely on the good faith of the French master, guaranteed as it was in a great degree by the French consul, and had no reason whatever to anticipate the fraud of which it is admitted the French master was afterwards guilty. Not upon the second occasion, for they took reasonable steps to recover the debt by the correspondence which I have read. They received no notice whatever of the bankruptcy of the French owner or of the intended sale of the vessel; and it would be, in my judgment, a great misconception of what the law means by laches to consider them guilty of it because they did not personally pursue the French owner of this vessel to Bayonne and embark in litigation before a foreign Court, which must have been expensive on account of bringing over witnesses, and uncertain on the point of jurisdiction.

There remains to be considered the second branch of the defence, namely, the effect of the sentence of the French tribunal. I have considered the passages in the French Code de Commerce which relate to the sale of this vessel, and am by no means satisfied that an obligatio ex delicto, such as exists in the present case, would, regard being had to all the circumstances, especially that the obligee was a foreigner resident abroad and wholly ignorant of the proceedings, be considered by those who administer French law to have been extinguished by this vente en justice. The proceedings in the French Courts were certainly not proceedings in rem, but apparently resembled those which would be taken in bankruptcy in this country, and which would not extinguish a maritime lien. I must also consider that the lex loci commissi delicti and the lex fori agree in holding that the maritime lien on this vessel still subsists.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in this suit; and I therefore decree in favour of the plaintiffs, and pronounce for the damage proceeded for, and condemn the defendants therein and in costs, and direct that the accounts and vouchers relating to such damage be referred to the registrar and merchants to report as to the amount thereof.

Pleading — Variance — Answer — Material Allegation — Proof — Admiralty Rules, 1859, No. 67.

SHIPPING.—On appeal from the Admiralty Court in a case of collision by drifting, between two vessels originally at anchor, the statement in the defendants' answer in the Court below as to the bearing of their vessel in respect to the other when at anchor, varied from the proof:—Held, that the statement as to the bearing of one vessel in respect of the other when at anchor was immaterial, and was therefore not necessary under the Admiralty Rules, 1859, No. 67, and that the variance was therefore immaterial.

This was an appeal from cross causes in the High Court of Admiralty, by the owners of the brig "Alice" and the brig "Rosita" respectively, to recover damages for a collision which occurred between the vessels in Margate Roads, on February 6, 1867.

The "Alice" was a brig of 238 tons register, and at the time of the collision in question, was bound from Newcastle-upon-Tyne to Havre with coals.

The "Rosita" was a brig of 151 tons register, and was bound to Rouen with coals.

On February 4, 1867, in consequence of adverse winds, the "Alice" put into Margate Roads, and was brought to anchor. In the afternoon of the same day the "Rosita" also came to anchor in Margate Roads. On February 6 both vessels were getting under weigh, and the appellants alleged that the port anchor of the "Alice" was hove up to the bow, and that the crew were engaged in catting it. That the starboard chain was still out, with nearly ninety fathoms of chain, and that the "Alice" was lying with her head to the north-eastward, with the wind on her port quarter; that whilst in this position the "Alice" was sheered to leeward of her starboard anchor, which was lying off her port blow; and that at this time the "Rosita," with the wind on her starboard quarter, was lying distant about a cable's length to the north-westward of the "Alice" on her port quarter.

In these circumstances the appellants alleged that the "Rosita," with a strong wind abaft and her yards nearly square, dragged her anchors, and came down before the wind stem on towards the port quarter of the "Alice." That the "Rosita" was hailed to port her helm, and go astern of the "Alice," but her helm was lashed amidships, and nothing was done on board the "Rosita," and she came nearly stem on into the port quarter of the "Alice" abaft the main rigging, the jib-boom and bowsprit of the "Rosita" going over the deck of the "Alice." The "Rosita" subsequently, rising with the sea, struck with her port bow the port quarter of the "Alice" further aft, and then passed across her stern.

By the third article of their answer in the Admiralty Court, the respondents alleged that before the collision the "Alice" which had been riding about half a mile to the south-west of the "Rosita," came driving down athwart the tide towards the "Rosita." That she had but one anchor down, and though hailed from the "Rosita," that she did not hoist her foretopmast-staysail, or fill her fore-yard, until it was too late to prevent collision.

The learned Judge of the Court below held that the "Alice" was solely to blame.

From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

Milward and Pritchard, for the appellants; Deane and Lushington, for the respondents.

[LORD CHELMSFORD.—Their Lordships have been placed in some little difficulty in this case, and they desire to hear one counsel on a side in the "Rosita's" suit, upon this ground, that the cause of injury is not properly alleged in the pleadings. There have been recent decisions in which their lordships have held it to be necessary that a party seeking redress for an injury can only recover secundum allegata et probata. In a case in which the circumstances proved did not establish the allegations in the pleadings, although upon the true state of facts the complainant would have been entitled to recover, the learned Judge of the Court of Admiralty having decided against him, upon what their Lordships considered to be an erroneous ground, yet they felt themselves bound to declare that the judgment ought to be affirmed, not upon the ground on which it was pronounced, but because the case set up by the appellants had not been proved by the evidence. In the present case, in the third allegation in the answer of the "Rosita," it is alleged that the brig "Alice" had been riding about half a mile to the south-west of the "Rosita," and that she came driving down athwart the tide towards the "Rosita," and so the injury happened. Now, their Lordships are clearly of opinion that it is most distinctly proved that the "Alice" was to the south-east, and not to the south-west of the "Rosita," and they think it has been shewn very clearly that if the "Alice" had been to the south-west of the "Rosita," the collision never could have taken place in the way in which it actually occurred. Under these circumstances, the "Alice" comes here to meet a different case from that which is alleged on the pleadings of the "Rosita." Their Lordships are particularly anxious to hear one counsel on a side upon the subject of the pleadings; and whether, supposing their Lordships should be of opinion that the "Alice" was in fault, the "Rosita" would be entitled to their judgment, inasmuch as she has not stated her case correctly and properly.]

Pritchard, for the appellants.—It is a rule of pleading that in causes of damages the plaintiffs can only succeed secundum allegata et probata—"The Ann" (1 Lush. 55; 13 Moore P.C. 198); "The North American" (Swabey, 358; 12 Moore P.C. 331), "The Amalia" (7 Bro. & Lush. 311). The owners of the "Rosita" must under the circumstances be considered the plaintiffs in the suit. The question arises under the allegation in their answers. They can only establish their case in accordance with the facts pleaded. No doubt in certain cases a discrepancy between the pleadings and the proofs is not regarded when the facts incorrectly pleaded are immaterial. But in this case the owners of the "Rosita" have not accurately pleaded a fact that is material to their case. The bearings of the vessels when they first came in sight must always be material. The New Rules have modified pleadings in the Admiralty Court. But in "The Claus Thomesen" (32 L. J. Adm. 106) the late learned Judge of the Admiralty Court decided that in general the requisites of pleadings remain substantially the same as before the New Rules.

Deane, for the respondents.—No doubt the New Rules of Pleading in the Admiralty Court require the plaintiff in the suit to allege in his pleading all the material facts of the case, and it is equally a rule that the plaintiff can only recover secundum allegata et probata. It may even be admitted that the owners of the "Rosita" stand in this respect, as to their allegation, in the position of plaintiffs in the suit. They present a distinct case to the Court on their own behalf. But what do the Rules of Pleading require? They require that the "article of the pleadings shall contain a statement of the facts material to the issue." But the position of the vessels when at anchor and before they drifted is not a fact material to the issue. The statement as to the position of the "Alice" was mere surplusage; the fact that the proof did not support the allegation is immaterial.—They referred to "The Moderation" (1 Moo. N.S. 528) and "The Despatch" (14 Moore P.C. 83).

Lord Chelmsford (Nov. 28).—These cases have been argued before their Lordships upon somewhat different grounds from those upon which the argument, and apparently the judgment, proceeded in the Court below. I say apparently, because it appears that by the correction of an evident mistake in the printed judgment the foundation of the argument against it will be entirely removed. The mistake arises in the statement of the relative positions of the two vessels just before the collision. There is no doubt that, according to the evidence on both sides, when the "Rosita" came to an anchor in the Margate Roads on February 4, she was to the north-west of the "Alice," and, consequently, the "Alice" was to the south-east of her. It does not appear, although the distance between the vessels was probably lessened, that their relative position to each other was ever altered. In the answer on the part of the "Rosita," and in her petition in the cross-suit, it is said that the "Alice" had been riding about half a mile to the south-west of the "Rosita," and that she came driving down athwart the tide towards the "Rosita." Their Lordships are satisfied that, under the alleged state of circumstances, the vessels could not have come together as they did, viz., the port quarter of the "Alice" in contact with the port bow of the "Rosita." It is evident when the learned Judge states that the Trinity Masters think it impossible upon the statement that the collision could have taken place as described, and that they are of opinion that the "Alice" must have been to the south-eastward and not to the north-westward of the "Rosita" on the morning of the collision; that the words "north-westward" are a mistake, and that it must be read "to the south-westward," or, at all events, that the negative proposition may be rejected altogether, and the opinion of the Trinity Masters taken, that the "Alice" must have been to the south-eastward of the "Rosita." The great contest between the parties is, which vessel drifted? In the answer of the "Alice" to the petition it is said, "The 'Rosita' was lying on the port beam of the 'Alice,' and the crew of the 'Rosita' were heaving in her chains. Under the circumstances aforesaid, those on board the 'Alice' observed the 'Rosita' with her port chain taut under her bow, and apparently dragging her anchor, coming down over the tide and before the wind with her yards square, and stem on towards the port quarter of the 'Alice.'" On the other side, the "Rosita" says, that it was the "Alice" that drifted upon her.

Now there is contradictory evidence upon this subject, each set of witnesses stating the case in favour of the vessel to which they respectively belong. Upon these questions of fact the learned Judge of the Court of Admiralty states, in concurrence with the opinion of the Trinity Masters, that "the 'Rosita' says she was riding with sixty fathoms of chain on the port anchor and twenty-five on the starboard, and another anchor attached belonging to the 'Shamrock'; and this weight of anchors renders it extremely improbable that the 'Rosita' could have drifted down on the 'Alice.'" Now, the learned Judge having come to this conclusion upon a question of fact, even if their Lordships doubted whether that conclusion was correct, unless they were perfectly clear that it was wrong, they would be disposed to adopt his decision. But their Lordships are satisfied (and they have the assistance of very able assessors here, who concur in that view), that the fact is as the learned Judge has decided it to be. That being the case, if the "Rosita" did not drift upon the "Alice," the case of the "Alice" fails altogether, because it is the very foundation of her case that the "Rosita" moved, that she drifted down upon her, and that the collision was occasioned in that way. Therefore, thus entirely failing in the proof of the averment in her petition, of course her case must altogether fail; and their Lordships, under the circumstances, will have no difficulty in recommending to Her Majesty that the sentence of the Judge of the Court of Admiralty should be affirmed, and the appeal of the "Alice" dismissed with costs.

Turning to the case of the "Rosita" and to the objection, which must be considered as a preliminary objection which is made to the pleadings and to the proof in support of those pleadings, it is objected on the part of the respondent that the statement of the "Rosita" that the brig "Alice" had been riding about half-a-mile to the south-west of the "Rosita" is a material allegation, and, being disproved by the evidence, the case of the "Rosita" must altogether fail. Now, their Lordships are extremely anxious to adhere with as much strictness as possible to the rule which has been laid down in the various cases which have been cited in the course of the argument that a party can only recover secundum allegata et probata. But the question in this case is, whether the "Rosita" has not established every part of the allegation which was material to her cause, and whether the words which are referred to as not having been supported by the evidence were material, and necessary to be proved as part of that allegation.

Before the introduction of the New Rules, the pleadings in the Court of Admiralty were extremely diffuse, of which many of us have had experience, and in framing these rules it was considered important to reduce the length of pleadings, and to bring the parties to a short statement of the facts upon which they respectively founded their cases. Accordingly, the 67th of the Rules of 1859 says, "Every pleading shall be divided into short paragraphs numbered consecutively, which shall be called the 'articles of the pleadings,' and shall contain brief statements of the facts material to the issue." Now, the question upon these pleadings of the "Rosita" is, whether the statement that the "Alice" was riding to the south-west of her is a fact material to the issue. There can be no doubt whatever that if these vessels had been both in motion the bearings of the vessels with regard to each other would have been a most material fact to be alleged and proved, because the course to be adopted by the one vessel or the other would, of course, depend entirely upon their relative positions when they came in sight. But this is a case in which both the vessels were at anchor, and the material question is, which of the vessels drifted on the other. Now the position of either vessel, with regard to that material fact, does not appear to their Lordships to be an essential element in the statement of the cause of injury, and they have tried that question in various ways. The question was put to Dr. Pritchard whether, if the statement that the "Alice" was to the south-west of the "Rosita" had been entirely omitted from the pleadings, the allegation would have been insufficient; and he answered that in his view it certainly would not. Then, again, supposing this statement had been omitted altogether, could the respondent have gone to the Court of Admiralty to have the pleadings reformed on the ground of their omission of an essential circumstance in the allegation? There can be no doubt that that course could not have been successfully adopted. That being so, is it not evident that in the case of collision between two vessels originally at anchor, the bearing of the one vessel with respect to the other is not such a material fact as necessary to be stated upon the issue raised between the parties? Therefore we are not infringing any rule of the Court of Admiralty, or going contrary to any of the decisions upon this subject, by holding that the direction in which the "Alice" was riding with reference to the "Rosita" is not a fact material to the issue, and that the objection to the pleadings on this ground fails. It may be said, as it has been said, that the "Alice" was likely to have been misled by this allegation, because she must have been aware that if the vessels were in the position alleged by the "Rosita," it was quite impossible that the accident could have occurred in the way alleged; that is, by the port quarter of the "Alice" coming in contact with the port bow of the "Rosita." The parties might therefore have come to the Court prepared to meet a totally different case, and with a very different defence from that which it was necessary to oppose to the proof of a different relative position of the two vessels. But with regard to the possibility of any misleading, there could have been none in this case, because it is quite clear that the "Alice" stated the circumstances according to her own view; and placed the vessels in the exact position in which they were proved to be; therefore, even if the possibility of her being misled could have been an objection to these pleadings, the objection would have failed for want of a foundation. Under these circumstances, their Lordships are of opinion that the claim of the "Rosita" is not prejudiced by the allegation that the "Alice" was lying to the south-west of her before the collision, and that her case is fully established.

Now a very few words in regard to the mode in which the accident occurred. If the "Alice" had been to the south-west of the "Rosita," it is quite clear that the accident could not have occurred in the way described. But it must be taken as proved that the "Alice" was to the south-east of the "Rosita." Acting under the able assistance of our nautical assessors, their Lordships are of opinion that, taking the position of the vessels to have been as described, the "Alice" lying to the south-east of the "Rosita," the wind being to the northward of west, and the tide running in an opposite direction to the wind, the "Alice" having catted her port anchor, and the other anchor being out the whole length of the cable, eighty fathoms, the combined action of the wind and the tide would carry the "Alice" down towards the "Rosita" with a slackened chain, and that having drifted a cable's length (the distance between the two vessels), she would be checked, and then would drift down with the tide and come into collision with her port quarter against the port bow of the "Rosita." Thus it is satisfactorily shewn that the damage was occasioned by the drifting of the "Alice," and happened exactly in the way in which it has been proved to have occurred.

Under these circumstances, therefore, their Lordships will recommend Her Majesty to affirm the sentence of the Judge of the Court of Admiralty in favour of the "Rosita," and to dismiss the appeal of the "Alice," with costs.

Costs—Witnesses not Called.

SHIPPING.—The expenses of material and necessary witnesses may be allowed, even though they may not have been called at the trial.

This was a cause of damage by reason of a collision which took place between the steam-ship "Biddick" and a sailing vessel, which latter sank almost immediately. The principal point in the defendant's (the "Biddick's") case was that the topsails of the sailing vessel were fitted with patent furling apparatus, and he was prepared with two witnesses to prove the fact; but as it was established, from the cross-examination of one of the plaintiff's witnesses, neither of the two witnesses was called by the defendants. It was the opinion of the Trinity Masters that, whether or no the sailing vessel was fitted with the furling apparatus was an important fact in the case. The Court found that the sailing vessel was solely to blame, and decreed accordingly, with costs, and upon the taxation of the defendant's costs, the Registrar refused to allow the costs of the two witnesses in question.

Dr. Deane, for the defendant, moved the Court for an order to the Registrar to review his taxation by allowing the costs of these witnesses.

E. C. Clarkson, contra.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that under the circumstances the evidence of these witnesses was material and necessary. It was the defendant's duty to be provided with it, and had Dr. Deane called the witnesses, even after the fact had been brought out in the course of the plaintiff's case, I should not have considered the time of the Court to have been unnecessarily occupied. It ought to be a question for the Registrar whether evidence is material and necessary; but he should not be altogether influenced by the consideration whether or not a witness is called. I shall therefore refer the matter back to the Registrar for him to allow reasonable costs.

Damage to Cargo—Pleading—Particulars of Damage.

SHIPPING.—In a cause of damage to cargo, the plaintiffs alleged that the oil-cake was not delivered in good order according to the terms of the bill of lading, and also that there was a breach of the contract in the bill of lading, or that the damage was caused by the negligence or breach of duty of the master or crew:—Held, that the plaintiffs were not bound to set forth the particular acts or the character of the negligence which caused the damage.

This was a suit by the indorsees of a bill of lading of certain parcels of oil-cake to recover compensation for non-delivery of the oil-cake in good order and condition, and this was an application to order the plaintiffs to give particulars of the negligence or cause of damage.

The petition alleged, amongst other matters, (art. 3.) that 500 bags of linseed cake were shipped in good order and condition on board the "Freedom" at New York, "to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the port of London, the dangers of the seas only excepted"; that (art. 6) "the said 500 bags were not delivered according to the terms of the said bills of lading in as good order and condition as when they were shipped on board the said vessel at New York, but, on the contrary, the same were delivered to the plaintiffs much damaged and in much worse order and condition"; and (art. 11.) that "the damages . . . . were the consequences of breaches of the contracts contained respectively in the said bills of lading, or they were occasioned by negligence or breach of duty on the part of the master or crew of the said ship."

The defendants in their answer, besides denying the articles of the petition, alleged that "the damage (if any) to the oil-cake . . . was occasioned by the dangers of the seas or by the natural qualities of the said oil-cake, and not by any breach of contract contained in the bills of lading, . . . or by any breach of duty on the part of the master or crew."

E. C. Clarkson, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs have filed such a pleading as would oblige the defendants unless particulars are given, to prepare different lines of defence, inasmuch as the plaintiffs have pleaded not only breach of contract but negligence on the part of the defendants, and the plaintiffs ought to furnish particulars of such negligence.

Cohen, for the plaintiffs.—By the bill of lading in this suit, the owners of the "Freedom" contracted by their servant, the master, to deliver the oil-cake in question "in the like good order and condition at the port of London, the dangers of the sea only excepted," as it had been shipped on board the vessel, and therefore it was only incumbent upon the plaintiffs to prove that the oil-cake was shipped in good order and delivered in bad condition. It is for the defendants, if they can, to establish by proof that the deterioration was caused by the only specified exception to the obligations contained in his contract, namely, "dangers of the seas." The averments as to negligence in the master or crew were pleaded to guard against the possibility of the contract not being technically holden to have passed to the indorsees, who would nevertheless, under the authority of "The Figlia Maggiore" (37 L. J. Adm. 52; L. R. 3 Adm. 102), be entitled to sue the defendants on the ground of damage arising from negligence.

The cases cited were Key v. Wheeler (36 L. J. C.P. 181; L. R. 2 C.P. 302); Lloyd v. the Iron Screw Collier Company (33 L. J. Ex. 269; 3 Hurl. & C. 284); Czech v. the General Steam Navigation Company (37 L. J. C.P. 3; L. R. 3 C.P. 14); and "The Figlia Maggiore (37 L. J. Adm. 52; L. R. 3 Adm. 102).

Sir R. J. Phillimore.—The principal object of the rules of pleading in this Court is to prevent either party being taken by surprise at the hearing of the cause, and to obviate the necessity of the trial being postponed upon this ground. The pleadings by the plaintiffs and the defendants ought to be such as fairly to apprise the adversary of the nature of the case which is meant to be proved, and the rules and the practice are intended to ensure brief and fair statements, and to avoid prolix or obscure pleading. In deciding whether the pleading complies with the principle of fairly disclosing the nature of the case intended to be proved, it must be considered whether the matter charged be or be not within the knowledge of the party charged. In the case before me, if damage was done to the goods, it was done on board the ship of the defendants, where the plaintiffs were not. The cause of the damage must be presumed to be within the knowledge of the defendants, and accordingly in their answer they have stated what the causes of the damage were. It is to be borne in mind also that if the fact of the damage be established by the plaintiffs the burden of proving affirmatively that such damage was the consequence of the excepted perils lies unquestionably upon the defendants; and I think that the burden of proving affirmatively that due care was taken of the goods also lies upon them. If there was negligence in this respect, it must be presumed to be within their knowledge, and it does not appear to me that the plaintiffs are bound to set out the particular acts or the character of the negligence which caused the damage on board the defendants' ship. If indeed during the trial it should appear that the plaintiffs relied upon a particular act of negligence of which they were aware, and to which they ascribed the damage, and which took the defendants by surprise, I shall be disposed to afford them every opportunity of producing evidence in contradiction; but I cannot anticipate any such case, and as I think, having regard to the character and wording of the contract contained in the bill of lading, that the pleading of the plaintiffs fairly apprises the defendants of the case which they have to meet, I shall not make an order upon them to furnish further particulars.

Collision—Pleading—Answer—Insufficiency for not stating Cause of Collision.

SHIPPING.—To a petition alleging that the ship M. had been for some time close-hauled on the starboard tack, and that the ship W. N. on the port tack came into collision with her, the answer admitted that the W. N. was close-hauled on the port tack, and alleged that the M. was seen on the port tack, distant about a mile:—Held, that the defendants were bound also to allege what was subsequently done on board the W. N. and before the collision, and the mode of the collision.

This was a motion in a cause of collision, in objection to the sufficiency of the answer.

The plaintiffs in the 3rd article of the petition alleged that "The 'Margaret' was close-hauled on the starboard tack, and so continued for some time prior to and until the collision hereinafter mentioned. The 'Why Not' was on the port tack, and approaching her under such circumstances as rendered it the duty of the 'Why Not' to avoid the 'Margaret'; but the 'Why Not,' nevertheless, came into collision with her, the stem and port-bow of the 'Why Not' striking the port-bow of the 'Margaret' by the fore rigging."

The defendants in the 3rd, 4th, 5th and 6th articles of their answer alleged that, "The 'Why Not' was close-hauled on the port tack. She was carrying the regulation lights duly exhibited, brightly burning, and a good look-out was being maintained on board of her."—"In these circumstances the red light of a vessel, which proved to be the 'Margaret,' also on the port tack, was observed about W. by N., distant about a mile."—"The 'Margaret,' which was sailing more rapidly than the 'Why Not,' afterwards came under the lee of the 'Why Not,' then crossed her bow, and then ran down under the 'Why Not's' lee and hauled up and spoke the 'Why Not.' Shortly afterwards the 'Margaret' improperly came round in stays, rendering a collision imminent. The 'Why Not' immediately put her helm down, but failed to stay, and the collision then ensued; the jib-booms of the two vessels being the parts first in contact."—"The said collision was caused by the improper navigation of the 'Margaret,' and the negligence of those on board her."

Pritchard, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are bound to state what in their opinion occurred after the "Margaret" had been so observed at the distance of a mile, and how the vessels came into collision. According to the rules of the Court, the defendants must have already done this in their preliminary act.

Lushington, contra.—The defendants are entitled to stand entirely on the defensive, not to plead any circumstances at all, and to rely on a simple negative —"The East Lothian" (14 Moore P.C. 177).

Pritchard, in reply.—Such a course is at variance with the usual practice of this Court, both before and after that decision.

SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE.—The rules of pleading ought to be adapted to the nature of the case which it is their object to bring before the Court. They are not to be considered as constituting a game of skill between the advocates, but ought to be so framed as to assist, not only the party in the statement of his case, but the Court in its investigation of the truth between the litigants.

The cases of collision tried in this Court are of a peculiar character, and such as require the application of particular rules of pleading in order to second the due administration of justice, and much experience has proved that justice was often defeated by a case set up in Court to meet the case developed by the evidence on the other side; but which the Court, assisted by assessors of nautical experience, well knew could not have been the true statement of the actual circumstances of the collision; and to remove this obstacle to the administration of justice, rules were framed by the Court requiring each party in a cause of collision to file, before any pleadings had taken place, what is called a preliminary act—public documents sealed up, and not opened till the hearing. They contain the answer of each party to several questions carefully framed to elicit the facts as to the leading points in every case of collision; and experience has fully justified the order for this mode of procedure, which is adopted in this Court alone and suited to the peculiar constitution of this tribunal. Much of the advantage of the preliminary act is derived from the opportunity which it affords of contrasting the statements as to the causes of the collision, set up by the parties before they know the case which either intends to rely upon in their pleadings, and it is obvious that this advantage would be impaired if a defendant might content himself in his answer with relying on a simple negative. A question of this kind was brought before my predecessor in the case of "The Claus Thomsen" (32 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 106). In that case an objection was made to an answer, and Dr. Lushington said, "Without considering the principles of pleading by which this Court is governed, it is sufficient in this case to notice one objection to the answer. Every pleading, whether the petition or answer, ought to be so framed as that if the evidence was taken before an examiner the pleadings alone would enable him to elicit all the facts of the case."

This seems to be a decision very much in point in the present case. "The East Lothian" (14 Moore P.C. 177) established the principle that the plaintiff must succeed upon the strength of his own case, and not upon the weakness of the defence, and therefore where the plaintiff had clearly failed in proving that the collision had happened in the manner alleged in his petition, the defendant was entitled to be dismissed with costs, although he had in his answer attributed the collision to causes disproved by the evidence. To this decision and the principle upon which it is founded I readily subscribe, and it does not seem to me to furnish an authority for the novel experiment in pleading attempted in the answer before me.

I direct a fuller statement to be made as to what the "Why Not" did between the time of sighting the "Margaret" and the collision.

Damage—Swinging to the Tide—Pilot's Responsibility.

SHIPPING.—The W. A, in charge of a pilot, came to anchor in the Mersey and gave the B. T. a foul berth. Various remonstrances were from time to time made by those on board the B. T, and after a few days the vessels in swinging to the tide came into collision:—Held, that the owners of the W. A. were responsible for the damage. 1. Because while the vessel was at anchor, the employment of the pilot was not compulsory. 2. Because, even if the pilot had not properly moored the W. A, her master was not relieved from responsibility, and therefore her owners were liable for the damage.

This was a cause of damage. In the month of October, 1868, the ship "British Trident," from Quebec, with timber, arrived in the Mersey and anchored in the Sloyne, about half way between Tranmere and Rock Ferry, and on the 27th of that month, the ship "Woburn Abbey," from Rangoon, with rice, having then a pilot in charge of her, came to anchor about a ship's length distant from the port quarter of the "British Trident." The tide was then ebb, and the vessels swung to the tides for some days, and were kept from coming into collision by setting sail and other manœuvres. Various remonstrances were made to those on board the "Woburn Abbey" that she had given a foul berth, but they were not attended to, and on the night of the 29th the vessels swung to the ebb tide, and the "British Trident," swinging with her stern to the Cheshire shore, got her head to S. by W, when the tide caught her, and with her starboard quarter she came into collision with the port bow of the "Woburn Abbey," and the vessels remained in collision drifting to the northward.

Milward (Butt with him), for the owners of the "British Trident."—The collision was occasioned by the "Woburn Abbey" having given the "British Trident" a foul berth, and the owners were not exempt by reason of having a pilot on board—first, because the ship having been brought to anchor compulsory pilotage ceased[1], and there was no obligation to employ the pilot again until the ship was moved to be taken into dock; secondly, if the pilot was compulsorily in charge, the master was ashore, the mate in bed, and the crew inefficient, and therefore the pilot had not the efficient assistance which the owners were bound to provide for him.

Dr. Deane (E. C. Clarkson with him).—According to the terms of the statute, the pilot's duties do not cease until the vessel is "properly moored," and the facts of the case shewed that the crew efficiently obeyed all the orders given by the pilot.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—The evidence establishes to the satisfaction of the Court and of the Trinity Masters that the "British Trident" was properly anchored in a safe berth, and that the "Woburn Abbey" was improperly anchored and gave her a foul berth; that she had ample time to remedy the fault, but neglected to do so; and that she was alone to blame for this collision. The pilot of the "Woburn Abbey" swears that he did properly moor her; but it has, nevertheless, been argued, on behalf of the "Woburn Abbey," that he did not do so, and therefore that he must be considered by intendment of law to have been in charge of the vessel at the time of the collision; and partly in support of this proposition "The Northampton" (1 Spinks, 152) and Rodrigues v. Melhuish (10 Ex. 101; 34 L. J. Ex. 26) were cited. On the other side, "The Annapolis" (1 Lush. 295; 30 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 201) and the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), s. 128, were relied upon.

It is important to state that I am not considering, in the present instance, the case of a ship only temporarily moored, and going into dock almost immediately or on the next day. I am considering the case of a ship moored by the pilot for such a length of time as caused him to be functus officio so far as the legal obligation to employ him was binding upon the master. And the argument which in these circumstances would still continue the responsibility of the pilot and the consequent immunity of the master is to this effect, that a pilot because he has improperly moored a vessel remains on that account in charge of her, and that the master, though aware that she has been improperly moored, has no authority to shift her berth. I am glad to say that, in my opinion, this proposition has no legal authority, because I think it would be fraught with mischief to the interests of navigation and to the discipline of ships.

I pronounce the "Woburn Abbey" to be alone to blame for this collision, and that she is not relieved from her liability by having been at the time it occurred under the charge of a pilot.

(1) The following is the section of the act referred to: "The pilot in charge of any inward-bound vessel shall cause the same (if need be) to be properly moored at anchor in the river Mersey, and shall pilot the same into some one of the wet docks within the port of Liverpool, whether belonging to the Board or not, without making any additional charge for so doing, unless his attendance shall be required on board such vessel while at anchor in the river Mersey, and before going into dock, in which case he shall be entitled to receive 5*s*. per day for such attendance."—Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, s. 128.

Possession—Interrogatories—Practice as to.

DISCOVERY. SHIPPING.—The practice of the High Court of Admiralty as to interrogatories follows that of the Courts of equity rather than that of the common law Courts.

In a cause of possession the defendant may be compelled to answer interrogatories if they be such as tend to support the plaintiffs' case and to a complete inquiry into the truth of the issues in the cause.

A defendant will not be compelled to answer an interrogatory if he swear that his answer would subject him to the penalties of the Foreign Enlistment Act.

The ancient and modern practice of the High Court of Admiralty as to interrogatories reviewed.

This was a cause of possession, in which the United States Government were the plaintiffs and Mr. Prioleau was the defendant, and in which the plaintiffs alleged the "Alexandra" to be their property, as having been purchased by the government of the so-called Confederate States, out of moneys belonging to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs now moved the Court to order the defendant to answer certain interrogatories.

Milward and Butt, for the defendant, objected to the interrogatories as irrelevant, or as tending to criminate, or merely to negative the title of the defendant, and not discover any facts which could support the title of the plaintiffs—Croomes v. Morrison (5 E. & B. 984); Osborn v. the London Dock Company (10 Ex. 698; 24 L. J. Ex. 140); Tupling v. Ward (6 Hurls. & N. 749; 28 L. J. Ex. 222); Robson v. Cooke (2 Hurls. & N. 766; 27 L. J. Ex. 151); Bartlett v. Lewis (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 249; 31 L. J. C.P. 230); Baker v. Lane (3 Hurls. & C. 544; 34 L. J. Ex. 57); Bickford v. D'Arcy (35 L. J. Ex. 202; L. R. 1 Ex. 354).

The Solicitor General (Sir W. B. Brett), the Queen's Advocate and Clarkson, for the plaintiffs.—The Admiralty Court is also a Court of equity, and before the passing of the 17th section of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, there was another mode of obtaining the same advantages as those given by administering interrogatories, viz., by compelling personal answers. The Admiralty Court Act gives no new power, but only the same to be exercised in a different way. This Court must mould this power according to its own mode of procedure, and in correspondence with the procedure of the Courts of equity. There is no criminal proceeding maintainable under the Foreign Enlistment Act. A penalty alone may be inflicted. Its provisions cannot apply to the defendant, who is not a natural-born subject, but only a naturalized foreigner; and there can be no forfeiture of the ship, inasmuch as the period specified by the act, beyond which a forfeiture cannot take place, has elapsed. It is said that the plaintiffs can interrogate only as to their own title (not as to the defendant's; but the plaintiffs say the ship was bought, for the Confederate Government, in England, by its agents; and the evidence must be exclusively in the knowledge of the defendant as to the circumstances under which she was bought. The plaintiffs' case is, that all those through whose hands she passed were agents; that the several transfers were fraudulent; that there were simulated bills of sale. It does not follow that because some interrogatories are objectionable all should be disallowed—Stern v. Sevastopulo (14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 737; 32 L. J. C.P. 268; Scott v. Miller (Johns. 328).

Milward replied.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an application to the Court to permit certain interrogatories to be administered to the defendant in this case. The principles which ought to guide the Court and regulate the practice of it, with respect to this mode of discovering the truth in contested cases, have been discussed at much length upon this occasion, and various authorities, principally derived from the decisions of the common law Courts, have been cited. I think it expedient to say something both with respect to the ancient practice of this Court and the powers conferred upon it by the recent statute.

According to the ancient practice of the Court it would be competent to the plaintiffs to counterplead the averments contained in the plea of the defendant, either absolutely or by giving a different version of the facts to which they relate, and to have required his answer upon oath to these contradictory or explanatory averments in the counterplea; and in this way a great, if not the greater part of the interrogatories before me might practically have been administered, subject always to legitimate objection on the part of the defendant, that his answers were called for upon matters irrelevant, or of which he was ignorant or which would expose him to pains or penalties by compelling him to criminate himself. In fact, the practice of the Court of Admiralty has always, to a certain extent, been that of a Court of equity as well as a Court of law.

With regard to more modern practice, the 17th section of 24 Vict. c. 10 (the Admiralty Court Jurisdiction Act) enacts as follows: "The Judge of the High Court of Admiralty shall have all such powers as are possessed by any of the superior Courts of common law, or any Judge thereof, to compel either party in any cause or matter to answer interrogatories, and to enforce the production, inspection and delivery of copies of any documents in his possession or power."

The powers possessed by the superior Courts of common law are derived from section 51 of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. I have been referred to a variety of decisions by the common law Courts upon the question of incorporating into their practice the use of these interrogatories, but I regret to say that I have not derived much assistance, still less any clear rule for my guidance, from a perusal of these decisions. They are very conflicting, and seem to shew that two schools of thought or opinion with respect to the use of these interrogatories, especially as to those which are said to be of a criminatory character, exist in Westminster Hall. I find, however, that the Common Pleas, under the presidency of Erle, C.J., came to the conclusion that the practice of the Court of Chancery in this matter was not to be considered as binding upon the Courts of common law— Bartlett v. Lewis (31 L. J. C.P. 230). Erle, C.J., there said: "The interrogatories are sought to be administered under section 51 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which authorizes a plaintiff or defendant to deliver to the opposite party, provided such party would be liable to be called as a witness in the action, interrogatories in writing upon any matter as to which discovery may be sought. This is an action brought for the recovery of a debt. The defendant pleads a discharge under the Bankruptcy Act, and the question is whether that discharge is valid. These interrogatories bear directly on that question, and prima facie they are questions which the 51st section authorizes to be put. But they also bear upon matter which may be evidence of an indictable offence. No simple question, however, directly charges the defendant with having committed an indictable offence, and this it is which appears to me to have been the ground of the demurrer in the cases referred to in the Court of equity. It is clear that these are questions which might be put to the defendant if he were in the witness-box, and there he would be bound, if he desired to protect himself against answering them, to pledge his oath that they tended to criminate him. I think he must also do so now. I think the interests of truth are in the first place to be maintained, subject only to such privileges as the witness can legally claim. Beyond that, there is no reason why the law should protect a man charged with an indictable offence any more than a man charged with fraud or dishonest conduct, which barely escapes being indictable. I found this decision on the form of the interrogatories; but I entirely differ from the argument that the inference which a jury might draw from a refusal by the defendant to answer these interrogatories is any reason why the defendant should not be compelled to answer them. Nor do I read the 51st section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, as saying that the practice of the Court of Chancery in respect of bills of discovery is to be imported into the Courts of common law, and that we are not to permit questions to be put in the form of written interrogatories in any case in which a Court of equity would not allow them to be put. I think it means that interrogatories may be put in any case where a bill of discovery might be filed; but I do not think it is intended that the practice of the Court of equity relating to discovery should be introduced."

I have considered the practice of the Court of Chancery upon the subject, as set forth in the 9th chapter of Daniell's Practice, "On interrogatories for the defendant in answer to the bill," and in the 14th chapter, section 2, "On the different grounds of demurrer to a bill of discovery," and I have come to the conclusion that the interests of justice require me to mould, as far as I am able, the practice of this Court, rather in conformity with the practice of the Courts of equity than of common law.

The cardinal principle by which I intend to be governed in this matter is, that the interrogatories ought to be such as tend bonâ fide to support the case of the plaintiff, and to favour a complete inquiry into the truth of the issue which the Court has to decide. The limitation to this principle which is derived from their tendency to criminate the answerer, I will presently consider. In order to apply the principle to the present interrogatories, I must consider the scheme, so to speak, of the petition and the answer.

The petitioners being the United States of America, claim, in a cause of possession, this vessel, the "Alexandra" or "Mary," on the ground that she was built, purchased, or acquired by a pretended rebel government, in whose de facto possession she was at the time when the rebellion was suppressed, though de jure she belonged to the United States; that she never was, and is not, the property of Mr. Prioleau, in whose possession she is. Now it was truly observed by Her Majesty's Advocate that the defendant Prioleau, does not, in his answer, state simply, "I say I am the registered owner, and here is my register"; but he sets up a history by which his title to the vessel is to be established, as it were, by a chain of evidence consisting of various specified links, and relying upon documents which the petitioners contend are tainted with mala fides and fraudulent; and they allege that the object of these interrogatories is to prove not only that the title of the defendant is bad, but that in truth the various owners through whom his title is derived, as well as the defendant himself, will appear, when the fraud is unravelled by means of these interrogatories, to have been by intendment of law necessary agents or trustees for the plaintiffs. For instance, the answer states that the ship was built by one Miller, of Liverpool, for the firm of Fawcett, Preston & Co., by them transferred to one Henry Lafone, and by him to Prioleau, the present defendant; and documents of transfer and conveyance are referred to. These interrogatories, it is alleged, will elicit the facts not only that these transfers are simulated and the documents colourable, but they will also shew that the true owner was the rebel government, and on that account the mere holder of property for the benefit of the present plaintiffs, the United States. Therefore it is argued these interrogatories have a bonâ fide tendency, not merely to negative and destroy the title of the defendant, but to affirm and render evident the title of the plaintiff. Looking to all the circumstances of the case, I have come to the opinion that this argument is sound, and that adhering to the principle which I have enunciated, the interrogatories, speaking generally, ought to be allowed.

It has been contended that some of the interrogatories are objectionable, either as being superfluous, or as referring to matters of which the defendant is ignorant, or as leading to answers which would criminate him. With respect to the first of these objections, I am not clear that the interrogatories are superfluous; and no injury can arise to the defendant from answering them. And this latter observation extends to the second head of objection; for, if the defendant is ignorant of the facts as to which he is interrogated, he can say so. With respect to the third head, the objection is more serious. Many of the interrogatories, it is urged, tend to prove that the defendant was guilty of a breach of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and thereby to subject him to penalties. The Courts of equity appear to have holden that, as a general rule, a person was not compelled to answer so as to subject himself to punishment, in whatever manner that punishment may arise, or whatever might be the nature of that punishment—1 Daniell's Chancery Practice, edit. 1865, p. 516, et seq. This rule, however, was subject to considerable modification; and in the Courts of equity, underwriters, in cases where policies of insurance were found to have been effected with gross fraud, brought the parties into Court and compelled them to answer, by stating in their bills frauds which would have been indictable—see Davie v. Verelst, cited in Macauley v. Shackell (1 Bligh, N.S. 133). In the Courts of common law the practice on this point has been conflicting and contradictory, and in the very last case, decided during the argument in this case, the Court of Exchequer was divided—or rather the Judges were divided—a majority of three to two deciding that the witness was bound to answer questions, though they had a tendency to criminate him—M'Fadzen v. the Liverpool Corporation (37 L. J. Ex. 193; L. R. 3 Ex. 279). It has been holden, however, both in equity and at law, that a defendant in order to protect himself from answering on the ground that the discovery of the matters inquired after would expose, or tend to expose, him to penalties, must state upon oath his belief that such would be the case: a submission of the question to the Court is not sufficient—Fisher v. Ronald (12 Com. B. Rep. 762; 22 L. J. C.P. 62) and Scott v. Miller (2 Johns. 328). It is obvious that in certain cases, perhaps in the present, it may be much more for the advantage of the party desiring to put the interrogatory that the interrogated party should refuse to answer, for the reason so sworn to, than that the question should not be put at all. The tendency of some of these interrogatories to elicit an answer criminating the defendant is maintained on the ground that they would expose him to the penalties of the Foreign Enlistment Act. It has been truly said that the provisions in that statute which affect natural-born subjects do not affect Mr. Prioleau, who is only a naturalized subject. Nor do the provisions which relate to the forfeiture of the ship, inasmuch as the prescribed period of twelve months, within which such forfeiture must accrue, had elapsed. The other provisions in the act which relate to a misdemeanour are indeed not limited to any period of time, and it is with respect to these only that the defendant can claim protection.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that I ought to allow these interrogatories to be administered; but that if the defendant state upon oath his belief that an answer to any particular interrogatory would subject him to the penalties of the Foreign Enlistment Act, he shall not be compelled to answer such interrogatory.

Damage—Vessel with her Anchor down, but Moving—Lights.

SHIPPING.—A vessel with an anchor down, but not held by or under the control of it, is under way so as to render it obligatory to exhibit her coloured lights.

These were cross causes of damage.

Digitized by Google

The collision occurred about twelve o'clock p.m., of November 18, 1868, near the "Sunk" and "Gunfleet" Sands. The master and pilot of the "Gitana," which was under all plain sail, saw a white anchor-light, about half a point on the starboard bow, at the distance of a quarter of a mile; the night was dark and hazy. The pilot of the "Gitana," supposing the light to be that of a vessel riding, starboarded to pass under her stern, and the light opened a point and a half to two points, sufficient for him to clear. He then gave the order to "Steady," and still saw the white light, when shouting was heard, "Port your helm; we are shifting our berth; we are still at anchor," or "our anchor is still down." The pilot ordered the helm hard-a-port instantly, and almost immediately the vessels came into collision, the "Gitana's" jib-boom catching the fore-stays of the "Esk," and afterwards their hulls came together.

On behalf of the "Esk" it was alleged that she was brought up by her starboard anchor with thirty or thirty-five fathoms of chain, and heading east with a proper anchor-light exhibited; the crew hove in about fifteen fathoms of chain and the boom-foresail and inner-jib were then set. About seven or eight fathoms more chain were got in when the green light of the "Gitana" was seen a quarter of a mile off, and the master of the "Esk" hailed as loud as he could that the "Esk" was at anchor, and that his anchor was still down. The crew stopped getting in the chain, and the master swore that the anchor was then holding, and that he hailed "Port" because the "Gitana" seemed to be coming in on his port bow. The anchor was on the ground at the time of the collision, and one witness swore that he was sure the anchor was not "tripped," for the chain was going over the windlass when the vessel struck them.

Dr. Deane and Bayford appeared for the owners of the "Gitana"; E. C. Clarkson and E. G. Gibson, for the owners of the "Esk."

Judgment was given, on April 13, as follows:

SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE.—Upon this evidence, and upon all the circumstances of the case, two questions arise, one of fact and another of law. The question of fact is, whether or no the anchor of the "Esk" was holding her at the time of the collision? Now, according to her own statement, the "Esk" saw the green light of the "Gitana" about three points on her port-bow; and the Trinity Masters advise me that if the "Esk" was, as she represents herself to have been, then stationary at her anchor, she could have had no reason to suppose that the "Gitana" would not, under a starboard helm, pass her to the eastward; the "Esk," however, hailed the "Gitana" to port her helm, and at the same time that her anchor was "still down" or "down." The Trinity Masters are at a loss to understand why, if the "Esk" were holden by her anchor, she should have hailed the "Gitana" to port her helm; while, on the other hand, if the "Esk" was not holden by her anchor, but had canted and was forging ahead, then the hailing to port the helm would be intelligible, because the "Esk" would in that case be actually crossing the bows of the coming vessel. Moreover, it strikes the Trinity Masters as a suspicious circumstance that a vessel with a proper anchor-light up, as the "Esk" certainly had, should nevertheless hail the fact of her being at anchor, which it is the very object of the light to indicate. The answer, that the "Esk" had hoisted her boom-foresail and inner-jib, which, unless she hailed that she was at anchor, might have deceived the approaching vessel, does not remove this suspicion, because the carrying of these sails in conjunction with a white light would not indicate to a person of competent nautical knowledge that she was under way.

Applying my own judgment to the advice tendered to me by the Trinity Masters, I have arrived at the conclusion that the "Esk" was not holden by her anchor at the time of the collision.

The finding of this fact renders necessary the consideration of the question of law, which is of considerable importance, and which, I regret to say, I am called upon to decide for the first time. In the case of the "George Arkle" (Lush. 382), in which the decision of this Court was affirmed by the Privy Council, it was ruled, that a vessel driven from her anchors by a gale of wind, and setting sail to get out to sea, is, even if wholly unmanageable, "under way," within the meaning of the Admiralty Regulations, 1858, and is bound to exhibit coloured lights; and that though the ship was in great difficulty and danger, the omission in such circumstances to exhibit the coloured lights is negligence, and that the ship is liable for any collision occasioned thereby. This judgment furnishes some assistance to me, but is clearly not decisive of the present case. The object of the regulations, so far as their bearing on the present case is concerned, with respect to carrying lights, is to furnish means of apprising other vessels whether the vessel carrying them be stationary or in motion, in order that the coming or meeting vessel may direct her course accordingly, and give the vessel carrying coloured lights and in motion a wider berth than she would give if that vessel carried an anchor light and was stationary. This is the principle which underlies these rules; it is possible, no doubt, to draw fine distinctions between vessels which have just actually raised their anchors off the ground and those which are in the very act of doing so; but, practically, the true criterion as to the application of the regulation must be, whether the vessel be actually holden by and under the control of her anchor or not. The moment she ceases to be so, she is in the category of a vessel under way, and must carry the appointed coloured lights. The case before the Court strongly illustrates the expediency of these regulations, for had the "Esk" when she canted lighted and exhibited her lamps, which appear to have been ready, her red light instead of the white would have been visible to the "Gitana" in the first instance, and the "Gitana" would have ported then instead of starboarding, and this collision would have been avoided. It remains only to notice two positions of the counsel for the "Esk," namely, that the collision was caused by a bad look-out, and "by too close a shave" on the part of the "Gitana." The first conclusion is not supported by the evidence, and as to the second, the opinion of the Trinity Masters, from which I see no reason to differ, is that the manœuvre of the "Gitana" would have afforded ample room for avoiding the collision with a vessel holden by her anchor, as the "Esk" was, in the circumstances, rightly presumed to be.

I pronounce the "Esk" solely to blame for this collision.

Damage—Bosphorus—Lis alibi pendens.

SHIPPING.—In a cause of damage in respect of a collision between two foreign vessels in the Bosphorus, semble—that if a suit as to the same subject-matter is pending elsewhere whereby the plaintiff can obtain full indemnity, the High Court of Admiralty will suspend the proceedings in its Court or put the plaintiff to his election; and the Court will so act whether the proceedings elsewhere are in rem or in personam.

This was a cause of damage.

On the morning of December 12, 1866, the Norwegian brig "Helmich," whilst on a voyage from Berdianski to Falmouth, was off Karah Point, in the Bosphorus, when the Austrian brig "Mali Ivo" was being towed by a Turkish steam-tug up from the entrance of the Bosphorus, and the steam-tug passed clear of the "Helmich," but the "Mali Ivo" came into collision with her.

On February 2, 1867, the master of the "Helmich" cited the master of the "Mali Ivo" and also the master of the steam-tug, to appear before the Austrian Consular Court at Constantinople to answer for the damage done; and the master of the "Mali Ivo" also cited the master of the steam-tug to answer for any damages for which he might be liable to the master of the "Helmich." The master of the steam-tug excepted to the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the suits against him, he being a subject of the Ottoman Porte; and on February 20, 1867, the exception was allowed in his favour in both suits. Thereupon, as was alleged by the owners of the "Helmich," all proceedings on behalf of their master in the Consular Court were abandoned, and on April 25, 1867, the "Mali Ivo" was arrested in this cause.

From the decree of the Austrian Consular Court refusing to hear the suit of the master of the "Mali Ivo" against the master of the steam-tug, the master of the "Mali Ivo" appealed to the Imperial Royal Tribunal of Appeal at Vienna and ultimately to the Supreme Court of Cassation there, but, as was alleged on behalf of the owners of the "Helmich," the master of that vessel was no party to either of the appeals.

Dr. Deane and E. C. Clarkson, for the owners of the "Helmich."—The proceedings in the Consular Court have been, as regards the "Helmich," abandoned since February 20, 1867, and this Court is therefore properly seised of the cause. Besides, even if the cause were still pending in the Consular Court it would be no answer to this suit, as this is a proceeding in rem, whereas the suit there was in personam—"The Bold Buccleuch" (7 Moore P.C. 283).

Butt and Pritchard, for the owners of the "Mali Ivo."—This Court has a discretion to entertain or not a suit between foreigners—"The Nina" (37 L. J. Adm. 17), and will exercise that discretion whether the proceedings in the suit pending elsewhere be in rem or in personam—"The Lanarkshire" (2 Spinks, 189); "The Bengal" (Swabey, 468); "The John and Mary" (4 Swabey, 471). This Court will not interfere if, as in this case, full and complete indemnity may be obtained in the first suit. As to the jurisdiction of the Consular Court at Constantinople, see "The Laconia" (33 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 11).

Judgment was given, on April 27, as follows:

Sir R. J. Phillimore.—It has been said by the counsel for the defendant that this Court would not be anxious to entertain such a suit, but it has not, and could not with propriety, have been said that the Court had not jurisdiction over the subject. It is well known that the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty extends to all cases of collision happening upon the seas, that is, within the ebb and flow of the tide. In a case now before me—much discussed both here and in the Privy Council, "The Halley" (37 L. J. Adm. 1)—the collision took place in the Scheldt. It is true that in that case one of the parties was a British subject, but that circumstance does not affect the power of the Court to entertain the suit, though it is a circumstance to be taken into consideration, as to whether or no it shall allow its jurisdiction to be put in force. I do not mean to pronounce any opinion as to whether the Court does or does not possess any such discretion.

The discretion which the Court does possess with respect to suits instituted by foreign seamen for their wages against a foreign master whose ship happens to be in one of the ports of this country is certainly distinguishable in principle from a discretion to be exercised, as in the present case, for the purpose of preventing the subject of one foreign nation from suing the subject of another foreign nation in a cause for damage done to the vessel of the former upon the sea.

It is another and different question whether, if there be, as is contended in this case, a lis alibi pendens, the Court has not a discretion, or perhaps even a duty, to refuse the exercise of its jurisdiction upon the same subject-matter between the same parties unless that litigation be discontinued. I am aware that it has been decided by the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of a foreigner against whom an action of contract was pending in his own country at the suit of the plaintiff, and who came over to this country and was sued here by the plaintiff for the same demand, that the pendency of the action in the foreign country was not a sufficient ground for staying proceedings in the action here—Cox v. Mitchell (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 55; 29 L. J. C.P. 33); and I have considered that part of the case of "The Bold Buccleuch" (7 Moore P.C. 283) which refers to this subject. I have referred also to the cases of "The Griefwald" (Swabey, 431); "The Lanarkshire" (2 Spinks, 189); "The Bengal" (Swabey, 468), and "The John and Mary" (Swabey, 471); and I have come to the conclusion that it would be my duty either to suspend proceedings in this Court or to put the party to his election as to which Court he would have recourse to, if, indeed, the evidence before me established that there was a lis alibi pendens before a tribunal which could afford the plaintiff a complete remedy whether the proceedings were technically instituted in rem or in personam. I am also of opinion that the Austrian Consular Court of Constantinople would come within this category of a competent tribunal, inasmuch as by the well-known capitulations by treaty, sufferance and usage, the Austrian empire, like other Christian states, has acquired from the Ottoman Porte an exclusive right of jurisdiction, to be exercised over its subjects in suits of this kind within the limits of the Ottoman empire.

As a matter of fact, however, I am satisfied that there is no suit pending elsewhere between litigants now before me on the same subject as that upon which I am now called to adjudicate. The facts appear to be these: The master of the Norwegian brig instituted a suit for damage against the master of the Austrian vessel on December 31, 1866. On February 2, 1867, the Austrian master cited the master of the steam-tug to appear in Court and answer for the damage, on the ground that it was exclusively imputable to him. On February 20, the Court referred the first plaintiff and the defendant to litigate their claims before the Ottoman maritime jurisdiction, whereupon the Norwegian withdrew his deposit of security for costs and abandoned the proceedings; and on April 25, he instituted a cause of damage in the English Court of Admiralty. It is true that on March 4 the Austrian defendant presented an appeal to the Imperial Tribunal of Austria at Trieste, to which appeal the Norwegian was no party. This Court overruled the decision of the Consular Court, and declared that it was competent to entertain the suit. The consular tribunal ordered the Norwegian, who, as I have said, was no party to the appeal, to put in his reply within fourteen days. From this order the Norwegian appealed to the Imperial Royal Tribunal, which, on August 13, annulled the decree as against him. From this decree the Austrian master appealed to the Court of Cassation at Vienna; and what has become of that appeal does not appear, but it is distinctly sworn by the attorney for the Norwegian plaintiff at Constantinople that since February 20 last, all proceedings on his part have been withdrawn. It is true that the attorney for the Austrian defendant says that the suit is still pending in the Consular Court: probably that is the suit between the Austrian master and the Ottoman steam-tug, but whether this be so or not, I am of opinion that, upon the evidence before me, I must hold that the present plaintiff has discontinued the proceedings which he had instituted in the Consular Court.

The merits of the case may be discussed in a few words.

[The COURT then reviewed the facts of the case as to the collision, and held that the "Mali Ivo" was alone to blame.]

Decree accordingly.

Costs—Damage—Pilot alone to Blame.

SHIPPING.—In a cause of damage the only defence was, that the collision was caused by the fault of a pilot whom the defendants were compelled to take. The defendants having proved their case:—Held, that the plaintiffs must be condemned in costs.

This was a cause of damage in which some of the facts were, by agreement between the parties, stated in the form of a special case. The defendants admitted that the "Clarinda" was the wrongdoer, but averred that the collision was caused solely by the neglect of the pilot, whom, at the time and under the circumstances, they were compelled to employ. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, admitted the compulsory pilotage, but denied that the fault was that of the pilot alone. This latter question formed the only issue between the parties, which after evidence given on both sides before the Court and Trinity Masters was found in favour of the defendants.

Butt and Pritchard, on behalf of the defendants, contended that the suit should be dismissed, with costs. The only issue raised has been found in their favour, and the plaintiffs have throughout known the defence which has been now established. In one case, "The Batavier" (10 Jur. 20; 4 N. of C. 356), Dr. Lushington observed, that if a similar course to the present had been followed he would have given costs, and in another case, "The Castor" (6 L. T. 106), he actually did so.

Deane and E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiffs.—It was impossible for the plaintiffs to have known until after this investigation what took place on board the defendants' vessel. It is sufficient hardship that the plaintiffs, who have suffered damage without fault of their own, should nevertheless obtain no redress, and they ought not besides to be condemned in the costs of such a result.

His LORDSHIP, after stating the facts of the case and adverting to the circumstance that the pilot of the defendants' vessel had been called on behalf of the plaintiffs, was of opinion that the defendants were entitled to their costs.

This was a cause of damage, instituted in the sum of 2,000*l*., and brought by the owners of the late brig "Robinia" against the crew and steam-ship "Thomas Lea."

Between twelve and one midday of August 18 last, the brig was off the entrance of the Humber, making about two knots an hour. The weather was very foggy, and a fog-horn was being sounded, as required by the regulations, when the whistle of a steam-vessel, the "Thomas Lea," was heard. According to the plaintiffs' case, the steam-vessel was then seen at a distance of about a quarter of a mile, and the brig kept her course. The fog-horn was again and again sounded, but the steam-vessel nevertheless struck the brig, and did her so much damage that she shortly afterwards foundered. The plaintiffs also alleged that the damage and losses were attributable to the neglect and default of those on board the steam-vessel, and to their improper navigation of her, and that no blame was attributable to the brig or those on board of her.

The defendants, in their answer, asserted that there was a dense fog at the time, and the steam-vessel was making under two knots an hour; that the steam-whistle was blown at intervals and a vigilant look-out kept, and that a fog-horn was heard, and at the same moment the brig was seen not a ship's length off; that no blame was imputable to those on board the steam-vessel, and that the collision was the result of inevitable accident. The defendants also denied the allegations of the petition.

Upon these pleadings a contention arose as to the right to begin.

Milward and E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiffs, contended that, inasmuch as the defendants did not charge the plaintiffs with any blame in respect of the collision, and sought to excuse themselves solely upon the ground of inevitable accident, the burden of the case lay with the defendants, and therefore they ought to begin. It was like the case of a vessel run down while at anchor, and in such a case the defendants always begin, unless they charge the plaintiffs with some contributory negligence, as, e. g., that the vessel at anchor had no lights exhibited.

Aspinall and Butt, contra, submitted that in their answer they denied all the averments in the plaintiff's petition, and among others, that the fog-horn was continuously sounded, and there was no reported case in which the defendants have been called upon in the first instance to support a plea of inevitable accident.

The COURT was of opinion that it rested with the defendants to shew in the first instance that they were not responsible for the damage, and that therefore they ought to begin.

Salvage—Jurisdiction—Arrest—Costs and Damages.

SHIPPING.—A vessel which had been saved was valued by a receiver of wreck at less than 1,000*l. The salvors obtained an order for a commission of appraisement, but did not execute it, and after three weeks gave notice that they proceeded no further in the suit*:—Held, that they might, within four days of obtaining the order, have ascertained the value, and that therefore they must be condemned in damages for detention of the vessel during the rest of the three weeks.

This was a cause of salvage, instituted by the owner, master and crew of the vessel "Ezra" against the vessel "Margaret and Jane," with her cargo and freight, in the sum of 2,500*l.*

The "Margaret and Jane," whilst on a voyage from Cardiff to Alicante with a cargo of coals, met with tempestuous weather, became leaky, and, having been subsequently abandoned by her crew, was fallen in with by the "Ezra" and taken to Scilly in a derelict condition, and placed in the custody of the receiver of wreck.

On December 3, 1868, the receiver of wreck, with the knowledge of the plaintiffs, and in pursuance of the 50th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, valued the vessel and her cargo at the sum of 746*l.*, and on the 8th the plaintiffs instituted the suit in the sum of 2,500*l.* On the 14th an appearance under protest was entered, and on the 18th, the plaintiffs, upon the defendants' motion to dismiss the suit, with costs and damages, elected at the risk of costs to take out a commission of appraisement and sale, but did not execute it; and subsequently, on January 14 filed a declaration that they proceeded no further in the cause.

Butt, for the owners of the "Margaret and Jane," applied to the Court to condemn the salvors in the costs and damages, on the ground that at the time when they instituted the suit they were aware that this Court had no jurisdiction, the value of the property salved being under 1,000*l.*

E. C. Clarkson, contra.

Judgment was given, on January 27, as follows:

SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE.—It is admitted that the salvors must be condemned in costs, the only question being as to the damages.

The latter part of the motion is somewhat unusual, but the case of the "Evangelismos" (Sw. 378; 12 Moore P.C.C. 352), before the Privy Council, has been cited, in which their Lordships said that "there is no reason in this case for giving damages. Undoubtedly, if the arrest of the ship is an act of mala fides, or of that crassa negligentia, from which the law implies malice, the Court of Admiralty would be justified in giving damages, as in an action brought at common law damages might be obtained. In the Admiralty Court, however, the proceeding is very convenient, because in the action in which the main question is disposed of damages may be awarded." In this case there is certainly no mala fides, and the salvage of the derelict vessel, for such it was, appears to have been one of considerable merit, and it has happened sometimes that the officer of the Court has appraised vessels at a higher value than the receiver of wreck. I think it would be harsh, therefore, to say that when the commission for appraisement in this case was taken out on December 18 the salvors were guilty of crassa negligentia, but I think they must have been aware within a short period of the time of taking out that appraisement that the value fixed by the receiver of wreck was substantially correct; and I shall condemn them in costs altogether and in damages from December 22 to the time when the notice was given to abandon the proceedings, viz., January 14.

Decree accordingly.

Collision—Compulsory Pilotage—Duty to Assist the Injured Vessel—Person in Charge.

Digitized by Google

This was a cause of damage in respect of a collision, which took place shortly before 11 p.m. on August 29, 1868, in the river Thames, off Deptford Creek, between two steam vessels the "Queen" and the "Lord John Russell." Each vessel was in charge of a pilot, compulsorily taken. The "Queen" immediately after the collision proceeded up the river without offering any assistance to the "Lord John Russell."

The Court was of opinion that those on board the "Queen" had violated the provisions of the 33rd section of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63[1]; and the Court, advised by the Trinity Masters, came to the conclusion that the "Queen" was alone to blame.

Milward and Butt, for the owners of the "Lord John Russell," contended that the fact of the "Queen" being in charge of a pilot did not exempt her owners from liability: first, because the pilot was not alone to blame for the collision; and, secondly, because, as those on board the "Queen" had been guilty of the offence mentioned in the section referred to, the presumption, by the terms of that section, arose that the "person in charge" of the "Queen" was alone to blame, and that "person" was the master.

Dr. Deane and E. C. Clarkson, appeared for the owners of the "Queen."

Judgment was given, on March 3, as follows:

SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE.—In my opinion, upon the true construction of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. s. 33, a presumption of law that the "Queen" is the wrong-doer is raised against her by her conduct in running away directly after the collision without any offer or attempt to assist the other vessel. And, moreover, in the opinion of the Elder Brethren and myself the result of all the evidence of the case is that for this collision the "Queen" is solely to blame. I therefore pronounce the "Queen" solely to blame.

A more difficult part of my duty remains, namely, to determine whether the owners of the "Queen" are exempted from their liability by their having a pilot, as it is commonly called by "compulsion of law," on board. It has been argued, on behalf of the "Lord John Russell," that the "Queen" is not entitled to claim this exemption, and upon two grounds: first, upon the construction of section 33. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, and this also for two reasons, because the "person in charge" intended by that section must, having reference to the context, be deemed to be the master, and with this part of the argument I agree; and because where the master has been guilty, as in this instance, of a violation of his duty in offering no assistance to the other vessel which came into collision, he is, by the words of the statute, to be deemed alone to blame for the collision, and that it follows by necessary implication that the pilot exemption, so to speak, is taken away; but with this portion of the argument I am unable to concur. There is no doubt, on the assumption of course that the pilot is alone to blame for the collision, that his liability and the exemption of the master attached when that fact took place; and if it was intended by the statute to say that the subsequent misconduct of the master would remove the exemption and fix the liability of the collision upon the master, the language, in order to produce this result, ought to have been much clearer and plainer.

The second ground alleged by the "Lord John Russell" is, that the collision was not caused by the incapacity or error of the pilot alone, but by the want of that assistance in the discharge of his functions which he had a right to expect from the crew; in other words, that if there had been a proper look-out on board the "Queen" the pilot would have been sooner apprised of the approach of the "Lord John Rusell," and being so apprised would have taken effectual measures for avoiding the collision.—His Lordship then examined the evidence as to this part of the case, and after advice from the Trinity Masters, was of opinion that by a proper look-out the "Lord John Russell" would have been seen and reported at an earlier period, and that, thereby assuming the pilot to have discharged his duty, the collision would have been avoided.

(1) Sect. 33. "In every case of collision between two ships it shall be the duty of the person in charge of each ship, if and so far as he can do so without danger to his own ship and crew, to render to the other ship, her master, crew and passengers (if any) such assistance as may be practicable and as may be necessary in order to save them from any danger caused by the collision. In case he fails so to do, and no reasonable excuse for such failure is shewn, the collision shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed to have been caused by his wrongful act, neglect or default."

His Lordship, therefore, pronounced the "Queen" not exempt by reason of her having a pilot on board, and that her owners were responsible for the collision.

Decree accordingly.

Mortgage—Arrest by Owner of Four Sixty-fourth Shares—Costs and Damages.

SHIPPING.—Mortgagee of four sixty-fourth shares of a vessel condemned in the costs, but not damages, occasioned by a wrongful arrest of the vessel.

This was an application by the owner of sixty sixty-fourth shares in the vessel to condemn in costs and damages for wrongful arrest the mortgagee of four sixty-fourth shares.

C. P. Butt appeared for the owner of the sixty sixty-fourth shares.—The vessel was arrested in the month of July last, and the suit was abandoned on the 10th of September. She had been detained at Liverpool for a long period at a cost of 5*l.* a day for wages and demurrage. The owner of so small a part of the ship ought, even if he had the power to arrest her, to exercise great care not to use his rights vexatiously.

E. C. Clarkson opposed the motion.

The COURT was clearly of opinion that, under the circumstances, the mortgagee was liable for costs, but thought it was not a case in which the Court should condemn him in damages.

Damage—Arrest—Bail—Value.

SHIPPING.—In a cause of damage a vessel damaged by the collision was arrested and subsequently repaired, whereby her value was considerably increased:—Held, that she was only liable to arrest for her value at the time when she was arrested.

This was a cause of damage in which an application was made to the Court to order a release of the defendant's vessel upon bail being given for the sum of 1,037*l.*

The defendant's vessel, which had suffered damage from the collision, was arrested in her damaged state, and while under arrest had been extensively repaired. Her present value therefore was much greater than when she was first arrested; and her value, according to the statutory limitation of 8*l.* per ton, would be still greater, amounting to about 3,000*l.*, and the cause had been instituted for the sum of 1,500*l.*

E. C. Clarkson moved the Court to decree a release upon bail being given for the value of the vessel at the time when she was first arrested.

Digitized by Google

Pritchard opposed the application.—As the defendants are foreigners and the plaintiff would obtain, if successful in the suit, no further satisfaction of his claim than the amount of the bail, the Court will be disposed to assist him to the utmost. In this case the liability of the defendants is practically unlimited, and even if their property could not be detained till bail was given to the full extent of the plaintiff's claim, the latter is at the least entitled to the highest value of the property while it is under the custody of the Court. If the vessel had been sold and extensively repaired since the collision she would nevertheless be liable to the extent of her value, and the case is stronger against the defendants, who were owners at the time of the collision. The present practice as to bail is regulated by the 33rd section of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861.

Clarkson, in reply.—Before the first act, limiting the liability of an owner for damage done by his vessel, he would be liable to the extent of all his property, and yet the invariable practice of this Court was only to detain the vessel until bail had been given for its actual value, and that practice has continued ever since. The lien for damage implies no more than possession of the property that did it.

Sir R. J. Phillimore.—The law and practice of this Court in a proceeding in rem are laid down in the case of "The Bold Buccleuch" (7 Moore P.C. 267). It is there stated as follows: "A maritime lien is the foundation of a proceeding in rem, a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attaches." Therefore the maritime lien is the foundation of these proceedings. And in the case of "The Volant," reported in 1 William Robinson, 383, and also in some respects with greater accuracy in the Notes of Cases, the learned Judge who preceded me in this chair gave this account of the liability of the owners in cases of a proceeding in rem, and the words are material I think for the decision of this case: "The owners," says the learned Judge, "are only called in respect of any right, title and interest in order that they may appear and intervene for their interest in the vessel." The practice I believe, therefore, has been invariably up to the present time to decree the release of the vessel when the value of it has not been disputed, and when the proper bail to the amount of that value has been tendered in Court. But it has been urged upon me by the counsel for the plaintiff that a difference ought to be introduced into the practice of this Court in consequence of a statute passed subsequent to the decisions to which I have referred, namely, the Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1861.

It is quite obvious that the object of the 33rd section of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, is simply this: to make the bail which has been given in the High Court of Admiralty good, so to speak, in the Court of appeal, the bail-bond having been only given according to its language in the Court of Admiralty, and I believe some questions arose from time to time whether, in the Court of appeal, that bond could be acted upon; and the usual course I understand has been to remit the case to the High Court of Admiralty, and then the bail-bond taken there has been effectually enforced. I am therefore of opinion that this statute does not affect the question at present before me, and does not, in principle or according to the letter, introduce any variation in the familiar practice of the Court with respect to proceedings in rem, the foundation of those proceedings being, as I have already said, a maritime lien, or with respect to the practice of the Court to release a vessel when the full amount of her value has been tendered in Court, either in money or by bail.

Another objection, however, was taken, and it was urged on me that, at least in this case, the value of 1,037*l*., though admitted to be that of the ship at the time when she was arrested, is not the value at which she ought now to be released, and for this reason. It appears that since the lis has been pending on this matter application was made to the Court by the foreign owner of the "St. Olaf" to be allowed to make certain repairs in his vessel, and, as I understand, that application was assented to.

[Pritchard.—That is not so, my Lord; we knew nothing about it.]

I am misinformed, then. I will take it that these repairs were without the consent of the opposite party. I should still be very clearly of opinion that they could not prejudice any right which the owner of the "St. Olaf" possessed before they were made. I am clearly of that opinion myself, because the right of the owner of the "Indiana," who proceeds against the "St. Olaf," was to have the value of the vessel at the time she was brought into Court, as far as the proceedings in rem are concerned. His right was to have this res made responsible for the damage inflicted upon his ship so far as the value of it extended; and the repair of the vessel subsequent to the damage, for the purpose of preventing a deterioration of the property, could not in any way increase his right or the obligation of the other party. It left them, as I conceive, in statu quo in that respect. Therefore, on both grounds, with respect to the former practice of the Court being unaffected by the authority of the statutes to which I have referred, and also on the second ground, that the improved value by repairs since the collision and since the arrest, does not alter the rights of the parties, I must pronounce against this claim, and decree the vessel to be released; and as this is confessedly an experiment, and according to my judgment an unsuccessful one, I must condemn the maker of it in costs.

Leave to appeal was granted.

Damage—Attempted Salvage—Subsequent Damage—Liability for Acts of the Master.

SHIPPING.—The policies of insurance upon a steam vessel (the "T.") and the bills of lading provided that she might "assist and tow vessels in all situations," and in the course of the voyage the "T.," in attempting to render salvage services to the "S.," damaged the latter so that she sank:—Held, that the owners of the "T." were liable for the damage to the "S."

Semble—that even if there had been no such provision in the policies and bills of lading the master would have been acting within the scope of his authority in rendering the salvage services, and that therefore his owners would be responsible for his negligence in performing them.

This was a cause of damage in respect of a collision which occurred about 80 miles to the south-east of Cape St. Vincent, about three o'clock in the evening of December 30 last, between the steam vessels "Sardis" and "Thetis." The weather was fine, and the wind blowing fresh from the north.

The "Sardis" was a very long, four-masted, screw steamer, of 1,634 net and 1,800 gross tonnage, and had a crew of forty-one hands. She was bound from Smyrna to London, and in the prosecution of her voyage left Gibraltar, on December 29, at 8.50 in the evening. When she had passed the Gut, and was about 70 miles north-west of Cape Trafalgar, an accident happened to her engines which prevented them from working or being available, and she began to drift. It was found that she would not wear nor stay, and she was hove-to with her aft sails, and the next morning, upon its being discovered that the piston-rod of the low-pressure cylinder was broken, the shaft was disconnected, and she made sail with two jibs, fore staysail, foresail, fore topsail and main trysail. Between eleven and twelve o'clock the "Thetis" was d[redacted] signalled to take the "Sardis" in tow. The "Thetis" was a[redacted] of 548 tons, with engines of ninety horse power, carrying merchandise and passengers from Marseilles to London, navigated by a crew of twenty-one hands, and going at the rate of 7½ knots an hour. She came up with the "Sardis," and after some negotiation between the two captains, it was agreed that the "Thetis" should tow the "Sardis" back to Gibraltar for 400*l*. Hawsers from both the bows of the "Sardis" were got out by means of hauling lines, and made fast to both quarters of the "Thetis," with about fifty fathoms of hawser out. The "Thetis" went ahead full speed, half a point on the starboard bow of the "Sardis," when the "Sardis" fore-reached and brought the "Thetis" on her starboard beam, so that the stem of the "Thetis" was on the starboard broadside of the "Sardis," and the ships became what is called girted, and it was necessary to cut the hawsers to prevent a collision. After the hawsers had been cut the "Thetis" steamed away, and the "Sardis" took in all her sails except a close-reefed fore topsail, which was hauled close down, and about a quarter of an hour afterwards the "Thetis," after making a circuit away from the "Sardis," came round under a starboard helm and into collision with the "Sardis" abaft her starboard fore-rigging, and the "Sardis" at once began to settle down, and very soon sank, her crew getting on board the "Thetis."

The Court was of opinion that the "Thetis" was alone to blame for the collision.

Milward and E. C. Clarkson, for the owners of the "Thetis," contended that at the time of the collision the master of the "Thetis" was not acting within the scope of his authority from the owners, and that therefore the latter were not responsible.

Dr. Deane and Cohen, for the defendants.

The following cases were cited in the argument: Croft v. Alison (4 B. & Ald. 590); Hawtayne v. Bourne (7 Mee. & W. 595; 10 L. J. Ex. 224); Mitchell v. Crassweller (13 Com. B. Rep. 237; 22 L. J. C.P. 100); Goff v. the Great Northern Railway Company (3 El. & El. 672; 30 L. J. Q.B. 148); Seymour v. Greenwood (7 Hurls. & N. 355; 30 L. J. Ex. 327); Limpus v. the London General Omnibus Company (1 Hurls. & C. 526; 32 L. J. Ex. 34); Tobin v. the Queen (16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 310; 33 L. J. C.P. 199); Wilson v. Rankin (6 Best & S. 208; 34 L. J. Q.B. 62); The Queen v. Stephens (35 L. J. Q.B. 251; L. R. 1 Q.B. 702); Howard v. Sheward (36 L. J. C.P. 42; L. R. 2 C.P. 148); Barwick v. the English Joint-Stock Bank (36 L. J. Ex. 147; L. R. 2 Ex. 259); "The Robert Pow" (1 Bro. & Lush. 99); "The Julia" (1 Lush. 224).

Sir R. J. Phillimore.—According to the pleadings of the "Thetis," this collision was caused by "the 'Sardis' suddenly taking in her head-sails and falling across the course of the 'Thetis.'" The Trinity Masters are of opinion that the "Sardis" was not to blame for taking in her head-sails after the hawsers were out, and that the collision was caused by the unskilful and unseamanlike manœuvre of the "Thetis" in running up alongside of the "Sardis" with too much way upon her. The second engineer of the "Thetis" deposes that the engines had been going ahead full speed for twenty-five minutes before they went full speed astern, which was only three or four minutes before the collision. The blow must have been most severe, and dealt by the stem of the "Thetis"; and there is no foundation for the averment that the "Sardis" fell a-top of the "Thetis." It is the opinion, therefore, of the Trinity Masters that the "Thetis," by careless and unseamanlike conduct, caused this collision, and in that opinion I concur.

It has been contended, however, that I ought not to condemn the owners of the "Thetis," or render them liable for the damages of this collision, because the master of the "Thetis" was not acting within the scope of his authority as their agent, or in the course of his employment as their servant, in attempting to assist the "Sardis," which attempt led to the collision in question.

In support of this contention a great number of cases were cited to the Court from reports of the decisions at common law, and the last case upon this subject is that of Barwick v. the English Joint-Stock Bank (36 L. J. Ex. 147;

Digitized by Google

L. R. 2 Ex. 259), in 1867. Mr. Justice Willes delivered the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in this case, and observed as follows: "The general rule is, that the master is answerable for every such wrong of the servant or agent as is committed in the course of the service and for the master's benefit, though no express command or privity of the master be proved. That principle is acted upon every day in running-down cases; it has been applied also to direct trespass to goods, as in the case of holding the owners of ships liable for the act of masters abroad, in improperly selling the cargo; it has been held applicable to actions of false imprisonment in cases where officers of railway companies intrusted with the execution of by-laws relating to imprisonment and intending to act in the cause of their duty improperly imprison persons who are supposed to come within the terms of the by-laws; it has been acted upon where persons employed by the owners of boats to navigate them and to take fares have committed an infringement of a ferry, or such like wrong. In all these cases it may be said, as it was said here, that the master has not authorized the act. It is true he has not authorized the particular act, but he has put the agent in his place to do that class of acts, and he must be answerable for the manner in which the agent has conducted himself in doing the business which it was the act of his master to place him in."

It has been argued that, upon the principle of these cases, the owner of the "Thetis" was not responsible for the wrongful act of his master, inasmuch as the latter had no authority, express or implied, to perform a salvage service. I was referred to the case of the "Rising Sun" (Ware's Rep. 378), decided in the district Court of Maine, and I have perused the judgment in that case, but have not been able to extract from it any assistance for the decision of the point of law before me. According to the evidence of the master in the case before me, he had received no instructions from his owner with respect to performing salvage service; and the owner deposed, "I have neither authorized nor forbidden my ships to render salvage service; it has never come before me."

Now it is to be remembered, in the first place, that the master of a ship is an agent of a special kind; secondly, that the rendering of salvage services is an obligation required by the dictates of humanity, by the principles of public policy, and by the general interests of society, and has been recognized as such by the practice and jurisprudence of every civilized state. "It is the duty," Lord Stowell says, in the case of the "Waterloo" (2 Dodson, 437), "of all ships to give succour to others in distress; none but a freebooter would withhold it." It has been urged upon me that the act of the master in this case could not have been within the scope of his commission and was not for the benefit of the owners, because a deviation for the purpose of rendering salvage service to property would, upon general principles, avoid a policy of insurance; but that is an undecided and very doubtful proposition of English law, and certainly one to which I cannot give my assent. It was, at all events, pronounced by the Privy Council, in 1866, to be an undecided point of law—"The True Blue"[1]. I am aware that the American Courts appear to have made a distinction between a deviation for the purpose of saving life and for that of saving property; it is, perhaps, not quite so certain, however, as generally supposed, that such a distinction has been finally established (2 Parson's Marit. Law, 202; 3 Kent's Com. 313, and note); and here, if it be necessary that I should express my opinion whether, upon general principles of law, the owner of the "Thetis" was responsible for the act of the master in causing this collision, I should express it in the affirmative. I think, having regard to the principles of law respecting salvage service, the master, though not directly authorized to do the particular act, was, to borrow Mr. Justice Willes's expression, "the agent in his place to do that class of acts," and that by the negligent performance of an act of this class, the damage which is the subject of this suit was caused; and therefore that the owner "must be answerable for the manner in which the agent has conducted himself in doing the business which it was the act of his master to place him in." But, in truth, when I find in the policy of insurance appertaining to his ship a clause giving her leave to be towed and to tow and assist vessels in all situations, and that it is provided in the bills of lading that she may " assist and tow vessels in all situations," I entertain little doubt that it is not competent to the owner to deny that the attempt to salve the " Thetis " was within the scope of the authority and in the course of the employment of the master.

(1) L. R. 1 P.C. 254; see also Maclachlan on Shipping, 364.

There is one further argument which I must not omit to notice, namely, that the master of the " Sardis " took upon himself the risk of employing the " Thetis," and thereby exempted the owner from responsibility for the act of his agent; and for this proposition the case of Fletcher v. Rylands (35 L. J. Ex. 154; L. R. 1 Ex. 265) was cited as an authority; but I do not think that the circumstances of this case support the proposition of fact to which this law is to be applied. The " Thetis " must have known her own power, and she adopted her own measures for the performance of the service which, as the evidence shews, she voluntarily and deliberately undertook. She was perfectly aware of the size, character and condition of the vessel which she contracted to tow; no concealment or deception was practised. The damage was by no means in the category of a necessary or inevitable accident, but was caused, as I have already stated, by the negligence and unskilfulness with which the " Thetis " was navigated.

I therefore pronounce the " Thetis " alone to blame for this collision.

Bottomry Bond, Condition of—Total Loss—Constructive Total Loss—General Average.

SHIPPING.—The condition of a bottomry bond provided that the obligation should be void if the obligors should pay " in case of loss of the ship or vessel, such an average as by custom should have become due on the salvage, or if on the said voyage the said ship or vessel should be utterly lost, cast away or destroyed " in consequence of the perils of the seas, &c. The vessel during her voyage was obliged to put into port in a damaged state, and was there sold for a sum less than the amount of the bond, under circumstances which it was admitted would, as between assurers and assured, have constituted a constructive total loss:—Held, that, upon the true construction of this condition, the loss was not " a loss " within the meaning of the condition, and that the holders of the bond were entitled to the whole proceeds of the sale of the ship.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England directing certain articles of the answer filed on behalf of the appellant in the cause in which the appeal was brought to be struck out.

The cause in the Court below was a cause of bottomry, promoted by the respondents, as the holders of the bottomry bond on the ship " Great Pacific." The appellant was mortgagee of the ship, and intervened for the purpose of defending his interest in the proceeds against the claim of the respondents as such bondholders.

The petition filed by the respondents in the Court below stated that, before the making of the bottomry bond, the "Great Pacific," then being on a voyage from Callao to the Chincha Islands, and thence to the United Kingdom, put into the port of Sydney for certain necessary repairs, equipments, stores and outfit. That money being required for the purpose of such repairs, equipments, stores, and outfit, in order to enable the ship to proceed on her voyage, and William Baillie the master being without funds and being unable otherwise to obtain them, was obliged to and did take up and borrow from the respondents the sum of 5,037*l*. 13*s*. 5*d*. sterling on bottomry of the said ship and her freight. By the bottomry bond, dated March 29, 1867, the master hypothecated the ship, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the freight to the respondents as security for the said sum of 5,037*l*. 13*s*. 5*d*., and the agreed premium or maritime interest thereon at the rate of 45*l*. per cent. for the said voyage, amounting together to the sum of 7,301*l*. 15*s*. 9*d*. The said sum of 5,037*l*. 13*s*. 5*d*. was applied to the purposes for which it was borrowed by the master, and the ship was enabled to proceed on her voyage. In the course of her voyage the ship was caught in a hurricane and had to put into Valparaiso, where she was sold, being unworthy of repairs, for the sum of 3,628*l*. 8*s*. The petition alleged that no portion of the money advanced by the respondents, or of the premium or maritime interest, was repaid to them, nor any money whatever under or by virtue of the said bond.

The answer to the said petition set out the bottomry bond, which contained the following condition: "Now the condition of the above-written bond is such that if the said ship or vessel shall with all reasonable speed sail from the port of Sydney aforesaid, and duly prosecute and complete the said intended voyage or voyages, and that without deviation except as aforesaid, and the perils, damages, casualties and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation excepted, and if the above-bounden William Baillie, his executors or administrators, or some or one of them, or the owners of the said ship or vessel, do and shall well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the said John Broomfield and Reginald Whitaker, or either of them, their or either of their administrators or assigns, or to their or either of their attorney or attorneys, agent or agents thereto lawfully constituted, the full and just sum of 7,301*l*. 15*s*. 9*d*. of sterling British money, being the principal money secured by this bond, together with the interest or premium of 45*l*. per cent. for the voyage, before the expiration of twelve hours after the safe arrival of the said ship or vessel at her port of discharge in the United Kingdom, or in case she shall proceed to Cork, in Ireland, then before the expiration of twelve hours after the safe arrival, or in case of loss of the ship or vessel, such an average as by custom should have become due on the salvage, or if on the said voyage the said ship or vessel shall be utterly lost, cast away or destroyed in consequence of fire, enemies, men-of-war, pirates, storms or other unavoidable perils, damages or casualties of the seas, rivers and navigation, to be sufficiently shewn and proved by the said William Baillie, his executors or administrators, or some or one of them, or by the owners of the said ship or vessel, then this bond or obligation to be void and of no effect, or otherwise to remain in full force and virtue."

The answer then stated that after the making of the bond the "Great Pacific" proceeded in the prosecution of her voyage to Callao and the Chinchas, and thence to the United Kingdom, and arrived at the Chinchas, where she loaded a cargo, with which she left for the United Kingdom, but whilst proceeding for the United Kingdom she met with bad weather and suffered great damage, and in consequence was compelled to put into Valparaiso, where she was surveyed and was found to be and was unworthy of repairs, and the said voyage was abandoned and the said ship was abandoned and sold. That the ship upon such sale realized the sum of 3,628*l*. 8*s*. That under these circumstances the bond never became payable, and that the respondents were not entitled to the proceeds of sale, nor to any part thereof.

That even if the said bond had become payable, and anything was due thereon, yet that the respondents were not entitled to the whole of the said sum of 3,628*l.* 8*s.*, but to such an average only as by custom should have become due on the said sum, and to no more.

The respondents moved the Judge in Court to reject so much of the answer as set up that nothing was due on the bond in question; that the respondents were only entitled to an average on the sum of 3,628*l.* 8*s.*, the amount of the proceeds of the sale of the ship paid into Court. The learned Judge of the Court below, by an order made on November 17, 1868, directed the articles in question to be struck out of the answer, and condemned the appellant in the costs.

From this order the present appeal was brought.

The case in the Court below will be found reported ante, page 861.

Sir G. Honyman and Clarkson, for the appellant.—Upon the true construction of this bond and upon the alleged facts in the answer of the appellant in the Court below, the bond never became payable. According to the terms of the bond, the same is to be void if the vessel is utterly lost by reason of sea perils, and under the circumstances stated in the answer the vessel was a constructive total loss, and is therefore in law deemed to be wholly lost. But even if the bond became payable, the respondents are, upon the facts stated in the answer, not entitled to the whole proceeds of the sale of the ship, but only to the customary average on such proceeds. By the express terms of the bond, in the event of the loss of the ship the bond is to be void on payment of the customary average on the salvage. The respondents therefore cannot claim more than such customary average. This was the intention of the condition of the bond. The proceeds of the sale are clearly salvage. Therefore the circumstances fall precisely within the stipulation of the bond. When the vessel became a total loss, the holders of the bottomry bond became entitled to such a proportion of the proceeds of the sale as the sum of money advanced bore to the vessel at the time the money was advanced. This is the law as laid down by Valin (Boulay-Paty, Cours de Droit Commercial Maritime, vol. 3, p. 183). The ship was so much damaged that it became impossible to repair her. The commercial impossibility to repair her amounts, according to all the authorities, to an absolute impossibility to repair her—Moss v. Smith (9 Com. B. Rep. 94; 19 L. J. C.P. 225), Rossetto v. Gurney (11 Com. B. Rep. 176; 20 L. J. C.P. 257), and Adams v. M'Kenzie (13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 442; 32 L. J. C.P. 92).

Butt and Cohen, for the respondents.—The general rule of maritime law is well established by a long course of decisions. It has been repeatedly laid down that if a ship is lost, and for the purpose of this argument it may be taken that the vessel in question was lost, because it is admitted that she became a constructive total loss, the holder of a bottomry bond hypothecating the whole ship is entitled to the whole proceeds of the ship. No doubt the lender's remedy is limited to the value of the property salved. This being the well-established law upon the subject, the question arises, is there any provision in this particular bottomry bond which takes the case out of the general law on the subject? Now, the fact is that this condition is to be found in almost all bottomry bonds, and is in all the forms given in the books on maritime law. It is the form given in the appendix to Abbott (Abbott on Shipping, 10th edit. App. 289). They referred to "The Catherine" (15 Jur. 231); Thomson v. the Royal Exchange Assurance Company (1 M. & S. 30); "The Elephanta" (15 Jur. 1185); "The Dante" (2 W. Rob. 427); Barr v. Gibson (3 Mee. & W. 390; 7 L. J. Ex. 124); "The Draco" (2 Sumner, 157); Parson's Maritime Law, edit. 1869, vol. 1, and Kent's Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 359.

Sir G. Honyman, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Sir J. W. Colvile (July 5) delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—There is no contest concerning the facts out of which this appeal has arisen. The "Great Pacific," having taken an outward cargo from Liverpool to

Digitized by Google

Brisbane, was, after its discharge, chartered from the latter port by the Guano Consignment Company of Great Britain to sail to Callao, and thence to the Chinchas, where she was to load a cargo of guano, and return therewith via Callao to such port or place within the United Kingdom as the charterers might select. Between Brisbane and Callao she was compelled to put into Sydney for repairs; and to defray the costs of these repairs the master raised the sum of 5,037*l*. 13*s*. 5*d*. on bottomry; and on March 29, 1867, executed a bottomry bond, hypothecating the ship and freight for that sum, with maritime interest at 45*l*. per cent.

The vessel then proceeded on her voyage, reached the Chinchas, took in her cargo there; but on her homeward voyage was obliged to put into Valparaiso in a damaged state, and was there sold for 3,628*l*. 8*s*., under circumstances which it is admitted would, as between assurers and assured, constitute a constructive total loss. The money was paid into the Admiralty Court, and the holders of the bottomry bond (the respondents on this appeal) brought their suit to enforce their claim against it. The suit was defended only by the appellant, who, claiming to be a mortgagee of the vessel, has intervened to protect his interest; and the sole question between the parties is, whether the respondents, as bondholders, are entitled to the whole, or to any, and what part of this sum of 3,628*l*. 8*s*.

The appellant, in his answer, set forth the bond, with its condition, which, amongst other things, provided that the obligation should be void if the obligors should pay, "in case of loss of the ship or vessel such an average as by custom should have become due on the salvage; or if, on the said voyage, the said ship or vessel should be utterly lost, cast away and destroyed," in consequence of the perils of the sea. And the appellant insisted that, under these provisions, and upon the facts above stated, the bond had never become payable, and that nothing was due thereon; or that if it had become payable, the respondents were not entitled to the whole of the sum of 3,628*l*. 8*s*., but only to such an average as by custom should have become due thereon, and to no more.

To these defences the respondents took a proceeding in the nature of a demurrer by moving that so much of the answer as set them up should be rejected. The learned Judge of the Admiralty Court granted that application, and this appeal is brought against his decision.

It is obvious that if either defence is to prevail, the constructive total loss involved in the sale of the vessel at Valparaiso must be treated as a "loss" within the meaning of that stipulation in the condition of the bond upon which the defence is founded. It was admitted at the bar, and could not have been disputed with effect, that the vessel cannot be said, by reason of what occurred at Valparaiso, to have been utterly lost, cast away or destroyed; and consequently that the appeal cannot be supported in so far as it impugns so much of the learned Judge's order as rejected the averment that nothing was due upon the bond. Therefore, the only question now to be decided is whether, on the true construction of the words "in case of loss of the ship or vessel such an average as by custom shall have become due on the salvage," and upon the admitted facts of the case, the respondents are entitled, not to the whole, but only to some undefined portion of the sum in Court.

The general law is succinctly stated in Kent's Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 359. Speaking of a loan on bottomry, he says: "There is not, in respect to the contract, any constructive total loss. Nothing but an utter annihilation of the subject hypothecated will discharge the borrower on bottomry. The property saved, whatever it may be in amount, continues subject to the hypothecation." In support of this he cites Thomson v. the Royal Exchange Assurance Company (1 M. & S. 30). And the doctrine is supported by the modern Admiralty cases of "The Catherine" and "The Elephanta" (15 Jur. 1185); "The Dante" (2 W. Rob. 427); the American case, before Mr. Justice Story, of "The Draco" (2 Sumner, 157); and by other authorities. The first proposition is, moreover, admitted in this case by that abandonment of the principal ground of appeal which has already been mentioned.

The learned counsel for the appellant have, however, argued, on the authority of a passage in Valin, which is cited at page 183 of the third volume of Boulay-Paty's Cours de Droit Commercial Maritime, that when the vessel is lost, the lender on bottomry is entitled only to such a proportion of the value of the property salved as the sum lent bore to the value of the whole property hypothecated. Valin, it is to be remarked, is speaking of the hypothecation of a cargo; and it is not clear that his doctrine, if true, would apply to the proceeds arising from the sale of a ship or the debris of a ship. Boulay-Paty, however, goes on to shew that this opinion of Valin was contested by both Pothier and Emérigon; that it was not received in France under the old law, and is certainly not recognized by the Codes as part of the Maritime Law. The general rule undoubtedly is, that if the vessel is lost, the lender on bottomry, though his remedy is limited to the value of the property salved, is entitled to the whole of what is saved, provided it was included in his security. Therefore, that the bondholders in this case are as between themselves and the shipowners, or a mortgagee of the ship (whose rights are as much bound in bottomry as those of the owner of a ship not mortgaged) entitled to the whole of the proceeds of the sale of the vessel, then existing as a vessel in specie, unless there be some special provision in this particular contract which qualifies that right, is a proposition which, in their Lordships' opinion, does not admit of reasonable doubt.

It has, however, been argued that such a provision is to be found in the words now to be considered. It is contended that the "loss" of the vessel there spoken of, when contrasted with the words in the following sentence, which import its utter loss and destruction, must be taken to mean something short of such utter loss, and to include a constructive total loss; that the proceeds of the sale may be properly described as salvage; and consequently that the effect of this clause is to make those proceeds divisible between the bondholders and the shipowners in proportions to be ascertained according to some custom, of the existence and nature whereof nothing in the shape of proof has been suggested. It does not, however, follow that because the words, "the loss of the vessel," mean something short of utter loss and destruction, they, therefore, include "a constructive total loss," which, as has already been shewn, they would not include, upon the construction of ordinary bottomry bonds. It is obvious that a vessel may be so wrecked as to be no longer a vessel in specie, and so as to become a mere congeries of planks, and yet that there may be salvage of its materials to a considerable amount. In the case of "The Catherine" (15 Jur. 231), Dr. Lushington says, "If a ship was once bottomried, the bond attached to the very last plank, and the holder might have that sold for his benefit." The clause under consideration may have been intended to secure that right by making it a condition for the avoidance of the bond that the obligors should account for such salvage. Again, it seems to be a forced and unnecessary construction of the clause to hold that it necessarily implies any division or apportionment between the bondholders and shipowners. That the former, who were entitled to the security of the whole ship when in a seaworthy condition, should contract that in the event of the deterioration of their security, by a constructive total loss or otherwise, they should share the proceeds with their debtors, is so improbable an hypothesis, that the construction is only to be admitted if there is no escape from it. The clause, as Mr. Cohen shewed, is not a special one; it is to be found in the form of a bottomry bond given in the appendix to Abbott on Shipping. Whatever it means, their Lordships believe that it was intended to secure the payment to the bondholders of something which the obligors might become entitled to receive from third parties in respect of the ship, and not a division of the proceeds of the sale of the vessel between the bondholders and the shipowners. It would meet the case suggested at the bar, in which the vessel having been voluntarily stranded with a view to the preservation of the cargo, general average upon the cargo salved might become due from the owners of that cargo to the owners of the ship. That such average would become due if the ship, failing to get off, is totally lost, seems to be a question upon which jurists are not agreed—see Abbott on Shipping, 10th edit. pp. 373 to 375, and 2 Phillips on Insurance, 1315; but the clause may, nevertheless, have been designed to cover such average, if the right to it existed.

Their Lordships, however, think that they are not called upon to determine upon what particular subject the clause might operate, because it can have no operation in the present case unless there has been a loss of the vessel within the meaning of it.

For the reasons above given, they are of opinion that there has been no such loss; and, being of that opinion, they will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the order of the Admiralty Court, and to dismiss this appeal with costs.

Admiralty Court Act (24 Vict. c. 10. s. 7)—Construction—Personal Injury —Ship, Liability of.

SHIPPING.—The Admiralty Court Act, 1861, by section 7, provides "that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship." The respondent sued the appellants' ship for personal injury done to himself by a collision, alleged to be caused by the unskilful navigation of the appellants' ship:—Held, that the section of the Admiralty Act included personal injury.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England.

The respondent sued the "Beta," a vessel belonging to the appellants, for compensation for personal injury done to the respondent by a collision between the "Beta" and a French brig called the "Xiste," on board of which the respondent was, as mate, at the time of the said collision.

The petition stated that, on the morning of September 18, 1866, the steamship or vessel "Beta," of which the appellants were the owners, came into collision with a French brig called the "Xiste," then lying at anchor off Broadstairs, on the coast of Kent. That the respondent, Toussaint Rollando, was, at the time of the said collision, the mate on board the "Xiste." That the said Toussaint Rollando sustained certain injuries to his person in and by reason of the collision, and that the collision and injury were occasioned by the "Beta," and the negligence of her master and crew, the servants of the appellants, in and about the navigation of the "Beta."

The owners of the steamship "Beta" filed a petition objecting to the jurisdiction of the Court.

On July 28, 1868, the Judge, having heard counsel on both sides, rejected the petition in objection to the jurisdiction of the Court, and condemned the appellants in the costs.

From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

Aspinall and Clarkson, for the appellants.—The Admiralty Act of 1861 gives no jurisdiction to the Admiralty Court in case of personal injuries. There can be no jurisdiction unless it is given by the act. They referred to "The Sylph" (37 L. J. Adm. 14) and the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104).

Butt and Pritchard, for the respondent, were not heard.

LORD ROMILLY delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—Their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment of the learned Judge of the Admiralty Court ought to be affirmed. The words of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, include any possible damage. Section 7 provides, "That the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship." It is clear that the legislature intended to give the largest jurisdiction to the High Court of Admiralty in all cases of damage done by any ship; and the act expressly meets a case of this description. Where the person injured is a foreigner, he might be deprived of any remedy unless he may proceed against the ship; but the legislature has interposed. There is therefore every reason for the enactment being to the effect contended for by the respondent, and for the construction which the words of the section certainly bear. The cases confirm this view. In the case of "The Sylph" (37 L. J. Adm. 14), the learned Judge of the Admiralty Court held the words of this section to include claims for personal damage. That judgment was never reversed, and, in fact, there has been no appeal from that judgment. Their Lordships will therefore humbly recommend Her Majesty that the judgment of the Court below be affirmed with costs.

Collision—Compulsory Pilotage—Passenger Ship—Merchant Shipping Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. ss. 379, 388.

SHIPPING.—Owners are not exonerated from responsibility for the default of a pilot whom they have selected and placed in charge when there was no obligation imposed on them to take such pilot and put him in charge.

In a cause of damage it appeared that at the time of the collision, the master of the damaging ship had on board his wife and his wife's father. They were on board by the invitation of the master and without the privity of the owners, and they paid no fare till after the collision:—Held, that they were not passengers within the meaning of section 379. of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, which exempts certain ships when not carrying passengers from compulsory pilotage.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England. The cause in the Court below was one of damage arising out of a collision which occurred in the river Thames on December 8, 1867, between the English screw steamer "Lion" and the American ship "York-Town." The owners of the "York-Town" were the plaintiffs, and the owners of the "Lion" the defendants.

The petition stated that the "York-Town," a ship of 1,341 tons American register, belonging to the port of New York, and owned by the plaintiffs, left the Shadwell entrance of the London Docks about 10 a.m., of December 8, 1857, bound on a voyage to New York with a general cargo. That she was then in charge of a pilot, and had also a licensed waterman on board. That she proceeded down the river in tow of two steam-tugs. That when the "York-Town" was off the East India Dock buoy, being towed as above mentioned, the screw-steamer "Lion" was seen coming down the river round Blackwall Point, about 200 yards off, astern, and on the starboard quarter of the "York-Town." That the "Lion" was overtaking the "York-Town," and it was her duty to keep out of the way of the latter vessel, but instead of so doing she came on at great speed and struck the starboard quarter of the "York-Town," doing her great damage. The petition then alleged that the said collision, and the damages consequent thereon were caused by the negligence and improper conduct of those on board the "Lion"; and that no blame was attributable to the "York-Town" or to any person or persons on board.

The defendants pleaded that their vessel was in charge of Richard West, a duly licensed pilot for home trade passenger steamships; that she had on board two passengers, and that the employment of the said Richard West was at the time and place of the said collision compulsory by law; that the "Lion" was at such time under the sole charge of the said Richard West, whose orders in reference to her navigation were promptly and implicitly obeyed; and that the said collision, if it was occasioned by the "Lion" or any one on board her, was exclusively occasioned by the said Richard West, and that neither the "Lion" nor her owners are liable in respect thereof.

It was admitted at the trial that the collision was caused by the improper navigation of the "Lion," but her owners contended that they were exonerated from liability because the evidence shewed that a pilot was employed by them by compulsion of law, who was alone to blame in the matter.

The plaintiffs contended, 1, that the evidence failed to shew that the "Lion" was actually in charge of a duly licensed pilot for home trade passenger ships, acting at the time as such pilot, and that he alone was to blame for the collision; 2, that the defendants had failed to prove that the "Lion" was carrying two passengers, as alleged in the answer; 3, that the evidence adduced failed to establish that the employment of the pilot was at the time and under the circumstances in question compulsory on the defendants.

The learned Judge, being assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity Corporation, and having heard counsel on both sides, pronounced the collision in question to have been occasioned by the fault or incapacity of the said Richard West, who was at the time of the collision acting in charge of the steam-vessel "Lion," but that the employment of a pilot at the time and place of the said collision was not compulsory by law; and he pronounced for the damage proceeded for and condemned the appellants in costs.

From this judgment this appeal was brought.

The case in the Court below will be found reported in the 37 L. J. Adm. 39.

Milward and Clarkson, for the appellants.—It is admitted that the collision was occasioned wholly by the fault of the pilot. The questions, therefore, which arise upon this appeal are, first, whether the appellants' ship was under the charge of a licensed pilot at the time the collision took place; and secondly, whether the appellants' ship was carrying passengers at the time of the collision. There can be no doubt that the pilot was a duly licensed pilot. He was licensed to act as a pilot in the district within which the collision occurred. The Merchant Shipping Act exempts from compulsory pilotage ships not carrying passengers; but what constitutes a passenger within the meaning of the act? Why, any person who is not a member of the crew is a passenger. This is clear from section 303. The fact of a person being a passenger cannot depend on whether he pays a fare, or upon the fact that the owners know that such a person is on board. It must frequently happen that owners do not know who are passengers. It is difficult to draw a line between passenger and no passenger. The intention of the legislature was to afford a protectio persons who were not seafaring persons. Every person who was not one of the crew would be a passenger. But the owners are exempt from all liability whenever the ship is under the charge of a duly licensed pilot. This was expressly decided in the case of Lucey v. Ingram (6 Mee. & W. 302; 9 L. J. Ex. 196). The appeal, therefore, must be decided by your Lordships holding as to whether the pilot in charge of the " Lion " was a duly licensed pilot. They referred to Milligan v. Wedge (12 Ad. & E. 737; 10 L. J. Q.B. 19), and The General Steam Navigation Company v. the British and Colonial Navigation Company (37 L. J. Ex. 194).

Dr. Deane and Butt, for the respondents.—The first question is, was this man in charge of the ship a duly licensed pilot? It is submitted he was not. Upon the second question there can be no doubt that the owner is only exempted from liability when the pilot is on board by compulsion of law. This has been expressly held in the case of " The Stettin " (Bro. & Lush, 199). The law laid down in that case has also been distinctly recognized by the Court of Exchequer in the case of The General Steam Navigation Company v. the British and Colonial Navigation Company (37 L. J. Ex. 194). The case of Lucey v. Ingram (6 Mee. & W. 302; 9 L. J. Ex. 196) was decided under the Pilot Act (6 Geo. 4. c. 125. s. 55), which provided that the owners should not be liable so long as a duly qualified pilot was on board, but the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act are different, exempting the owners only " where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law." The provision in the Pilot Act is much larger, and more in favour of the owner. Then the question is, were the wife and the father-in-law passengers? They were on board at the invitation of the captain, and without the knowledge or permission of the owners. The evidence as to the payment of any fare is very unsatisfactory. It appears clear that no fare was paid till after the collision had occurred. At all events, we contend that the persons were not passengers within the meaning of that word as used in the 379th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. They referred to " The Agricola " (2 Wm. Rob. 10) and " The Eden " (2 Wm. Rob. 441).

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—In this case the " Lion," a screw steamer, proceeding from London to Hull, ran into the " York-Town," in broad daylight, at eleven a.m., on December 8, 1867, at Blackwall Reach. The " York-Town " was being towed by two steam-tugs down the river, when the " Lion," without any excuse of following, ran into her astern, and did her considerable damage.

The question is, are the owners liable for this damage? In order to determine this it is necessary to decide, first, whether the " Lion " was under the charge of a duly licensed pilot at that time; and secondly, whether it was compulsory on the " Lion " to take a duly licensed pilot. If these questions are answered in the affirmative, then the owners are exonerated. If in the negative, they are liable. But if the first question be answered in the affirmative, and the second question in the negative, then it becomes necessary to ascertain whether a decision made as to the meaning and effect of the statute of 6 Geo. 4. c. 125. s. 55. is applicable to cases which come within the scope of the 388th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104.

As to the first question: West, the pilot, had two licences, one a waterman's licence, which would be of no avail, and the second a regular licence from the Trinity House authorizing him to act as pilot for home trade passenger ships within the limits in which the collision occurred; the consequence is, that he was a duly licensed pilot having charge of the vessel at that time. As to the second question, whether it was compulsory on the " Lion " to take a pilot, the answer depends on whether this was a passenger ship at the time of the collision; and this their Lordships are of opinion depends upon whether there were any passengers on board the " Lion " at the time of the collision.

The facts are these: they cannot be more correctly set forth than in the judgment of the learned Judge in the Court below: " Having been seven days in London, the captain wrote to his wife and to his father-in-law to come to London and go with him to Hull; he did not write to the owners, or tell their agents in London, or anybody, that he was going to take these persons with him; they paid nothing for their living on board the ship, but they paid for their fare, in the circumstances about to be mentioned, 7*s.* 6*d.* each, which he swore positively was the proper second-class fare, though Malcolm, the agent for the owners of the "Lion," as positively swore afterwards that it was the first-class fare. For this money no receipt was produced, though the captain swore that he had paid it, and Malcolm that he received it. The captain admitted that he had said nothing to either of these persons, previously to their coming on board, as to their payment of fare; that, he said, he arranged during the passage, but after the collision had happened; the father-in-law swore that the first time he ever spoke about his paying was when in Hull, and the ship alongside the quay. The captain admitted, on cross-examination and in answer to the Court, that he was aware that he was bound to pay light dues, unless he went in ballast without passengers on board; that he ought to have told the lighthouse authorities that he had passengers on board, and that he had not done so. He said that he paid the fares to his owners on his arrival in Hull; but Mr. Malcolm said that 'the settlement,' as he called it, was made about the middle of January, and after the correspondence with the Trinity House, or the Board of Trade, to which reference was made, and therefore, to be presumed, after he knew that the pilot had reported that there were no passengers on board. The captain also swore, and in this was confirmed by Malcolm, that his instructions were, never to take persons on board without payment as passengers, except with special permission."

In this state of things were the captain's wife and her father passengers? They were on board on the invitation of the captain without the privity of the owners, who had not contracted any obligation to have them carried in the vessel, and no duty was imposed on the owners in relation to these two persons. "The meaning of particular words in acts of parliament" (to use the words of Abbott, C.J., in "The Queen" v. Hall (1 B. & C. 136), "is to be found not so much in a strict etymological propriety of language, nor even in popular use, as in the subject or occasion on which they are used." It is in this sense that the meaning of the word "passengers" is to be here considered, and, so considered, their Lordships are of opinion that the captain's wife and her father were not passengers within the meaning of the clause, as to the employment of pilots, in the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, and the exoneration of owners of ships. If the ship was not carrying passengers she was exempted from the compulsory pilotage by the 379th section of the Merchant Shipping Act. It becomes necessary, therefore, to decide what the position of the owners is when the vessel was in charge of a duly licensed pilot whom it was not incumbent on them to employ. The pilot must therefore be considered as having been voluntarily selected by the owners, who are responsible for his default whilst acting as pilot in charge of their ship, unless they can bring their case within the exoneration clause, section 388, which enacts that, "No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law." In the opinion of their Lordships this case is governed by the decision of "The Stettin" (Bro. & Lush, 199), the authority of which is recognized by Kelly, C.B., in the case of The General Steam Navigation Company v. the British Colonial Steam Navigation Company (37 L. J. Ex. 194), the ground of which decision is explained by Byles, J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber (38 L. J. Ex. p. 97). The learned Judge expounds the 388th section as requiring "that the pilot should be compulsorily employed within the district where the injury occurred," in order to exempt the owners from responsibility for his default. "This," he says, "obviates all the mischief which might be apprehended from captains of ships unnecessarily and improperly employing pilots to escape the responsibility of navigation, and preserves the sole responsibility of the pilot in the whole district for which he was employed." He adds that their decision "does not conflict with the case of

"The Stettin" (Bro. & Lush. 199), where the pilot was taken on board where and when by law there was no necessity to take him." This explanation will be found to be strictly applicable to the present case. In answer to this it is strongly objected on the other side that the case of Lucey v. Ingram (6 Mee. & W. 302; 9 L. J. Ex. 196) is directly at variance with the case of "The Stettin" (Bro. & Lush. 199), and that as it was not cited in the case of "The Stettin" (Bro. & Lush. 199) the authority of that case is consequently thereby weakened.

Their Lordships are of opinion that there are two answers to this. In the first place it is to be observed that as the case of Lucey v. Ingram (6 Mee. & W. 302; 9 L. J. Ex. 196) had been under the notice and consideration of Dr. Lushington in several cases before he decided the case of "The Stettin" (Bro. & Lush. 199), it must be taken to have been present to his mind at that time; but, secondly (and which is more material, as it explains why Dr. Lushington did not think it necessary to refer to that case), upon a close examination, it does not appear to have any conclusive bearing upon the case of "The Stettin" (Bro. & Lush. 199), and, if so, it has not upon the present case. The case of Lucey v. Ingram (6 Mee. & W. 302; 9 L. J. Ex. 196) was decided upon the 6 Geo. 4. c. 125. ss. 55, 72, and though it was contended in argument that the sections are equivalent, or nearly so, to the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. s. 388, it does not so appear upon a minute examination. The 72nd section of 6 Geo. 4. c. 125. made it incumbent on the pilot to act, if he were required so to do by the master or owner of any ship wanting a pilot, and the former section (section 55.) exonerates the owners from responsibility "for any damage which should happen by reason of the neglect, default or incapacity of any licensed pilot acting in the charge of such ship under or in pursuance of any of the provisions of this act." This was held to include two cases: first, the case where the pilot was bound to act when required; and secondly, the case where the owners were bound to employ a pilot; and Baron Parke, in delivering the judgment, refers to its comprehensive terms as an "extended exemption," and he suggests the probable policy from which this extended exemption arose. That this decision is to be considered as properly to be referred to the special and extended exoneration enacted by the 6 Geo. 4. c. 125, is manifest as well from the judgment delivered by Baron Parke as from the observations of Dr. Lushington in the case of "The Agricola" (2 Wm. Rob. 10) and the case of "The Eden" (2 Wm. Rob. 441), and per Kelly, C.B., in The General Steam Navigation Company v. the British Colonial Steam Navigation Company (37 L. J. Ex. 194).

It was cited in argument in the case of "The Annapolis" (Lush. Rep. 295, 355), where Dr. Lushington refers to the ordinary principle of exemption as explained by him in the case of "The Maria" (1 W. Rob. 95), and in "The Annapolis" (Lush. Rep. 295, 355), and he states this principle to be in strict accordance with that of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. s. 388. The distinction between the sections in the two statutes when compared is obvious. By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 125. s. 55. it is further enacted "that no owner or master of any ship or vessel shall be answerable for any loss or damage which shall happen to any person or persons whomsoever from or by reason or means of any neglect, default, incompetency, or incapacity of any licensed pilot acting in the charge of any such ship or vessel under or in pursuance of any of the provisions of this act, where and so long as such pilot shall be duly qualified to have the charge of such ship or vessel, or where and so long as no duly qualified pilot shall have offered to take charge thereof." The statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. s. 388. enacts, "that no owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law." It is plain, therefore, that the first clause gives immunity to the owner whenever the vessel is in the charge of any licensed pilot, where he is qualified to have charge of the vessel, or where no duly qualified pilot has been appointed to take charge thereof; while the second clause, section 388, of the Merchant Shipping Act only applies to the case where the employment of the pilot is compulsory by law. Accordingly, contrasting the extended exoneration in 6 Geo. 4. c. 125. s. 55. with the more limited exoneration in 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. s. 388, and the policy suggested by Parke, B., as the ground of the former with that suggested by Byles, J., with reference to the latter, their Lordships are of opinion that the true interpretation of the enactment by which the present case is governed depends on this, whether the employment of the pilot was compulsory, and that it cannot be affected by anything decided in Lucey v. Ingram (6 Mee. & W. 302; 9 L. J. Ex. 196), and that the authority or soundness of the decision in the case of "The Stettin" (Bro. & Lush. 199) is not in any way prejudiced by the omission to notice the case of Lucey v. Ingram (6 Mee. & W. 302; 9 L. J. Ex. 196).

The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. s. 388. has been acted on in the case of "The Stettin" (Bro. & Lush. 199), and has also been clearly expounded in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, in the case of The General Steam Navigation Company v. the British Colonial Steam Navigation Company (37 L. J. Ex. 194), and according to the principle of these decisions the owners are not exonerated from responsibility for the default of the pilot whom they have selected and placed in charge of their ship when by law there was no obligation imposed on them to take such pilot and put him in charge.

Having come to the conclusion that there were no passengers on board the "Lion" at the time of the collision, their Lordships are of opinion that the master was not under any compulsion to take a pilot; and, secondly, that having taken a pilot, even assuming that the pilot was bound to act, this does not in such circumstances exonerate the owner from responsibility for the errors committed by the pilot in a case where they were not compellable to take a pilot and put him in charge of the vessel. In the observations their Lordships have made, they have acted on the assumption that West was a duly licensed pilot, and that he had charge of the vessel; but it would be improper to part with this case without calling attention to the fact that West himself swears that he took charge of the ship as a waterman, and not as a pilot. He was not engaged by the captain, but was sent by another pilot; whether sent by the owners or not does not appear.

Their Lordships therefore concur with the learned Judge of the Court of Admiralty in opinion that the presence of the captain's wife and her father in the "Lion," in the circumstances of the case as detailed in the evidence, did not constitute them passengers; that no act done after the collision could convert them into the character of passengers if they did not previously fill that character; and also that the "Lion" had not on board of her at the time of the collision a pilot employed by them under compulsion of law; and that the owners of the "Lion" are liable to pay to the owners of the "York-Town" the damage done to her by the inexcusable collision of the "Lion"; and their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the decision of the learned Judge of the Court of Admiralty be affirmed, with costs.

Damage—Arrest of Cargo—Lien for Freight.

SHIPPING.—All the cargo on board of a vessel at the time of a collision belonged to the same owner, but only part of that cargo was on board when the vessel was arrested in the suit for the damage:—Held, that the lien for the whole freight extended to every part of the cargo on board at the time of the collision.

This was a motion for release of cargo.

The "Roecliff" had been arrested and subsequently sold in a cause of damage brought by the owners of a vessel called the "Nethania." The value of freight upon the whole cargo was about 90*l.*; but a portion only of the cargo was on board the vessel at the time of the arrest, and freight upon that portion only had been paid into Court.

Bayford, for the owner of the cargo, moved for a release.—The cargo is not responsible for the damage—"The Leo" (31 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 78), "The Victor" (31 L. J. Pr. M. & A. 72)—and can only be arrested for the freight. In this case what was due upon the arrested cargo has been paid.

E. C. Clarkson, for the "Nethania."—The same person was owner of ship and freight, and the lien for all the freight extends to every portion of the cargo.

SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE.—It is clear that the whole of the freight upon the cargo on board the vessel at the time of the collision was responsible for the damage; and the accident of some of that cargo not being on board at the time of the arrest cannot relieve it from that obligation which it is the duty of the Court, so far as its powers extend, to enforce. I shall not release the cargo until the whole freight be paid into Court.

Clarkson applied for costs.

SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE.—As there seems to have been some uncertainty as to the law upon this point, I shall make no order as to costs.

Bottomry—Hypothecation of Cargo, Necessity for—Advances for by Charterer—Freight—Rights of Obligee.

SHIPPING.—The existence of the "necessity" which validates the hypothecation of cargo by bottomry is to be ascertained by evidence in the usual manner; and the meaning of the term "necessity" in respect of hypothecation by the master is analogous to its meaning in other parts of the law.

Any combination of events which would prevent the completion of the voyage with profit, unless money should be obtained by bottomry, would raise the question whether there was need for bottomry in such high degree as to create a necessity.

In a suit on a bottomry bond hypothecating "ship, cargo and freight" it appeared that the master had before bottomry obtained advances on account of freight from the charterers:—Held, that the obligee in bottomry had no claim to freight so advanced by the charterers prior to bottomry, provided the advances were made bonâ fide.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Admiralty of England pronounced in a cause of bottomry instituted by the respondents, the holders of a bottomry bond upon the vessel "Karnak," her freight and the cargo lately laden on board of her, against the "Karnak," her said freight and cargo. The appellants were the owners of this cargo.

The "Karnak," a vessel of 267 tons register, was, in the year 1866, at Galveston, in the United States of America, where, on November 21, 1866, she was chartered to the appellants, there to load a cargo of cotton, and to carry the same to Liverpool for freight, and the vessel was to be consigned to the order of the appellants, Messrs. Droege & Co., of Manchester. In pursuance of the said charter-party, the "Karnak" took on board 720 bales of cotton (the cargo proceeded against), for which the master signed bills of lading; and on December 24, 1866, the vessel, with the cargo on board, sailed for Liverpool. On January 17, 1867, the "Karnak" having in the prosecution of her aforesaid voyage met with bad weather and suffered considerable damage, put into the port of St. George, in the island of Bermuda, in distress, and the master proceeded, shortly after his arrival, to have the vessel thoroughly repaired. In order to obtain a sum of 2,690*l*. 6*s*. 1*d*. for the payment of the repairs, as well as of other charges and expenses incurred by him at the port of St. George, the master executed a bottomry bond to one John Bluck, of that port, by which he hypothecated the vessel, her cargo and freight, to secure the repayment of 3,228*l*. 7*s*. 3*d*., being the said sum of 2,690*l*. 6*s*. 1*d*. and marine interest. The "Karnak" subsequently proceeded on, and completed her voyage to Liverpool. The bottomry bond, of which the respondents became the holders, was never paid. The respondents instituted a suit against the "Karnak," her cargo and freight, and the owners of the vessel having allowed judgment to go by default, the "Karnak" was sold by order of the Court of Admiralty. The proceeds of such sale were paid into Court, and the Court pronounced for the force and validity of the said bottomry bond, so far as related to the "Karnak" and her freight. The net proceeds of the sale of the "Karnak" available for payment of the said bond amounted to 512*l*. 11*s*. 9*d*. The whole of the freight originally payable under the charter-party in respect of the cargo proceeded against in the cause amounted to not less than 1,324*l*. 16*s*. The appellants, however, did not pay the whole of that sum into Court, but only the sum of 628*l*. 15*s*. 3*d*., contending that they had satisfied the residue by advances on account of freight made by the charterers at Galveston, together with costs of insurance, and interest and commission.

The cause came on for hearing in the Court below, and the appellants contended that the bottomry bond was invalid as against the cargo, and that they were entitled to insist on the part payment of freight.

The learned Judge of the Court below pronounced for the validity of the bottomry bond, so far as it affected the cargo, and directed the appellants to pay into Court the sum which they had retained out of the freight.

From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

The case in the Court below will be found reported 37 L. J. Adm. 41.

Sir G. Honyman and Cohen, for the appellants.—The bottomry bond is invalid as against the cargo. There was no urgent and immediate necessity for borrowing money on bottomry such as will justify the hypothecation of cargo. The master might reasonably have communicated, but did not communicate to the consignees of the cargo. Such communication was all the more obligatory on the master on account of the great value of the cargo as compared with the ship, and on account of the large amount of money borrowed as compared with the value of ship and freight. The appellants were entitled to make the deductions from the freight. The evidence was, that there was an agreement between the master and the charterers that the money advanced should be taken in part payment of freight, and it was so taken.—They referred to "The Prince George" (4 Moore P.C. 21); "The Oriental" (7 Moore P.C. 398); Beldon v. Campbell (6 Ex. 886; 20 L. Sir J. Karslake and Clarkson, for the respondents.—The master was without funds or credit at Bermuda, and had no means of obtaining money to enable him to prosecute his voyage other than by resorting to a loan on bottomry of the ship, her cargo and freight. It was competent for the master to borrow upon bottomry of the ship, her cargo and freight, money for the purpose of paying persons, other than the bondholder, the amount of the advances previously made by them at the port of distress, for the necessities of the ship, to enable her to prosecute her voyage. The ship and her freight were, by the law of Bermuda, liable to arrest, at the suit of the persons to pay whose claims the money was borrowed of the bondholder. Under the circumstances, it was not incumbent on the master to communicate with the consignees or owners of the cargo before resorting to bottomry thereof. The master was not by law bound to tranship the cargo. As regards the sum of 727*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*, the master had not authority to receive part of the freight in advance, and the charter-party does not contain any provision under the authority of which the appellants can justify their claim to make such deductions. The advance made by the appellants was an advance by way of loan on the security of the freight.—They referred to " The Gratitudine " (Tudor's Lead. Cas. in Admiralty, 30).

Sir G. Honyman, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Sir William Erle (July 15) delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—Upon this appeal two questions have been raised; the first relating to the cargo, the second to a part of the freight. As to the cargo, the question is, whether the circumstances in which the ship is shewn to have been placed created a necessity for hypothecation? In the Court below the answer was in the affirmative; and, in his judgment there, the learned Judge carefully examined all the evidence and all the authorities in the Admiralty Courts relevant to the case, and their Lordships now agree in the conclusion which was there arrived at in respect of the cargo, and consider that any detailed examination of the arguments adduced here on behalf of the appellants is rendered unnecessary thereby; but they add a reference to some common law cases containing principles confirmatory of the decision in the Court below.

In Lloyd v. Guibert (6 Best & S. 100, 120; 33 L. J. Q.B. 241) the extent of the authority conferred on the captain by his appointment to bind the interest of the owner either of the ship or of the cargo, and the principles on which the limits of that authority are to be ascertained are laid down by Blackburn, J., in the Queen's Bench, and by Willes, J., in the Exchequer Chamber. There the captain of a French ship had hypothecated ship, freight and cargo, and the owner of the cargo sued the shipowner to indemnify him for the loss occasioned thereby: and it was decided that he could not recover, because, by the law of France, the captain cannot make the shipowner liable for more than the value of the ship and freight, and as the owner had abandoned both he was exempt from further liability. It was there laid down that the captain's authority is derived from and bounded by the municipal law of a country to which the ship belongs,—that is, by the law of the flag; and Willes, J., delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, answers an argument founded on the supposition of a general maritime law, contra-distinguished from the municipal law of this country, by refusing to recognize the existence of a maritime law in that sense. In accordance with the principle thereby laid down, their Lordships consider that the existence of the necessity which validates the hypothecation of cargo by bottomry is to be ascertained by evidence in the usual manner; and that the meaning of the term " necessity " in respect of hypothecation by the master is analogous to its meaning in other parts of the law. This meaning has been the subject of much discussion in Westminster Hall—see The Queen v. Winsor (35 L. R. M.C. 161); it has been described as a high degree of need—a need which arises when choice is to be made of one of several alternatives under the peril of severe loss if a wrong choice should be made. In the case of a voyage it is probably correct to say that any alternative for the captain is better than total loss of ship and cargo, and that he is under a necessity of choosing another alternative, if any should be possible; and in respect of bottomry, any combination of events which would prevent the completion of the voyage with profit, unless money should be obtained by bottomry, would raise the question whether there was need for bottomry in such high degree as to create a necessity. These remarks are made in answer to some arguments offered to us founded upon cases supposed to decide that a bottomry bond would in all cases be void on account of the absence of necessity if the repairs were completed before the bond to raise money to pay for them was given or contracted for, or if there was no communication with the owner of ship or cargo before the bottomry bond was given. The effect of any such fact cannot be appreciated without taking it in combination with the concomitant facts. If the repairs were complete, but the ship could not leave the port until they were paid for, the completion of repairs would be an immaterial fact in estimating the degree of need for bottomry. If the creditor could sell the ship in case of non-payment, the sale would be a total loss of the voyage for the ship; and the learned counsel for the appellant failed to shew either any duty on the captain in case of such sale to land, warehouse and tranship the cargo, or any possibility thereby to realize any profit for the freighter. So, in respect of communication with the owner either of ship or cargo, the possibility of so doing must be construed by estimating the cost and risk incidental to the delay from the attempt to make such communication, and the probability of failure after every exertion should have been made. The effect of any single fact upon the prospect of prosecuting the voyage with profit varies in endless permutation, according as some other fact forms a part of the combination of events which the captain has to consider in deciding whether there is a necessity for bottomry; and, as we before observed, we concur with the learned Judge in the Court below in thinking that such necessity was shewn to exist in this case, although the repairs were completed before any proposal for the bond was made by the captain, and although the attempts to communicate with the owner of ship or cargo were not carried further than appeared by the evidence.

Then, as to the second ground of appeal, relating to the sums borrowed by the captain from the charterer at the port of loading, viz., 632*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* cash advanced, and 61*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.* interest and insurance thereon, the question between these parties is, whether the sums were to be repaid in any event, or only by deduction from the freight if freight was earned. The charterer, on signing the charter-party, incurs a liability for the chartered freight which becomes a debt in case of safe delivery of cargo, and the captain, for the shipowners, frequently obtains advances as well on account of this liability, whether stipulated for in the charter-party or not, as on the personal security of his owners. In either case they are loans; in the one case they are advances of freight, in the other case they are debts from the borrower. The distinction is at times material, because if they are advances of freight, the lender has an insurable interest in an advance which is to be lost if freight is not earned, but he has no such interest in an absolute debt. In the present case, advances are not stipulated for in the charter-party, but were obtained by the application of the captain to the charterer, and both he and the charterer state that they were advances of freight; and the receipts for the advances are so expressed as that, if effect is given to those parts of them relating to insurance, they are decisive to shew that the sums obtained were advances of freight, to be repaid by deductions from freight, if earned; and if not earned, then to be lost by the charterer, unless he should have used the stipulated premium in insuring. We consider Hicks v. Sheils (7 El. & B. 633; 26 L. J. Q.B. 205) to be an authority for this construction. On these grounds, as between the charterer and the shipowner, their Lordships came to the conclusion that the sums obtained, viz., 632*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* cash advanced, and 61*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.* for interest and insurance thereon, together 694*l.* 0*s.* 11*d.*, were advances of freight.

Then, as between the holder of the bottomry bond and the charterer, is the nature of the transaction changed? Does the captain, by hypothecating the chartered freight to the obligee in bottomry, give a right to more freight than he, as obligor, had a right to demand from the charterer? The learned counsel for the respondent adduced no authority in support of the proposition that the assignee took by assignment what the assignor had no title to. The case of the last bottomry bond taking precedence of prior bottomry bonds, stands on the known incidents to a loan on bottomry; and no such incident has been shewn to be attached by known course of law to advances on account of chartered freight. But, on the contrary, in Parson's Maritime Law, America, 429, it is stated that a general hypothecation of freight includes freight whether earned or not, "provided it has not been paid to the master or owner." He refers to "The John" (3 W. Rob. 170), where the advance was stipulated for by the charter-party; but we consider that the same principle applies to any bona fide arrangement without fraud for forehand-payment or discharge before the bottomry is required.

The learned counsel also used as an argument the policy of the law in making bottomry a good security, but it must not be made a good security by violating the rights of others. It is a good security in this case, as the cargo must pay if the prepaid freight is exempt. The lender on bottomry had the opportunity for knowing what advances had been made on account of freight, as they were indorsed on the charter-party, which he might have seen, and there was no ground for imputing fraud.

For these reasons, their Lordships will recommend that the judgment in the Court below should be reversed, in so far as it relates to the sums claimed as advances of freight, and for interest and insurance thereon.

There remains the sum of 33*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.*, claimed as commission due by usage for obtaining the charter; and, according to such usage, to be paid by deduction from freight, if earned. But as to this sum, the statements in the evidence do not convince their Lordships that the appellant had the right to deduct it from the freight as against the holder of the bottomry bond; and they do not further examine into the right to this sum because as between these parties no interest depends upon the right thereto.

Their Lordships will therefore recommend to Her Majesty to affirm so much of the judgment of the Court below as affirms the liability of the appellants, as owners of the cargo, to the holder of a bottomry bond, and denies the right of the appellants to deduct the sum of 33*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* from the freight for commission; and to reverse so much of the judgment as relates to the refusal to allow, as deductions from the freight to be paid to the respondent, the above-mentioned sums, which their Lordships consider to have been advances of freight. There will be no costs of appeal on either side.

Salvage—Agreement as to Distribution.

SHIPPING.—The plaintiff, as temporary master of a steam-tug, rendered important salvage service to a vessel in distress. At the time he became master he was aware of the custom of the owners of the steam-tug to distribute any salvage according to a fixed rate of poundage, but the owners gave him no special notice of the custom:—Held, that the legal effect of the 182*nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act*, 1854, and of the 18*th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act*, 1862, is to leave agreements for distribution of salvage in the same condition in which they were prior to any legislation on the subject; and that, under the circumstances of the case, the custom was not inequitable, and that the plaintiff was bound by it.

This was an application to the Court on behalf of a single salvor for salvage remuneration. He was the temporary master of a steam-tug, called the "Sailor," of Yarmouth, which rendered salvage services to a large steamer, called the "Ganges," whilst she was in distress near the Hasborough Sands, and instituted his suit for apportionment of salvage against the owners of the steam-tugs "Sailor" and "Pilot," who were also salvors of the said vessel. The "Sailor" was a steam-tug of twenty-five tons, and thirty-two horse power, belonged to the Great Yarmouth Standard Steam-Tug Company, and was manned by a crew of three men, viz., by the plaintiff as master, an engineer, and a stoker, and during the progress of the services in question she took on board two extra men. The services of the "Sailor" began at one o'clock p.m., of Friday, October 23, 1868, and lasted till four o'clock p.m., of the Sunday following, and it was admitted in the answer that the services were performed with much difficulty and some risk, and that by means of the said services, and those of other salvors, the "Ganges" was rescued from a position of great danger.

The other salvors were the tugs "Pilot" and "Andrew Woodhouse," and the "Caistor" lifeboat, also belonging to Yarmouth. A sum of 2,000*l*. was paid by the owners of the "Ganges" and her cargo, which was accepted as covering the claims of all the salvors, and the amount due to the "Sailor" was fixed at 410*l*. 10*s*., distributable among the owners, master and crew of that tug, and of this sum 3*l*. 15*s*. was set apart as the portion to be paid to the plaintiff, and was tendered to and refused by him.

Butt and Pritchard appeared for the plaintiff, and Dr. Deane and E. C. Clarkson, for the defendants.

The arguments of counsel, and the statutes and cases cited are fully set forth in the following judgment, delivered on July 20.

SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE.—This sum would certainly, upon the general principles upon which salvage is distributed, be a very inadequate remuneration to the plaintiff, who was the temporary master of the "Sailor." This particular allotment, however, is defended upon the ground of special custom and agreement. It appears from the defendants' pleadings and from the evidence that the Great Yarmouth Steam-Tug Company carries on a business with the steam-tugs the "Sailor" and the "Pilot," and two other tugs. This business consists in great part "of rendering salvage services and towage services in the nature of salvage services to vessels in distress; and their tugs are expressly provided and constantly kept up at a great cost with a view to rendering such services, and but for the remuneration obtained for such services they would be unable to work their tugs at a profit." The secretary of the company, Mr. Freeman, was examined: he explained that they had a business of towing and salvage; that there were many cases of towage of distressed vessels for which sums under 10*l*. were received; that the simple towage remuneration would not enable the company to keep up their tugs; the masters and crews are allowed by the company 5*l*. per cent. on all towage, and upon salvage where the sum earned was over 5*l*.; besides this they had their wages, and, when away from port, 1*s*. 6*d*. a day for victualling money. During the fishing season there was a towage of fourteen or fifteen boats a day; each tug had a crew of three men and one large rope on board; and the company had carried on this business since 1862, during which time only one man had demurred to the system of poundage. It appears, however, that the tugs were laid up for nine months in the year. It appears also from the evidence that the remuneration is the same to each of the crew, however different the degree of merit, and also that the tug or tugs not employed in the service share equally with those that are employed.

The plaintiff deposed that he had been master in the service of the defendants for about thirty months, and " for two fourteen months," as he expressed it, he had been master of the "Sailor"; that he was perfectly aware of the custom of poundage, and had always acquiesced in it; that when he took Butterfield's place as temporary master of the "Sailor" for a few days he was aware that this custom prevailed, and he gave no notice to the owners that he was not serving as master upon the ordinary terms of poundage-remuneration; he admitted that Butterfield had taken his place when he, the plaintiff, was in the service of the company on the same terms. Some evidence has also been offered to the Court tending to prove that the arrangement in question does operate, on the whole, beneficially for the seamen who are employed by this company.

Upon the general question as to whether any agreement of this kind shall be maintained, I have had considerable doubt. On the one hand, there is a tendency to set aside the principles on which salvage remuneration is awarded, to remove the stimulus which that principle affords to individual exertion, and to reduce the various degrees of merit which may arise to one dead level. On the other hand, I think I must infer from the evidence before me that one principal object of salvage remuneration is advanced by this agreement, namely, the having in readiness vessels peculiarly fitted for the preservation of life and property, and crews accustomed to the navigation of them.

I have considered various cases which have been decided by my predecessors on this subject, viz., "The Red Rover" (W. Rob. 150); "The Margaret Kay," referred to in "The Zephyr" (2 W. Rob. 48); and "The Beulah" (2 Notes of Cases, 64). In "The Beulah" the words of the Judge are remarkable: "I cannot consider myself bound by any arrangement that the owners might make with the mariners, because I apprehend that the latter are entitled to the judgment of this Court as to what it thinks equitable, and as to the principles which ought to govern each particular case. At the same time, I must confess that I should be exceedingly reluctant indeed to disturb an arrangement hitherto carried on with satisfaction to all parties, and which, as far as I find, has been productive of nothing but an harmonious result. I cannot lay out of my consideration an important fact which makes a material difference in a case of this kind, namely, that it has been sworn, and not contradicted, that the persons on board these steamers receive their wages whether in sickness or health, and they are therefore in a very different situation, in many important respects, from ordinary mariners. I wish it to be understood that if, unfortunately, any such case as this should occur again, I undoubtedly shall make an exception to any arrangement which has been formed between the parties, not only where there has been great risk, but also where there has been extraordinary labour; but these are the only cases in which I shall do it. Where there is no great risk or extraordinary labour, I shall think it my duty to adhere to the arrangements with respect to quantum which have hitherto been acted upon by the parties." These cases were decided before the enactment of the Merchant Shipping Act, to certain sections of which I will now refer.

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), contained the following clause (section 182): "Every stipulation by which any seaman consents to abandon any right which he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage shall be wholly inoperative." "The Enchantress" (Lush. 93; 30 L. J. Adm. 16) was decided after the passing of this act. In that case the learned Judge said (p. 96, after quoting the 182nd section), "The Court has held, and must hold that not only all agreements barring salvage are wholly inoperative, but that agreements limiting the proportion of salvage money are to be maintained only so far as they are really equitable. I am of opinion that the alleged agreement in this case is open to the objection that it is inequitable, and that, even if made, it is not binding upon the plaintiffs."

Since this decision the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862 (25 &

26 Vict. c. 63), has provided as follows, by section 18: "It is hereby declared that the 182nd section of the principal act does not apply to the case of any stipulation made by the seamen belonging to any ship which, according to the terms of the agreement, is to be employed on salvage service, with respect to the remuneration to be paid to them for salvage services to be rendered by such ship to any other ship or ships."

I do not construe these statutes as in any way fettering the discretion of the Court upon the subject of these agreements; the joint effect of the two clauses is simply to render such agreements not illegal, and to place them on the same footing on which they stood before any legislation on the subject. This I am glad to find was the opinion of my predecessor in the last case to which I shall refer,—"The Pride of Canada" (Bro. & Lush. 208), reported more fully in the Maritime Law Cases, vol. 1, p. 406. The circumstances of it were very similar to the present case.

Having regard to these circumstances, especially to the facts, that the salvor in this case was perfectly aware he was acting for a person bound by this arrangement, which I cannot pronounce, upon the evidence before me, to be inequitable; that no extraordinary exertion or peril accompanied the salvage service in this case, which was mainly effected by the vessel; I think I shall act in accordance with the principles which have guided my predecessors in this Court in pronouncing for the validity of the arrangement in the case now before me.

I have considered the argument which has been addressed to me with respect to the apportionment of salvage to this individual under the assumption of the agreement, and I have come to the conclusion that I ought not to interfere with that matter.

I pronounce, therefore, against the prayer of the plaintiff, but I shall give no costs.

Damage to Cargo—Leakage—Right to Sue—Consignees.

SHIPPING.—N. was in the habit of consigning goods to the plaintiffs for sale, and the plaintiffs from time to time accepted their bills and accredited him with the proceeds of the sale of the goods. N. being at the time indebted to the plaintiffs upon the account current between them, consigned a cargo of sugar to the plaintiffs, which was delivered in a damaged state:—Held, that as consignees of the cargo and creditors of N. the plaintiffs were entitled to sue in the Admiralty Court for damage by reason of negligence or breach of duty; and semble also as mere consignees, even though no property in the goods passed to them.

Held, also, that the damage being caused by the insufficient drainage of the ship, and not by the usual leakage of the sugar, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

This was a suit under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, against the Norwegian barque "Nepoter" and her owners, and was instituted by Messrs. Cottam, Morten & Co., as consignees of various parcels of sugar which formed part of the cargo.

The consignees had been in the habit of consigning goods for sale to the plaintiffs, who from time to time had accepted the consignee's bills, and credited him with the proceeds. On the account between them, the consignor was a debtor to the plaintiffs.

The bills of lading were not indorsed to the consignees, but they were named therein as the persons to whom the goods were to be delivered.

The bills of lading were in the following form:

"Shipped in good order and well conditioned, by James Harvey, in and upon the good ship called the "Nepoter," whereof is master for this present voyage Nielsen, and now in the port of Salt River, Jamaica, and bound for London, twenty hogsheads, forty-one tierces, forty-four barrels of sugar; fourteen puncheons of rum; seventy-eight tons of logwood: all on board, being marked and numbered as in the margin (*), and are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the aforesaid port of London (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever, excepted) unto Cottam, Morten & Co., or to their assigns. Freights for the said goods to be paid—three shillings and three pence per cwt. for sugar, five pence per gallon for rum, and twenty shillings per ton for wood; with primage and average accustomed.

"In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to three bills of lading all of this tenor and date; the one of which bills being accomplished, the others to stand void.

"Weight and contents unknown—Not liable for leakage.

"G. NIELSON.

"Dated in Salt River, Jamaica,
"April 17, 1868."

The petition alleged that the goods were not delivered "in good order and well conditioned"; that such non-delivery was "caused by the negligence or misconduct of the master and crew, or was otherwise a breach of contract or duty on the part of the master and of the defendants." And the answer alleged, 1, that the plaintiffs were not consignees of the goods to whom the property in them had passed; 2, that the goods were delivered in a proper state and condition to the plaintiffs; 3, that the non-delivery of the goods was not occasioned by negligence, breach of contract, or breach of duty on the part of the master or of the defendants; and 4, that the damage was occasioned by leakage, for which the defendants were not liable.

Keane and R. G. Williams, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs are not assignees for value; and it has been already held in this Court that a nude assignee cannot sue under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861—"The St. Cloud" (1 Bro. & Lush. 14). Upon the facts the evidence shews that the loss arose from leakage within the exceptions of the bill of lading.

Butt and Cohen, contra.—This Court has already held that an indorsee of a bill of lading consigned to him for sale may sue if he has made advances on the bill of lading—"The Figlia Maggiore" (37 L. J. Adm. 52; L. R. 2 Adm. 110). See also Short v. Simpson (35 L. J. C.P. 147). And in this case the goods were consigned to the plaintiffs, who were in the habit of accepting bills for the consignor, and between whom there was an account current, according to which the consignor was then a debtor to the plaintiffs. Upon the facts, the damage arose from insufficient drainage.

SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE.—With respect to the first defence, which is one of law, the validity of it must depend upon the true construction of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, and upon the practice of this Court independently of that act. Upon both grounds I am of opinion that this defence fails. I adhere to the construction of the statute which I expressed in "The Figlia Maggiore" (37

(*) "$\frac{4}{EM}$ 1-20 hds. Sugar. 1-12 puns. Rum.—IB 1-16 tierces Sugar.—EP 1-25 tierces Sugar. 1-44 brls. ditto.—I H 702 puns. Rum. 78 tons Logwood: all on Board."

L. J. Adm. 52; L. R. 2 Adm. 110), and I think that these plaintiffs have a right, under section 6 of 24 Vict. c. 10, to sue the defendants both for negligence and for breach of contract as "consignees of goods named in the bills of lading," even though the property did not pass; in other words, that it is not necessary to import into the Admiralty Court Act from the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111) the words "to whom the property in the goods shall pass."

I am aware that this construction differs from that which Dr. Lushington put upon the statute in his judgment in "The St. Cloud" (1 Bro. & Lush. 14), and that I am taking a step beyond that which I took in "The Figlia Maggiore" (37 L. J. Adm. 52; L. R. 2 Adm. 110); but, after much reflection, I have come to the conclusion that the Admiralty Court Act intended to give every consignee or assignee of a bill of lading a capacity to sue in this Court for damage done to the goods mentioned in the bill. I think this, which is certainly the obvious construction of the plain words of the statute, is consistent with the intention of the legislature to protect the absent owner. It must often happen, as in the present case, that an immediate proceeding, and one which would allow no time for communication with the owner, must be necessary for his protection. The evidence of damage caused by fermentation or the like process might and not unfrequently would be lost in consequence of the delay which the necessity of such a communication would create; and I agree with Dr. Lushington in his general view of the objects of this statute—"The St. Cloud" (1 Bro. & Lush. 14): "The general intention of the legislature cannot be doubtful. The statute is remedial. The short delivery of goods brought to this country in foreign ships, or their delivery in a damaged state, was frequently a grievous injury, for which there was no practical remedy, for the owners of such vessels being resident abroad no action could be successfully brought against them in a British tribunal. To send the merchant who had sustained a loss to commence a suit in a foreign tribunal, and probably in a distant country, could not be deemed a practical or effectual remedy. With a view to obviate a grievance so oppressive to British merchants, the enactment contained in the 6th section was passed. It was intended to operate by enabling the party aggrieved to arrest the ship in cases where, from the absence of the shipowner in foreign parts, the common law tribunals could not afford effectual redress." And by the 7th section of the same statute (24 Vict. c. 10) it has been enacted, "That the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship." This Court (confirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council) has, in the case of "The Beta" (38 L. J. Adm. 50), put the largest construction on the words, "any claim," a fact which must be considered in weighing the reasons assigned by Dr. Lushington in his judgment in "The St. Cloud" (1 Bro. & Lush. 14).

The reasons which appear most to have weighed with my learned predecessor for importing the words of the Bills of Lading Act into the Admiralty Court Act, which he said "at first sight is rather a strong proposition," were as follows: "A nude assignee would if the owners of the ship were out of the country, have a right of action in the Admiralty Court, and in that alone; but if the owners of the ship were in this country such nude assignee would have no right of action either in the Admiralty Court or in one of the Courts of common law. Such a consequence is so inconsistent with reason, that I cannot believe it was the intention of the legislature." But it appears to me, as perhaps it would to that learned Judge if it had been brought a second time to his consideration, that this consequence is really not unreasonable, because if the owner of the ship were in this country, the owner of the goods would know where and how to bring his action against him, whereas, in the case of the owner being abroad, unless his agent could at once arrest the ship, no action could be brought at all either in rem or in personam in this country, although the cargo was discharged here, and all the evidence of the damage must necessarily be in this country. Another reason for putting this construction upon this statute is, that it would be in harmony with the usual practice of this Court, which has always put aside technical objections as to the parties who may institute or defend a suit, and allowed any person who has an interest to appear for the purpose of defending that interest, as in the common case of a bottomry bondholder defending a suit for wages. But if the construction of the statute in "The St. Cloud" (1 Bro. & Lush. 14) be right, and my present construction be wrong, I adhere to my opinion expressed in "The Figlia Maggiore" (37 L. J. Adm. 52; L. R. 2 Adm. 110), that the consignee would have a persona standi on the ground of negligence or breach of duty, if not on the ground of breach of contract, for I think that I must assign a distinct force to each of these grounds.

I think it right also to add, that after careful perusal of the judgment in the case of Short v. Simpson (35 L. J. C.P. 147), I incline to the opinion that a property did pass sufficient to entitle the consignee to sue in this Court under these bills of lading, in the particular circumstances of this case. It is true that bills were not drawn upon the cargo, but there was an arrangement between the consignor and the consignee, according to which the consignee accepted bills drawn upon his firm by the consignor, and credited him with the proceeds of the goods sold from time to time. There was an account current between them, and at the time of the institution of this suit the consignor was considerably in debt to the consignee. And the mention of this fact leads me to notice another criterion of a species of property having passed to the plaintiffs in this case. An indorsee of a bill of lading, to whom a general balance is due, and a consignee of goods, who is intrusted to sell them and has a general balance against the consignor, have an insurable interest in such goods (1 Arnould, pp. 246, 247). This is the position of the plaintiffs in this case; and therefore, I think, a sufficient property would have been vested in the plaintiffs to satisfy the Bills of Lading Act; and, moreover, they would have such an interest in the goods as would, according to all analogy derived from the practice of this Court, entitle them to sue.

Now with respect to the defence on the facts of the case: The cargo in this vessel was the usual if not the invariable cargo from Jamaica, namely, a cargo of sugar; and it is proved to my satisfaction, after due consideration of the evidence on the one side and the other, that the portion of the cargo which belongs to the plaintiffs, and it is to be observed that it was only a small portion of the cargo, was shipped in proper order and after proper precautions in the port of Salt River, Jamaica; and the condition in which the cargo generally was discharged at the port of London appears to have been as follows: The upper portion was in a very good condition, as was also the lower portion, with the exception of the casks on the ground tier, which were consigned to the plaintiffs. On this tier there was an accumulation of drainage in the nature of molasses, part liquid, part encrusted to the extent of two feet or rather more up the hogsheads; some of the casks were full, some about half full, some about one-third, and some entirely empty. Not any casks on the bottom tier were absolutely uninjured, according to the evidence of Mr. Jack, who superintended the discharge of the cargo, and who appeared to me a perfectly credible witness. The fact, therefore, that the goods were not discharged in the like good order and condition in which they were laden appears to me to be proved.

The next defence is, that this damage was not occasioned by negligence or breach of duty on the part of the master. This defence involves two considerations: first, whether any precaution ought to have been taken to prevent the accumulation of drainage. Secondly, if so, whether such precaution was taken. It appears from the evidence that all sugar cargoes drain, and that this sugar cargo drained, I think, rather less than the average, for I am not inclined to rely upon the evidence of Mr. Freeman. It appears that the drainage came out for the most part, if not entirely, from the head of the cask. It is admitted that this drainage should find its way through the ceiling in some way or other into the hold, and also that the drainage of this cargo did not so find its way. If this drainage does not escape, the lowest tier of casks must, as in the present case, receive injury. I have already adverted to the fact that these casks were imbedded more than half way up in molasses; and to this fact there can be no doubt, in my opinion, that the damage done to this cargo was owing. The master frankly admitted that this was the first cargo of sugar which he had ever carried, that there were four holes, about one-and-a-quarter inch in diameter, bored close to the after-part of the pumps, for the purpose only of draining the water when the hold was washed. Other witnesses also speak to these holes. The result of the evidence appears to me to be, that they were quite insufficient to afford the necessary means of egress for the liquid stuff to reach the pumps; and that means ought to have been provided, either by a greater number and a larger size of holes, or by keeping the timber-boards open by means of wedges, a precaution which appears to be generally taken before the vessel sails. It is clear that the skin of the ceiling of the "Nepoter" was too tight to allow the stuff to escape without some such precautions. I am therefore of opinion that precautions ought to have been taken by the master, and were not taken, which would have prevented the damage in this case.

The last defence remains to be considered, namely, that this drainage falls within the excepted perils mentioned in the bills of lading, that is, "not liable for leakage." But this defence appears to me also untenable. For it is not the leakage, properly speaking, which has done this injury to the cargo; but the accumulation of drainage upon the floor, to such an extent that the casks were half way immersed in it; and it was this mischief which, by keeping out the air, caused the sugar to heat, and thereby, as a natural consequence, produced the emptiness of the casks. The circumstances, therefore, of this case render the judgment of the Privy Council in "The Hélène" (1 Bro. & Lush. 429) inapplicable. Upon the whole, I am satisfied that the plaintiffs have established their case; and I must make the usual order of reference to the registrar, to ascertain the amount of the damage; and I must accompany this sentence with costs.

Bottomry—Notice to Owner, an Insolvent.

SHIPPING.—A vessel being in distress at Cuba, the agents of the charterers telegraphed to that effect to the charterers at Liverpool, who authorized their agents to advance the necessary funds on bottomry. The owner resided in the same town as the charterers, and the charterers knew where he lived, but the owner was insolvent:—Held, that the charterers should have communicated with the owner, and that in the absence of notice to him the bond was invalid.

This was a petition in objection to the Registrar's report in a cause of bottomry, brought by Charles Barron and Thomas Harrison, the holders of two bottomry bonds, against the vessel "Panama." The owner did not appear, but the validity of the bonds was opposed by Mr. Stewart, a mortgagee, and it was agreed by the plaintiff and defendant that the bonds should be referred to the Registrar, assisted by merchants, "to report the amount due thereon, but without prejudice to any question as to their validity." At the reference before the Registrar the first bond was abandoned, and as to the second, the Registrar reported that it was invalid, on the ground that the bondholder had not communicated with the owner, although he was in the same town, and might have conferred with him whenever he pleased, and was aware that the master had not communicated with him. The Registrar reported that all the charges were "quite proper," that the "bottomry premium was not excessive," and that "he was not aware that any of the items could have been struck out."

Digitized by Google

The petition of appeal alleged the report to be erroneous, because the Registrar had no power to decide upon the validity of the bond, and because the facts did not warrant the report that the bond was invalid. It was subsequently agreed between the parties that the Court should be asked to decide the question as to the validity of the bond, as if the question were mooted before it in the first instance, and that the remainder of the report should be accepted.

Butt and Pritchard, for the bondholder, in objection to the report.—The necessity for the bond may be complete without notice to owners, and in such a case notice is unnecessary. If the owner had known of the requirements of the master he could not have satisfied them, as he was insolvent. Besides, the facts of this case shew that the owner was aware that before the vessel returned to this country she would require more money than he had supplied, and as he was without credit, either at Cardenas or elsewhere, the necessary funds could only be obtained by bottomry, and he must therefore be held to have sanctioned the bonds, which he knew would be inevitable before the vessel's return—"The Bonaparte" (3 W. Rob. 298; 7 Notes of Cases, Sup. 55).

Clarkson, contra.

On July 30 judgment was given as follows:—

SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE.—The first bond has been abandoned, and I have only to deal with the second bond, which is dated December 2, 1868. It was signed at Cardenas, in Cuba, and given to cover two sums respectively of 378*l.* 3*s.* and 250*l.*, and with a bottomry premium of 30 per cent. on the former sum, and amounts to the sum of 741*l.* 12*s.*; but the sum of 250*l.* has been withdrawn from the claim by the counsel for the bondholder, on the ground that it was originally advanced on the security of the freight; so that the claim of the bondholder in this Court is limited to the principal sum of 378*l.* 3*s.*, and the bottomry premium of 113*l.* 9*s.* The owner of the "Panama," Mr. Fincham, does not dispute the validity of the bond, but he has been examined as a witness by the defendant. The bond was entered into by the master, who was Fincham's son-in-law; the owner is insolvent, and was so at the time when the bond was given. A first mortgagee, Mr. Stewart, appears to contest the validity of the bond. And it is important to observe that the bondholders held a second mortgage on the vessel. The bond does not affect the cargo, and according to the finding of the Registrar, with which I agree, the expenses which the bond was given to cover were quite proper; the owner, as I have said, was insolvent, and the master had no credit, and the recourse to a bottomry bond appears to have been a matter of necessity: the time which it takes to write a letter from Cuba to Liverpool and obtain an answer is six weeks in the ordinary course of post. The master has not been produced as a witness by either party.

The facts which I have thus stated are not disputed; I will now consider more closely those which relate to the execution of the bond. On August 23, 1868, the "Panama" left Cardenas, and arrived at Trinidad de Cuba in September, and took on board a cargo of mahogany and cedar, the freight on which, it appears, would amount to 1,100*l.* or 1,200*l.* On October 12, 1868, the "Panama" left Trinidad de Cuba for London, but having suffered injury from tempestuous weather she put into Cardenas. She was surveyed on November 6; the master applied to the agents of Messrs. Finlay & Co., which latter gentlemen were the agents of Messrs. Barron & Harrison, for an advance of money, which was refused. He then went to Havannah and attempted to obtain the money from Messrs. Finlay & Co. themselves; he was again refused, and returned to Cardenas. It appears that he then applied to the owners of the cargo for money, and on their refusal, threatened to sell a portion of the cargo. The master had for some time been distrusted, both by Barron and Harrison, and it should also seem by Fincham, the owner; and Messrs. Finlay & Co. taking alarm at this threat to sell a portion of the cargo, resolved to get rid of him; and on November 24 telegraphed to Barron & Harrison in the following words: "'Panama' wants two hundred pounds to clear, also a hundred and sixty claimed by Mantle for wages; are ready to advance all, but he must leave vessel to captain appointed by consul. See owner, answer." To this Messrs. Barron & Harrison answer also by telegram, on the 25th of the same month: "Do best our interest, appoint new master, secure advance bottomry." On receipt of this telegram Messrs. Finlay & Co., with the assistance of the British consul at Havannah, remove the master, Captain Mantle, and put another master in his place; but before Captain Mantle leaves they get him to sign the bottomry bond which is the one in dispute in this case. At the time when Mr. Barron telegraphed back this answer, he was resident in Liverpool. Mr. Fincham, the owner, resided in that town or close to it, and continually attended at an office in the town. Of this fact Mr. Barron was perfectly aware; he was also perfectly aware that Mr. Stewart was first mortgagee of the vessel, and resided in Liverpool. Mr. Barron had no communication whatever with the owner upon the subject of this bottomry bond, and the question arises whether in all these circumstances he had a right to instruct the master, through his agents, to bottomry the ship as a security for his, the bondholder's, advance of money. It is not necessary to assert as a proposition of law, that in all cases the bondholder, or even the master, must communicate with his owner before a bottomry bond be entered into; or that it is necessary that the bondholder should communicate with the first mortgagee. Neither of these propositions is required to sustain the judgment which I am about to pronounce, and which is confined to the particular facts and circumstances of this case. Having regard to them, I think there was a duty incumbent upon the bondholder of communicating with the owner before the bond was entered into, and that this duty was not taken away by the fact that the owner was insolvent, a point which was much pressed upon me by the counsel for the bondholder. For the owner might have thought it expedient to endeavour to raise the money, either through his creditors, or from the first mortgagee, who was close at hand, or from some other source; and I cannot lay out of my consideration the fact that by this bond the second mortgagee, who is the lender, does practically render the vessel liable to pay a premium of 30*l.* per cent. before the first mortgagee can be satisfied.

I pronounce against the validity of this bond, with costs.

Damage to Cargo—Exceptions in the Bill of Lading—Negligence of Master and Crew.

SHIPPING.—A cargo of nuts, stowed before the bill of lading was signed, was subsequently damaged in the course of the voyage by the carelessness of the master and crew, and the bill of lading provided against liability for their negligence:—Held, that the shipowner was not liable for the damage.

This was a SPECIAL CASE, the facts of which were as follows: On or about July 10, 1868, Messrs. Carey Brothers & Co., of Tarragona, in Spain, as agents for Samuel Hanson and Reginald Hanson, trading under the name or style of Samuel Hanson & Son, of No. 47, Botolph Lane, in the city of London, fruit-merchants, the plaintiffs in this cause, delivered to Messrs. P. M. Tintare, of Barcelona, in Spain, the owners of the steamship "Duero," 180 bags of Barcelona nuts, the property of the plaintiffs, to be carried from Tarragona to London on board the above-named steamship "Duero," then lying in the port of Tarragona, for reward to the defendants in that behalf, upon the terms of a bill of lading. The said goods were when shipped as aforesaid in good order and condition. The said steamship subsequently proceeded on her voyage to London, where she arrived on or about August 6, 1868, when the said goods were delivered to the plaintiffs. The said goods were delivered to the plaintiffs as aforesaid in a damaged condition, such damaged condition having been occasioned by the negligence and default of the master and mariners of the said vessel in and about stowing the goods on board of her.

The question for the opinion of the Court on this special case was, "whether the defendants are protected from liability by the terms of the bill of lading. If the Court should be of opinion that the defendants were protected from liability, then judgment should be entered for the defendants, and the plaintiffs condemned in the costs of all the proceedings in this cause. If the Court should be of the contrary opinion, then the defendants should be condemned in such amount of damages as may be agreed to by the parties, or shall be ascertained by the registrar and merchants in case the parties cannot agree together, with the costs of all the proceedings in the cause."

At the hearing, some little difficulty arose on the construction of the terms of the 4th and 5th articles of the agreement, and it was added to by the following paragraph:—"Admitted by both parties that in the ordinary course mate's receipts were given for goods on shipment, and subsequently the bill of lading substituted for it; that the goods were stowed before the bill of lading was given, but after mate's receipts; and that the damage occurred after delivery of the bill of lading, and in the course of the voyage. The action was for damage occasioned by the facts stated in the case."

Butt, for the plaintiffs.—The cause of the damage was the improper stowage, which took place before the bill of lading was signed, and therefore the exceptions in the bill of lading do not apply. If they do, the damage was caused by the negligence or default of the master and crew, and a contract that would supersede the necessity of due diligence on the part of carriers is in itself unlawful.

Cohen, for the defendants.—If this contract is good and binding the defendants are not liable; and a contract is valid unless it is tainted with fraud, or is illegal, or contrary to public policy, or self-repugnant. Even if the defendants were common carriers they would not be liable. Nothing but a statutory enactment would prevent a special contract with a common carrier from being binding, even where the special contract professes to exempt the carrier from liability for the negligence of his servants—Peek v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (32 L. J. Q.B. 241; 10 H.L. C. 473); Austen v. the Manchester Railway Company (10 Com. B. Rep. 454; 21 L. J. C.P. 179; 16 Q.B. 600; 20 L. J. Q.B. 440); and Carr v. the Lancashire Railway Company (7 Ex. 707; 21 L. J. Ex. 261). Nor is there anything unreasonable in the condition, though it may be one requiring special words—The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company v. Shand (3 Moore P.C. 272); Grill v. the General Iron Screw Colliery Company (37 L. J. C.P. 205). Dixon v. Sadler (5 Mee. & W. 405; 9 L. J. Ex. 48) is distinguishable from this case. But the defendants are not common carriers—Parsons on Shipping, 246, and the cases there cited; Kay v. Wheeler (37 L. J. C.P. 181).

Butt, in reply.

On July 30 judgment was given as follows:—

Sir R. J. Phillimore.—The true question appears to the Court to be in this case—what was the contract between the parties? Now, the contract between the parties was to deliver these nuts in proper condition. The bill of lading says, 180 regular bags of hazel nuts were to be delivered at the port of London, with the usual exceptions, in good condition by the vessel. It then says that "the vessel is not answerable for any discrepancy between the contents of the packages and description of the same in the bills of lading; the goods to be discharged from the ship twenty-four hours after she is ready to unload;" and, further, that "the shippers are to be accountable for any loss or damage which may arise from the contents of the packages being wrongly described," and so on. The usual perils are excepted—"the act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates or robbers;" and then there is this peculiar exception—"and the ship not being liable to make good loss from any of the causes above excepted." The causes "above excepted" are "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates or robbers, restraint of princes or rulers, fire at sea or on shore, accidents from machinery, boilers, steam, or from other goods by contact, sweating, leakage, or otherwise; barratry, negligence or default of master, pilot or mariners, or others performing their duties; vermin, jettison, and also accidents of navigation of every kind, excepted; and the ship not being liable to make good loss from any of the causes above excepted." That was the contract. It has been contended that the mischief done to this peculiar cargo was occasioned by the stowing, though the damage, it is admitted in the case, occurred after the vessel was in the course of navigation; and it has also been urged that this bill of lading being subsequent to the stowing, it could not relieve the shipowners from the obligations which they were under, as carriers, to repair the mischief done by improper stowage of the goods. It was not exactly contended that there were two contracts in this case, but it was insisted that the bill of lading did not cover the injury arising from the stowage, which act of stowage took place before the bill of lading was granted. In the opinion of the Court, the contract in this case is to be found in the bill of lading alone, and I must consider that as the written expression of the obligation of the parties.—[His Lordship then referred to the cases of Redhead v. the Midland Railway Company (8 B. & S. 377; 36 L. J. Q.B. 181) and Kay v. Wheeler (37 L. J. C.P. 181), and said:]—These two cases appear to me to strengthen the conclusion at which I have arrived, viz., that I have only to look at the bill of lading as the expression of the true contract existing between the parties, and to consider whether the delivery of these goods in a different condition from that in which they were originally placed on board does, or does not, fall within the excepted perils mentioned in that bill of lading. It has been contended, amongst other objections for the plaintiffs, that this contract was in itself unlawful, inasmuch as it professed to provide against due care being bestowed by the carrier upon the goods which he undertook to convey. I must observe that it has not been proved to me that a shipowner is in the category of a common carrier, and that he is bound as a common carrier would be bound, under the liability of an action being brought against him, to carry goods generally; but, even if it were so, according to the principles of the decisions affecting this part of the case, it appears to me it is competent to the common carrier to exempt himself from liability. Assuming, as I do for the sake of argument, that the shipowner was in the category of a common carrier, still it would be competent to him, under the authority of the decisions in Philips v. Clark (2 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 156; 9 L. J. C.P. 167) and The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company v. Shand (3 Moore P.C. 272), to have protected himself from liability by such a bill of lading as this—at all events, if not to have protected himself from his own personal negligence, still to protect himself from the negligence of the servants whom he employed. It must also be observed, that it must be presumed that this bill of lading was accepted deliberately by the plaintiffs, though it was, of course, competent to them to have refused so to accept it. The contract does not appear to me in itself to have been unreasonable. I am not aware what the circumstances are relating to the carriage of these goods, but it is perfectly possible that, in return for the exemption from liability, there might have been a demand for less freight; and it is perfectly clear and well established, I think, by the argument of Mr. Cohen, that the consignor of these goods might protect himself by insuring against the liability which the shipowner declined, so that, in fact, there would, practically speaking, be a transfer of liability from the shipowner to the underwriter. That the underwriter can insure against the negligence of the master is, I think, placed beyond doubt by the case of Dixon v. Sadler (5 Mee. & W. 405; 9 L. J. Ex. 48). I merely refer to this case to shew, what perhaps there is no dispute about, that it was quite competent to the consignor to have insured himself against the negligence of the master. It was suggested that this was a case in which, possibly, the Spanish law might be applicable, because it appeared that the goods were shipped and the contract was entered into at Tarragona, and it had not been shewn by the plaintiffs that this was a contract which it was lawful to enter into according to Spanish law, which was the lex loci contractus. But, in answer to that, I think it is enough to say, that if the defendants had that defence to make, it was their duty to have established it, like any other fact, by proper evidence. I have no doubt whatever that those who rely upon the difference between the foreign law and the law of the forum in which the case is brought are bound to establish that difference by competent evidence; and no such evidence has been brought before me on the present occasion. I pronounce the defence to be sufficient; and the petition must be dismissed with costs, it having been established that the damage done to the goods came within the excepted perils of the bill of lading.

Digitized by Google

Church Discipline Act — Rubric, Construction of — Holy Communion — Standing and Kneeling—Lighted Candles—Ceremonies—Ornaments.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—In a proceeding, under the Church Discipline Act, the respondent, a clerk in orders, was charged with having, during the Prayer of Consecration in the Order of the Administration of the Holy Communion, knelt or prostrated himself before the consecrated elements, and also with using lighted candles on the communion-table during the celebration of the Holy Communion, when such candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light: —Held, first, that the priest is intended by the Rubric to continue in one posture during the Prayer of Consecration, and not to change from standing to kneeling, or vice versa; and that the priest is intended to stand, and not kneel; and that the respondent, by the change of posture during the prayer, violated the Rubric, and committed an offence within the meaning of the 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 4, ss. 2, Thirdly, that lighted candles are not ornaments within the meaning of the Rubric, not being prescribed in the first Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth.*

This was an appeal from certain portions of a decree or sentence of the Right Hon. Sir R. J. Phillimore, Official Principal of the Arches Court of Canterbury, delivered on May 28, 1868, in the case of the office of Judge promoted by the appellant.

The respondent, the Rev. Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, was a clerk in holy orders in the Church of England, and the incumbent of the parish of St. Alban's, Holborn, in the diocese of London.

The letters of request stated that the respondent was charged, on the complaint of the appellant, with having, within the diocese of London, and within two years last past, offended against the laws ecclesiastical—

1st, By the elevation of the paten during or after the Prayer of Consecration in the Order of the Administration of the Holy Communion in his said parish church, in a greater degree and otherwise than by merely taking the same into his hands, as prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer, and in a greater degree than is necessary in order to conform with the requirements of such book, and by permitting and sanctioning such elevation; and by taking into his hands and elevating the cup during or after the Prayer of Consecration aforesaid, contrary to the said Book of Common Prayer, and by permitting and sanctioning such taking and elevating; and by bowing, kneeling or prostrating himself before the consecrated elements during or after the Prayer of Consecration.

2nd, By using lighted candles on the communion-table of the said church of his said parish during the celebration of the Holy Communion, at times when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light, and by permitting and sanctioning such use of lighted candles.

The respondent was cited to appear to answer certain articles, &c., to be administered to him, for having, within two years then last past, offended against the laws ecclesiastical in the particulars set forth in the said letters of request.

The respondent appeared to the citation. The articles stated:—

1st. That, by an act of parliament passed in a session of parliament holden in the first year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, c. 2; and by another act of parliament passed in a session of parliament holden in the 13th and 14th years of the reign of King Charles the Second, c. 4; and by another act of parliament passed in a session of parliament holden in the 28th and 29th years of the Queen, c. 122; and by the 14th, 36th, and 38th of the Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical treated upon by the Bishop of London, President of the Convocation for the province of Canterbury, and the rest of the bishops and clergy of the said province, and agreed upon with the licence of his Majesty King James the First, in their synod begun at London in the year of our Lord 1603, and ratified by his said Majesty's letters patent under the great seal of England—all clerks and ministers in holy orders are, among other things, bound to say and use the Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, according to the use of the United Church of England and Ireland; that any clerk or minister in holy orders offending against the said statute, law, constitutions and canons ought to be punished according to the gravity of his offence and the exigency of the law.

2nd. That Alexander Heriot Mackonochie (the respondent) was and is now a clerk in holy orders of the United Church of England and Ireland, and was, during the entire of the year 1866, the lawful incumbent and perpetual curate of the said parish or ecclesiastical district.

3rd. That the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie has, in his said church, and within two years last past (to wit, on Sunday, December 23, on Christmas Day last past, and on Sunday, December 30, all in the year of our Lord 1866), during the Prayer of Consecration in the Order of the Administration of the Holy Communion, elevated the paten above his head, and permitted and sanctioned such elevation, and taken into his hands the cup, and elevated it above his head during the Prayer of Consecration aforesaid, and permitted and sanctioned the cup to be so taken and elevated; and knelt or prostrated himself before the consecrated elements during the Prayer of Consecration, and permitted and sanctioned such kneeling or prostrating by other clerks in holy orders.

4th. That such elevation of the paten, and such taking and elevation of the cup, and such kneeling and prostrating, are severally unlawful additions to and variations from the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said statutes, and by the said Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, and contrary to the said statutes, and to the 14th, 36th and 38th of the said constitutions and canons, and also to an act of parliament passed in a session of parliament holden in the 13th year of Queen Elizabeth, c. 12, and to the 25th and 28th of the Articles of Religion therein referred to.

5th. That the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie has, in his said church, and within two years last past, to wit, on Sunday, December 23, on Christmas Day last past, and on Sunday, December 30, all in the year of our Lord 1866, and on Sunday, January 13, in the year of our Lord 1867, used lighted candles on the communion-table during the celebration of the Holy Communion, at times when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light, and permitted and sanctioned such use of lighted candles.

6th. That the use of such lighted candles is an unlawful addition to and variation from the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said statutes, and by the said Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, and is contrary to the said statutes, and to the 14th, 36th and 38th of the said constitutions and canons.

The articles also alleged and propounded that the respondent had offended against the said statutes and constitutions and canons ecclesiastical in certain other particulars, specified in the said letters of request and decree or citation, namely, by the use of incense for censing persons and things, and by the unlawful use of incense in and during the celebration of the Holy Communion; and by mixing water with the wine during the administration of the Holy Communion. And the promoter prayed that on due proof of the premises the said Court of Arches would be pleased to pronounce that the respondent had offended against the statute law and the said constitutions and canons in the particular matters alleged, to admonish the respondent from so offending in future, and to condemn him in the costs.

On June 28, 1867, the respondent, by way of responsive plea, alleged, amongst other things, as follows:

3rd. To the said 3rd article, that the same is in part untruly pleaded; for the party proponent alleges that whilst he admits that the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie did on the said two Sundays, and on Christmas Day, during the Prayer of Consecration, kneel, and sanction the kneeling by other clerks, before the Lord's Table, he denies that his said party did, on the said two Sundays, and on the said Christmas Day, kneel or prostrate himself before the consecrated elements, or permit and sanction such kneeling or prostration by other clerks in holy orders, as in the said article pleaded. And he further alleges that whilst he admits that he did on the said two Sundays and Christmas Day, in the said 3rd article mentioned, elevate, and sanction the elevation by other clerks, of the paten and cup above his head, as in the said 3rd article pleaded, yet that such elevation of the paten and cup has been wholly discontinued by the said

Alexander Heriot Mackonochie during the administration of the Holy Communion ever since the said December 30, 1866, and long prior to the institution of this suit. That such practice was discontinued in consequence of legal advice, and in compliance with the expressed wish of the lord bishop of the diocese of London, and with a resolution of Convocation, as was well known to the promoter of this suit before he instituted the same.

4th. That he denies that the elevation of the paten, and the taking and elevation of the cup, so discontinued as aforesaid, and the kneeling and prostrating charged in the said 3rd article, are severally unlawful additions to and variations from the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said statutes, and by the said Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, or that they are contrary to the said statutes, and to the 14th, 36th and 38th of the said constitutions and canons, and also to an act of parliament passed in the session of parliament holden in the 13th year of Queen Elizabeth, c. 12, and to the 25th and 28th Articles of Religion therein referred to, as in the fourth article alleged.

5th. That the 5th article is in part untruly pleaded; for the party proponent alleges that on the said three Sundays and Christmas Day, in the said 5th article mentioned, the said lighted candles were not placed on the communion-table, but upon a narrow movable ledge of wood resting on the said table, and that the said candles were so placed and kept lighted, not during the celebration of the Holy Communion only, as falsely suggested in the said 5th article, but also during the whole of the reading of the Communion service, including the Epistle and Gospel, and during the singing after the reading of the Nicene Creed, and during the delivery of the sermon.

6th. That he denies that the use of such lighted candles is an unlawful addition to and variation from the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said statutes, and by the said Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, and is contrary to the said statutes, and to the 14th, 36th and 38th of the said constitutions and canons, as in the 6th article alleged.

A similar denial was given by the responsive plea to the other alleged offences committed by the respondent. And further, it was alleged that as to the use of incense for censing persons and things, the respondent had desisted from and discontinued such usage, and had never since re-introduced the said ceremony.

The cause came on for hearing, and certain oral evidence was adduced on the part of the promoter, and the arguments of the counsel, both for the promoter and for the defendant were heard.

On March 28, 1868, the learned Judge pronounced and decreed that the respondent had, in certain of the particulars contained in the said articles, offended against the statutes, laws, constitutions and canons of the Church of England; and the learned Judge, by his interlocutory decree, monished the respondent to abstain for the future from the elevation of the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion, and also from the use of incense, and from mixing water with the wine during the administration of the said Holy Communion, as pleaded in the said articles, but declined to monish him in respect of the practice of kneeling or prostration, or in respect of the use of lighted candles, and declined to give costs.

Against so much of the decree as declined to monish the respondent or to give costs, the promoter appealed.

The case in the Court below will be found reported in 37 L. J. Ecc. 17.

A. J. Stephens and Archibald (Coleridge, Traill and Droop with them), for the appellant.—The only questions raised by this appeal are, first, as to the officiating minister kneeling down or prostrating himself before the consecrated elements at particular periods in the Prayer of Consecration; secondly, as to the use of lighted candles on the communion-table at the celebration of the Holy Communion when not required for the purpose of giving light. Uniformity in the performance of divine worship has ever since the Reformation been one of the leading principles of the Church of England. The Acts of Uniformity, passed in the reigns of Edward the Sixth, Elizabeth, and Charles the Second, were all passed with this object. The principal statute is that of Charles the Second (13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 4). The 24th section of that act refers to "certain laws and statutes for the uniformity of prayer and the administration of the sacraments." Amongst these laws is the 14th of the Canons of 1603, which provides that all ministers shall observe the orders, rites and ceremonies prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, without either diminishing or adding anything in matter or form. This Canon is as explicit against any addition as against any diminution. The statute 1 Eliz. c. 2, by section 3, enacts, that all ministers, &c., shall be bounden to say or use the Matins, Evensong and Celebration of the Lord's Supper, in such order and form as is mentioned in the book authorized by Parliament in the 5th and 6th years of Edward the Sixth; and section 4, enacts, that if any minister refuse to use such Common Prayer, or shall wilfully use any other rite, ceremony, order or form of celebrating the Lord's Supper, he shall be liable to certain penalties therein enacted. These are the principal statutory provisions as to uniformity. The first decision on this subject which we find in the Courts is the case of Newbery v. Goodwin (1 Phill. 282), which was a proceeding against a clergyman for omitting passages in the Lessons. In delivering judgment Sir J. Nichol says, "The law directs that a clergyman is not to diminish in any respect or to add to the prescribed form of worship. Uniformity in this respect is one of the leading and distinguishing principles of the Church of England. Nothing is left to the discretion and fancy of the individual. If every minister were to alter, omit, or add according to his own taste, this uniformity would soon be destroyed." In Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Special Report, 187) the Judicial Committee said, "In the performance of the services, rites and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed: that no omission and no addition can be permitted." Throughout the Communion Service there are at intervals directions as to the attitudes which are to be assumed by the officiating minister: first, when he is to stand; secondly, when he is to kneel; thirdly, when he is to turn to the people, and when to the communion-table. When the Rubric directs the minister to take one posture it is intended and assumed that he is to remain in that posture until he is ordered to change it. The standing and kneeling of the priest, and his turning to the people, and to the communion-table, constitute parts of the order and form of service, which is to be used without any addition, omission or alteration. This construction of the Rubrics in the Communion office agrees with what L'Estrange and Wheatley say upon the subject[1]. There can be no doubt as to what was intended by the prostration. In the Roman Liturgy (Maskell's Ancient Liturgies, 93), it is said, "Hostiam consecratam genuflexus adorat, surgit, ostendit populo." The Reformers by introducing the word "standing" did so for the express purpose of excluding adoration of any presence in the elements. The kneeling was accompanied by elevation: and what is the elevation for? Why, according to Lyndwood, "Ut populus illud adoret." Then, as elevation is accompanied with kneeling, may not the object of kneeling be shewn by the elevation?

[LORD WESTBURY.—You may say, "Res ipsa loquitur."]

Then it is said by the learned Judge in the Court below that if the respondent has committed any error in respect of excessive kneeling, it is a matter rather to be brought before the bishop than for a criminal prosecution. The Book of Common Prayer provides, that if doubts arise in the use of the service, for the resolution of such doubts, the parties who so doubt shall always resort to the bishop. The bishop's power under this Rubric is to remove doubts. It can therefore only refer to determining which of two possible ways the things prescribed by the Prayer Book are to be done. But the Prayer Book is quite clear upon these directions. It is therefore not a matter of doubt referable to the bishop under the Rubric.

Then as to the use of lighted candles. No doubt, if they are used for the purpose of giving light they are lawful, and there can be no possible objection to their use for such purpose. But if they are used for a symbolical purpose, if they are to signify that "Christ is the very true light of the world," they are part of the service, and are an addition to it which is forbidden. Candles are not mentioned in any of Edward's Prayer Books. From the time of the first Act of Uniformity all the rubrics relating to uniformity have been construed to prohibit any addition to the Prayer Book. Bishop Ridley, in his Injunctions on the visitation of the diocese of London, directs as follows: "Finally, that the minister in time of the Holy Communion do use only the ceremonies and gestures appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, and none other" (1 Cardwell's Annals, 93). The Visitation Articles of Archbishops Parker, Grindal, Laud, Andrews, Bancroft and Abbott, are to the same effect (2nd Report of Ritual Commission, 59). The inquiry of Bishop Cosins, in 1662, agrees in this (2nd Report of Ritual Commission, 61). The same may be said of the letter of Archbishop Skelton, in 1670. In the Visitation Articles of Archbishop Sancroft, in the reign of James the Second, he puts the question, "Doth your parson, &c., perform all ministerial offices and duties in such manner and form as is prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer?" It was decided in the Court below that lighted candles are lawful by reason of a certain Injunction of 1547 in the reign of Edward the Sixth, which proceeds as follows: "and shall suffer from henceforth no torches nor candles, tapers or images of wax to be set afore any image or picture, but only two lights upon the high altar, which, for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world, they shall suffer to remain thereon." The learned Judge identifies these two lights with the Constitution of Archbishop Reynolds: "Tempore quo missarum solennia peraguntur accendantur duæ candelæ, vel ad minus una" (Lyndwood, 236). This Canon dates from 1322. Neither the Injunction of Edward the Sixth nor the Canon are now of any force, because there is no such thing as an altar in the Church of England—Faulkner v. Lichfield (1 Robert. Ecc. C. 184). There is a fundamental distinction between a communion-table and an altar, between the Communion Service and the Mass. In Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Special Report, 187) this Committee attach great importance to the difference between a communion-table and an altar. The same principles were applied in Parker v. Leach (4 Moore, N.S. 80; 36 L. J. P.C. 26). It is impossible to deduce from the Injunction of Edward the Sixth, as to how High Mass is to be celebrated, any conclusion as to the celebration of the Holy Communion in a Protestant church. The practice of using lighted candles was confined to the first four years of Elizabeth's reign (1 Zurich Letters, 122, 129). It is clear from the language of Dr. Donne, referred to in the Court below, that the Lutheran Church, which did use lights, differed from the English Church, which did not use them. The Injunction of Edward the Sixth as to lights is not within the Rubric respecting ornaments. The Rubric respecting ornaments refers only to those in use, which are prescribed by the first Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth. Even assuming that there was authority to issue the Injunction of Edward the Sixth, the Injunction is repealed by the Act of Uniformity of Elizabeth. If candles are lawful as an ornament of the church, that would not justify their use as a ceremony. There is no trace of candlesticks being left for the use of the Church in any of the Prayer Books issued in the reign of Edward the Sixth. It is said that Elizabeth had lights in her private chapel. If such lights were in use, they were not consistent with law. They referred to the Zurich Letters, vol. i. p. 63, and to Strype's Memorials of the Reformation.

Upon the question of "ornaments" effect must be given to every word in the Rubric, to the word "retained" as well as to the words "be in use." The Rubric speaks from its date, 1662, and consequently it sanctions no ornament which was not actually and generally in use in 1662, and which was not also in use in the second year of Edward the Sixth. It is clear that lights were not in general use. If the use of lights burning at the Communion be a ceremony then they would be prohibited by the Statute of Elizabeth, which prohibited the use of any other ceremony than those prescribed in the Prayer Book. So that, either as ornaments or as a ceremony, they are prohibited by the Act of Uniformity and by the Prayer Book.

W. M. James and Deane (Prideaux, Tristram and Charles with them), for the respondent.—No offence against the laws ecclesiastical is sufficiently alleged in the letters of request. This is a criminal proceeding, it is therefore one which must be laid with the utmost certainty and precision, in order that the jurisdiction of the Court, which is a limited jurisdiction, should be shewn. The defendant must be put in full possession of the facts upon which the charge depends. With respect to the charge of prostrating or kneeling, the charge is not laid with sufficient precision. The Arches Court had no jurisdiction in the matter, except by virtue of the letters of request.

[LORD CHELMSFORD.—Any objection to the jurisdiction must be taken at the earliest period possible. If the party submit, it is too late to take any objection.]

Now the letters of request charge "the bowing, kneeling or prostrating himself before the consecrated elements during the Prayer of Consecration." It is impossible to define the charge which the defendant has to meet from these words. It is not said that the respondent was the celebrant at the time. It does not even say that he was one of the officiating ministers. The charge is therefore not laid with sufficient precision—Francis v. Steward (5 Q.B. Rep. 984), Breeks v. Woolfrey (1 Curt. 880), and The King v. Sparkes (2 Showler, 447).

[LORD CAIRNS referred to Flamank v. Simpson (4 Moore's N.S. 385; 36 L. J. Ecc. 4).]

In that case we got into difficulties by not opposing the articles as we should have done. The officiating priest is directed to stand before the table. Is the word "standing" to be carried to the end of the Prayer of Consecration? The Rubric says, "Then shall the minister first receive the communion in both kinds himself." Is he to receive it standing or kneeling? In common usage he does receive it kneeling. The Rubric says "all meekly kneeling"; but the officiating clergy cannot administer kneeling. There is no direction throughout as to the attitude of the priest. It is said that the minister is to stand till he is told to kneel, but this is inconsistent with the letter of the Rubric. This charge was never meant to be simply a charge of kneeling, as is now alleged. It was a kneeling as part of the elevation. It is not a separate charge of kneeling; but a kneeling in aggravation of the elevation. There are difficulties as to the meaning of the Rubrics. There is sufficient doubt to render it unsafe to convict a clergyman for that which at most only amounts to a misunderstanding of the Rubric. There is no adoration in the mere act of kneeling. The Rubric is not exhaustive in its directions. There are many usages which are universal which are not directed by the Rubric. It is the practice to pause after the Prayer for all Sick Persons in the Litany, but there is no direction as to this in the Rubric. The kneeling has been said to be a ceremony, but it is distinctly no ceremony. The words "rite" and "ceremony" have a very technical meaning.

[SIR W. ERLE.—Is there any definition of a "rite" and a "ceremony"? I think not.]

It is said that the kneeling is taken from the Romish Missal, but this is not so. It is taken from the Black Rubric. The kneeling was a natural act, and it is an act which the Rubric has left ambiguous. The Rubric is silent; it is therefore a matter for the discretion of the minister.

With respect to lights it is contended that the words "retained" and "be in use" have a meaning which at first sight they do not bear. It is a very forced and strained argument. The words are "such ornaments of the church shall be retained and be in use as were in the Church of England." These words must mean, "you shall retain and you shall use that which was in the Church of England at a specified time." Then it is said that the question of ornaments depends on the Acts of Uniformity, Canons and Rubrics, and does not depend upon historical inquiry; but if we are to see what ornaments were in use at a specified time, it must result in an historical inquiry. If the argument for the appellant be sound, then all the Popish ornaments which had been restored in Mary's reign are to be retained. The historical argument is irresistible. This was the argument used in the Savoy Conference. Then it is said: What authority is there for the use of lighted candles on the communion-table? There is the authority of usage from the earliest time. Ever since the year 1100 two lighted candles were in use on the communion-table. The first mention however of these candles is in the fourteenth century in a constitution by Archbishop Reynolds (2nd Report of Ritual Commission, 59). It is as follows: "Tempore quo missarum solennia peraguntur accendantur duæ candelæ, vel ad minus una." Every word of this is material. "Dum" peraguntur "accendantur." The next mention of these two candles is in the Injunctions of the 1 Edw. 6. The 3rd of these Injunctions provides as follows: "That such images as they know in any of their cures to be or have been so abused with pilgrimage or offerings of anything made thereunto, or shall be hereafter censed unto, they (and none other private persons) shall, for the avoiding of idolatry, forthwith take down, or cause to be taken down, and destroy the same, and shall suffer from henceforth no torches nor candles, tapers or images of wax, to be set afore any image or picture, but only two lights upon the high altar before the sacrament, which for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world they shall suffer to remain still." In the articles of inquiry at the visitation to be held in the diocese of Canterbury in 2 Edw. 6. the following item of inquiry appears: "Whether they suffer any torches, candles, tapers or other lights to be in your churches, but only two lights upon the high altar." It is to be observed that Cranmer was Archbishop of Canterbury at the time of this visitation of the diocese of Canterbury. Down to the year of the Act of Uniformity and to the publishing of the Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth, by tradition, by usage and by injunction, every minister of every church had been in the habit of using these two lights. The Prayer Book and the Act of Uniformity are silent as to these two lights. All which was not expressly abolished remains. But there is much upon which the Prayer Book is silent. How was the minister to act? Was he to suppose that everything which had existed by tradition, usage and injunction was abolished? The Rubric gives no direction as to the covering of the holy table at the time of the celebration of the Holy Communion. This can only be accounted for by reason that it was unncessary to prescribe that which was in general use, and consequently the Prayer Book is silent as to the use of candles. It has been said that Edward the Sixth had no power to issue these Injunctions. But the Act of Supremacy (26 Hen. 8. c. 1.) provides that the King shall be the head of the Church, and, as such, he and his successors would have power to issue injunctions for the government of the Church. But assuming the Injunctions of Edward the Sixth be not in operation then the Submission of Clergy Act (25 Hen. 8. c. 19.) provides for the use of all canons, statutes and ordinances which are not repugnant to the law of the realm. This point was considered in Middleton v. Croft (2 Atk. 650), Cawdrie's case (3 Rep. 15), and in The Bishop of Exeter v. Marshall (37 L. J. C.P. 331). The Constitution of Archbishop Reynolds has never been repealed; it is therefore in force, and is not opposed to the supremacy of the Crown. There is, therefore, authority for the use of lights, even if the Injunctions of Edward the Sixth be not in operation. The candles are mere ornaments. They are not used as ceremonies. They are not the objects of superstitious reverence, and they have been in use from the earliest times. He referred to Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Special Report, 187). It is said that these two lights are the same as the two lights before the reserved Sacrament: but that cannot be so, because that was one light, usually a lamp. They referred to Keelling, Liturgiæ Britannicæ (Edit. 1850, pp. 216, 217).

A. J. Stephens, in reply.—As to the charge of kneeling, the substance of the objection is that the pleadings are not sufficiently precise on this point. I would refer to Prankard v. Deacle (1 Hag. Ecc. 169). There is an essential distinction between the case of Francis v. Steward (5 Q.B. Rep. 984) and this case. In that case the respondent appeared under protest, whereas in the present case the respondent appeared absolutely. These proceedings are taken under the 23rd section of Elizabeth, not under the 4th section by indictment. The Injunctions of 1547 relate to the service of the Mass, not to the Holy Communion. There is no altar in a Protestant country. If the Injunction of 1547 ever had any authority, it is repealed by section 27. of the act of Elizabeth.

Lord Cairns delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—The case of Martin v. Mackonochie, commenced before the Bishop of London, was, under the provisions of the Clergy Discipline Act, sent by the bishop to the Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury for trial in the first instance; and, having been fully heard before the Judge of the Arches Court, resulted in a decree made on March 28, 1868.

Mr. Mackonochie, the clerk in holy orders against whom these proceedings were directed, was charged with four offences against the laws ecclesiastical, viz.:

1. The elevation, during or after the Prayer of Consecration in the Order of the Administration of the Holy Communion, of the paten and cup; and the kneeling or prostrating himself before the consecrated elements; 2. Using lighted candles on the communion-table during the celebration of the Holy Communion, when such candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light; 3. Using incense in the celebration of the Holy Communion; 4. Mixing water with the wine used in the administration of the Holy Communion.

The learned Judge of the Arches Court by his decree sustained the 3rd and 4th of these charges, and admonished Mr. Mackonochie to abstain for the future from the use of incense, and from mixing water with the wine as pleaded in the articles. Against this part of the decree there is no appeal.

The second charge, as to lights, was not sustained, the learned Judge holding that it was lawful to place two lighted candles on the communion-table during the time of the Holy Communion. Against this the promoter has appealed.

As to the first charge Mr. Mackonochie, while admitting the elevation of the consecrated elements at the times and in the manner alleged, pleaded that he had discontinued the practice before the institution of the suit. The learned Judge therefore admonished Mr. Mackonochie not to recur to the practice: but as to the other part of the charge, namely, the kneeling and prostrating himself before the consecrated elements, the learned Judge held that if Mr. Mackonochie had committed any error in that respect, it was one which should not form the subject of a criminal prosecution, but should be referred to the bishop in order that he might exercise his discretion thereon.

The promoter appeals from the latter part of the decision of the learned Judge on this charge; and he also complains in his appeal that the defendant was not ordered to pay the costs of the suit.

The questions, thus raised by the appeal, were very fully and ably argued before this tribunal, and their Lordships have now to state their reasons for the advice which they propose humbly to offer to Her Majesty.

They will advert first to the charge of kneeling before the consecrated elements.

It is necessary to refer to the whole of the charge on this head as contained in the 3rd and 4th articles, although some of the acts charged are said to have been discontinued before the suit commenced.

These articles run thus.—[His Lordship read the 3rd article.]

Mr. Mackonochie's answer to these articles is as follows.—[His Lordship read the 3rd answer of the respondent.]

Before turning to the evidence in support of this charge, it will be proper to consider a preliminary objection which was taken to the articles, and to the letters of request and citation by which they were preceded.

It was said that although the articles alleged that the respondent "knelt or prostrated himself before the consecrated elements during the Prayer of Consecration," the letters of request and citation were for "bowing, kneeling or prostrating himself before the consecrated elements during or after the Prayer of Consecration." It was contended that the citation shewed no offence, for it might be taken, as in an indictment, in the sense most favourable to the accused, and as affirming nothing more than that he bowed after the Prayer of Consecration, which, it was said, would or might be innocent. And the articles, it was argued, by omitting this alternative, were a departure from the citation.

To this it might be sufficient to reply that the objection taken to this citation —a citation which, it is not disputed, does contain other charges cognizable by the Ecclesiastical Court—is an objection of a strictly technical character, and one which would be waived by the appearance of the respondent, as he did appear, without protest, and by praying for articles. But passing from this, it is to be observed that the supposed analogy between the citation and an indictment, on which this objection is founded, entirely fails. The Act of Uniformity, 1 Eliz. c. 2, contemplates two modes of procedure for enforcing its provisions: one by indictment, under section 4, and the other by process for admonition before the Ordinary under section 23; and it is under the latter and not the former section that the present proceedings are taken. Moreover, in the case of an indictment followed by judgment, the indictment and judgment become the record, and the judgment is read with reference to the indictment; and if the indictment is open to a construction which is innocent, and would not sustain a judgment, the judgment would be vicious, and must be arrested: whereas the citation is followed by articles, which in turn are met by a plea; and the Court, after hearing evidence, defines by its sentence how much of the charge it considers to be relevant, and to have been proved, and thereby corrects any excess of averment in the citation.

The preliminary objection, therefore, on this charge their Lordships feel themselves obliged to repel.

It is necessary now to examine the evidence adduced in support of the charge; and in doing this, and in considering the character of the charge itself, their Lordships will confine their attention to the conduct and acts of the respondent as the celebrating or consecrating minister. The allegations and proof as to "sanctioning and permitting other clerks" are so vague that no weight could be, and in the argument little weight was attempted to be, given to them.

The chief witness in support of the charge is Mr. Beames. He has not been cross-examined, and no evidence has been adduced for the respondent. The statement of Mr. Beames may therefore be taken to be uncontroverted. He speaks of December 23 and 25, 1866. On both of those occasions the respondent was the celebrant at the Communion Service. The effect of the answers of Mr. Beames may be stated to be, that the respondent commenced to read the Prayer of Consecration standing; that on reaching the words "the same night that He was betrayed," he elevated the paten above his head, returned it to its place on the communion-table, and then knelt on his knees towards the table, inclining or prostrating his head towards the ground; that he then rose and resumed the prayer; that when, in the further course of the prayer, he took the chalice, he elevated it above his head as he had done the paten, replaced it on the communion-table, and knelt or prostrated himself as before.

The elevation of the elements has, as already said, been discontinued, and as to the kneeling after the consecration of the chalice, it might possibly be suggested that it was a kneeling after finishing the Prayer of Consecration, and with reference to the next part of the service, in which the celebrant becomes himself the recipient. Omitting, therefore, for the present, the elevation and the second kneeling, the evidence remains that the respondent, after commencing the Prayer of Consecration standing, paused in the middle of the prayer, knelt down, inclining or prostrating his head towards the ground, and then, rising up again, continued the prayer standing.

In order to bring the conduct of the respondent on this head to the test of ecclesiastical law, it is proper now to turn to the Rubric of the Order of the Administration of the Holy Communion.

The Lord's Prayer and the Collect, with which the service commences, are to be said by the priest "standing at the north side of the table."

The priest is then to turn to the people and rehearse distinctly all the Ten Commandments, "the people still kneeling," implying that the priest is still to stand.

This is to be followed by one of the Collects for the Sovereign, "the priest standing as before," and by the Collect for the day.

The priest is then to read the Epistle and Gospel, and to say the Creed, during which no change of attitude is indicated.

After the sermon, when the priest has returned to the Lord's Table, the sentences of the offertory, the Prayer for the Church Militant, and the exhortations are to be "said" by the priest, without any direction as to change of posture; and then, at the confession, he, as well as all the people, is directed to kneel.

For the absolution and the sentences which follow the priest is directed to stand up, and to turn himself to the people. For the words "It is very meet," &c., and the Prefaces, he is to turn to the Lord's Table, and he is then to kneel down at the Lord's Table, and, in the name of all the recipients, say the prayer, "We do not presume," &c.

The Rubric before the Prayer of Consecration then follows, and is in these words:

"When the priest, standing before the table, hath so ordered the bread and wine that he may with the more readiness and decency break the bread before the people, and take the cup into his hands, he shall say the Prayer of Consecration, as follows."

Their Lordships entertain no doubt on the construction of this Rubric that the priest is intended to continue in one posture during the prayer, and not to change from standing to kneeling, or vice versa; and it appears to them equally certain that the priest is intended to stand and not to kneel. They think that the words "standing before the table" apply to the whole sentence; and they think this is made more apparent by the consideration that acts are to be done by the priest before the people as the prayer proceeds (such as taking the paten and chalice into his hands, breaking the bread, and laying his hand on the various vessels) which could only be done in the attitude of standing.

This being, in their Lordships' opinion, the proper construction of the Rubric, it is clear that the respondent, by the posture or change of posture which he has adopted during the prayer, has violated the Rubric, and committed an offence within the meaning of the 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4. ss. 2, 17, 24, taken in connexion with the 1 Eliz. c. 2, and punishable by admonition under section 23 of the latter statute.

It was contended, on behalf of the respondent, that the act complained of was one of those minute details which could not be taken to be covered by the provisions of the Rubric; that the Rubric could not be considered as exhaustive in its directions, for no order could be shewn in it requiring the celebrating minister to kneel while himself receiving the bread and wine; and that there was no charge or evidence against the respondent that in kneeling after the consecration any adoration of the sacrament was intended.

Their Lordships are of opinion that it is not open to a minister of the Church, or even to their Lordships in advising Her Majesty as the highest ecclesiastical tribunal of appeal, to draw a distinction, in acts which are a departure from or violation of the Rubric, between those which are important and those which appear to be trivial. The object of the Statute of Uniformity is, as its preamble expresses, to produce "an universal agreement in the public worship of Almighty God," an object which would be wholly frustrated if each minister, on his own view of the relative importance of the details of the service, were to be at liberty to omit, to add to, or to alter any of those details. The rule upon this subject has been already laid down by the Judicial Committee in Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Special Reports, 187) (and their Lordships are disposed entirely to adhere to it): "In the performance of the services, rites and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed; no omission and no addition can be permitted."

There would, indeed, be no difficulty in shewing that the posture of the celebrating minister during all the parts of the Communion Service was, and that for obvious reasons, deemed to be of no small importance in the changes introduced into the Prayer Book at and after the Reformation. The various stages of the service are, as has already been shewn, fenced and guarded by directions of the most exact kind, as to standing and kneeling, the former attitude being prescribed even for prayers, during which a direction to kneel might have been expected. And it is not immaterial to observe, that whereas in the first Prayer Book of King Edward the Sixth there was contained at the end a Rubric in these words—"As touching kneeling, crossing, holding up of hands, knocking upon the breast, and other gestures, they may be used or left, as every man's devotion serveth, without blame"—this Rubric was, in the second Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth, and in all the subsequent Prayer Books, omitted.

The argument against the completeness of the directions as to posture, derived from a supposed absence of any order that the celebrant shall kneel whilst himself receiving, does not appear to their Lordships to be well founded. In the Rubric as to the reception of the sacramental bread and wine, the words "all meekly kneeling" apply, as their Lordships think, to the celebrant, as well as to other clerks, and to the people. And this is made more clear by the Rubric termed the Black Rubric, added at the end of the service.

It is true, as was contended, that there is no charge against the respondent, that the kneeling complained of was intended as an act of adoration of the sacramental elements. Such a charge, involving as it would an inquiry into sentiments and feelings, of which no tribunal can adequately judge, would be difficult of proof; and the Rubrical enactments appear to have been wisely confined to prescribing an order of service free from those outward movements which had become more or less associated with errors in doctrine which, at the Reformation, were renounced. If this order is departed from, it is, as their Lordships think, unnecessary to inquire into the motive by which the departure has been occasioned.

Another argument urged on behalf of the respondent should also be noticed. Mr. James contended with great ability that the charge as to kneeling during the Prayer of Consecration was made in connexion with the charge as to the elevation of the sacrament, and that the charge of kneeling was only an aggravation of that of elevation, which had been discontinued. This, no doubt, is so; but the kneeling under the circumstances described, being itself, as their Lordships think it is, a violation of the Rubric, they do not think that the judgment of the Court should the less be passed upon it because the other part of the charge, namely, that as to the elevation, is no longer resisted.

It only remains, on this part of the case, to advert to the very learned and elaborate judgment of the Dean of the Arches. That learned Judge states that the Rubric does not give precise directions that the celebrant should kneel at the times when it appears that the respondent does kneel; that he is far from saying it is not legally competent to him to adopt this attitude of devotion; and that it cannot be contended that at some time or other he must not kneel during the celebration, although no directions as to his kneeling at all are given by the Rubric.

Their Lordships, however, think, as they read the Rubric, that directions as to the celebrant kneeling at a particular time of the celebration, namely, when he himself receives the sacrament, are given; and that at the time when it appears that the respondent kneels, namely, during the Prayer of Consecration, the directions in the Rubric are precise that he should stand and not kneel.

The learned Judge further observes that if Mr. Mackonochie has committed any error in this respect, it is one which should not form the subject of a criminal prosecution, but belongs to the category of cases which should be referred to the bishop. This category the learned Judge had previously defined to be—

"Things neither ordered nor prohibited expressly or by implication, but the doing or use of which must be governed by the living discretion of some person in authority."

And as to cases in this category, the learned Judge considered that, according to the Preface to the Prayer Book, "the parties that doubt or diversely take anything should always resort to the bishop of the diocese."

Their Lordships do not think it necessary to consider minutely the cases to which, or the manner in which, this direction in the Preface to the Prayer Book is applicable, inasmuch as in their opinion the charge against the respondent, with which they are now dealing, involves what is expressly ordered and prohibited by the Rubric, and is therefore a matter in which the bishop could have no jurisdiction to modify or dispense with the rubrical provisions.

On the whole, their Lordships are of opinion that the charge against the respondent of kneeling during the Prayer of Consecration has been sustained, and that he should be admonished, not only not to recur to the elevation of the paten and the cup as pleaded in the 3rd article, but also to abstain for the future from kneeling or prostrating himself before the consecrated elements during the Prayer of Consecration, as in the same article also pleaded.

The other charge involved in this appeal is that of using lighted candles on the communion-table during the celebration of the Holy Communion, when such candles are not wanted for the purpose of giving light.

This charge is contained in the 5th and 6th articles, which are as follows—[His Lordship read the 5th and 6th articles.]

The responsive plea of Mr. Mackonochie, on this head is as follows—[His Lordship read the 5th and 6th pleas.]

The facts, therefore, on this part of the case, appear to be that the respondent uses two lighted candles during, with reference to, and as an accompaniment of, the Communion Service, and not for the ordinary purpose of giving light, and that these candles are placed on a ledge of wood which is placed on the communion-table.

The Dean of the Arches seems to have considered that all the practices complained of before him, including this use of lighted candles, were ceremonies. The respondent, in the argument of his counsel at the bar, appeared to prefer to treat the question as one of ornament, and Mr. James said he considered the lighted candles "part of the symbolical decoration of the altar."

If it were necessary to decide which of these views is correct, their Lordships would feel disposed to agree with the Dean of the Arches, that however candles and candlesticks may per se be looked upon as a part of the furniture or ornaments of the church, taking the word "ornaments" in the larger sense assigned to it by this Committee in Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Special Reports, 187), yet the lighting of the candles, and the consuming them by burning throughout, and with reference to a service in which they are to act as symbols and illustrations, is itself either a ceremony, or else a ceremonial act forming part of a ceremony, and making the whole ceremony a different one from what it would have been had the lights been omitted.

The Council of Trent (22nd Session, 5th chapter), De Missæ Ceremoniis et Ritibus, says, "Ceremonias item adhibuit ut mysticas benedictiones, lumina, thymiamata, vestes, aliaque multa."

Dr. Donne also in his Sermons (p. 80, fol. ed. 1640), writing in support of the use of these lights, calls it a ceremony. He says, "It is in this ceremony of lights as it is in other ceremonies."

There is a clear and obvious distinction between the presence in the church of things inert and unused, and the active use of the same things as a part of the administration of a sacrament or of a ceremony. Incense, water, a banner, a torch, a candle and candlestick may be parts of the furniture or ornaments of a church; but the censing of persons and things, or, as was said by the Dean of the Arches, the bringing in incense at the beginning or during the celebration, and removing it at the close of the celebration of the Eucharist, the symbolical use of water in baptism, or its ceremonial mixing with the sacramental wine; the waving or carrying the banner; the lighting, cremation and symbolical use of the torch or candle: these acts give a life and meaning to what is otherwise inexpressive, and the act must be justified, if at all, as part of a ceremonial law.

If the use of lighted candles in the manner complained of be a ceremony or ceremonial act, it might be sufficient to say that it is not—nor is any ceremony in which it forms a part—among those retained in the Prayer Book, and it must therefore be included among those that are abolished; for the Prayer Book, in the Preface, divides all ceremonies into these two classes: those which are retained are specified, whereas none are abolished specifically or by name; but it is assumed that all are abolished which are not expressly retained.

Passing however from this, the use of lighted candles, if a ceremonial act or part of a ceremony, would be prohibited by Queen Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity, section 4, which is now applicable to the present Prayer Book, and which makes it penal to use any other rite, ceremony, order, form or manner of celebrating the Lord's Supper than is mentioned and set forth in the said book: and any prior authority for the practice, from usage or otherwise, would be avoided by section 27, which enacts that "all laws, statutes and ordinances, whereby any other service, administration of sacraments or common prayer, is limited, established or set forth to be used within this realm, shall from henceforth be utterly void and of none effect."

As to the argument that the use complained of is at most only part of a ceremony, their Lordships are of opinion that when a part of a ceremony is changed the integrity of the ceremony is broken, and it ceases to be the same ceremony.

The learned Judge of the Arches Court was of opinion that these lights were ordered by injunctions having statutable authority, which injunctions had not been directly repealed; that they were primitive and catholic in their origin, evangelical in their proper symbolism, purged from all superstition and novelty by the very terms of the injunction which ordered their retention in the church, and that therefore it was lawful to place them on the holy table during the time of the Holy Communion "for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world."

The authorities cited shew beyond all doubt the very ancient and general use in the Church of these symbolical lights; and the injunction to which the learned Judge refers is the third of those issued, A.D. 1547, in the first year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth. By this it was ordered that images should be taken down and destroyed, and that spiritual persons should suffer no torches or candles to be set afore any image or picture, but only two lights upon the high altar, before the sacrament, which, for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world, they should suffer to remain.

It would deserve consideration how far under any circumstances this injunction could now be held operative, having regard to the words "upon the high altar, before the sacrament," and to the distinction pointed out by this Committee in Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Special Reports, 187) and Parker v. Leach (2 Moore, N.S. 199) between the sacrificial altar and the communion-table. But, without dwelling on this, and without stopping at this place to inquire into the nature of the authority under which the Injunctions of 1547 were issued, their Lordships are clearly of opinion that the injunction in question, so far as it could be taken to authorize the use of lights as a ceremony or ceremonial act, was abrogated or repealed by the act 1 Eliz. c. 2, particularly by section 27, already mentioned, and by the present Prayer Book and Act of Uniformity, and that the use of lighted candles, viewed as a ceremony or ceremonial act, can derive no warrant from that injunction.

Reference was made in the argument for the respondent to a constitution of the Council of Oxford, under Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 1322. That constitution is in these words: "Tempore quo missarum solennia peraguntur, accendantur duæ candelæ, vel ad minus una"; and is apparently a repetition of the earlier constitution of A.D. 1222—Wilkins's Concilia, vol. 1, p. 595: "Tempore quo missarum solennia peraguntur, accendantur duæ candelæ, vel ad minus una cum lampade." As to these constitutions it is sufficient to say that, in their Lordships' opinion, they must be taken, if of force at the time of the passing of any of the Acts of Uniformity, to have been repealed by those acts.

It remains to be considered whether the use of these two lighted candles can be justified as a question of "ornaments," according to the definition of that term already referred to. It was in this sense that the argument for the respondent appeared to prefer to regard them; and the learned Judge of the Arches Court also, although at the earlier part of his judgment he had stated that the matters complained of before him must be considered as "ceremonies," appears ultimately to have applied to the use of the lighted candles the law or Rubric as to ornaments.

The Rubric or note as to ornaments, in the commencement of the Prayer Book, is in these words: "And here it is to be noted that such ornaments of the Church, and of the ministers thereof, at all times of their ministration, shall be retained and be in use as were in this Church of England, by the authority of parliament, in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth."

The construction of this Rubric was very fully considered by this Committee in the case of Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Special Reports, 187), already referred to; and the propositions which their Lordships understand to have been established by the judgment in that case may thus be stated:

1. The words "authority of parliament" in the Rubric, refer to and mean the act of parliament 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 1, giving parliamentary effect to the first Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth, and do not refer to or mean canons or royal injunctions, having the authority of parliament, made at an earlier period—Moore, p. 160.

2. The term "ornaments" in the Rubric means those articles, the use of which, in the services and ministrations of the church, is prescribed by that Prayer Book—Ibid, p. 156.

3. The term "ornaments" is confined to those articles—Ibid, p. 156.

4. Though there may be articles not expressly mentioned in the Rubric, the use of which would not be restrained, they must be articles which are consistent with, and subsidiary to, the services: as an organ for the singing, a credence-table from which to take the sacramental bread and wine, cushions, hassocks, &c.—Ibid, p. 187.

In these conclusions, and in this construction of the Rubric, their Lordships entirely concur, and they go far, in their Lordships' opinion, to decide this part of the case.

The lighted candles are clearly not "ornaments" within the words of the Rubric, for they are not prescribed by the authority of parliament therein mentioned, namely, the first Prayer Book; nor is the Injunction of 1547 the authority of parliament within the meaning of the Rubric. They are not subsidiary to the service, for they do not aid or facilitate—much less are they necessary to—the service; nor can a separate and independent ornament, previously in use, be said to be consistent with a Rubric which is silent as to it, and which by necessary implication abolishes what it does not retain.

It was strongly pressed by the respondent's counsel that the use of lighted candles up to the time of the issue of the first Prayer Book was clearly legal; that the lighted candles were in use in the Church in the second year of Edward the Sixth; and that there was nothing in the Prayer Book of that year making it unlawful to continue them. All this may be conceded, but it is in reality beside the question. The Rubric of our Prayer Book might have said, those ornaments shall be retained which were lawful, or which were in use in the second year of Edward the Sixth, and the argument as to actual use at the time, and as to the weight of the Injunctions of 1547, might in that case have been material. But the Rubric, speaking in 1661, more than 100 years subsequently, has, for reasons which it is not the province of a judicial tribunal to criticize, defined the class of ornaments to be retained by a reference, not to what was in use de facto, or to what was lawful in 1549, but to what was in the Church by authority of parliament in that year; and in the parliamentary authority which this committee has held, and which their Lordships hold, to be indicated by these words, the ornaments in question are not found to be included.

Their Lordships have not referred to the usage as to lights during the last 300 years; but they are of opinion that the very general disuse of lights after the Reformation (whatever exceptional cases to the contrary might be produced), contrasted with their normal and prescribed use previously, affords a very strong contemporaneous and continuous exposition of the law upon the subject.

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that the charge as to lights also has been sustained, and that the respondent should be admonished for the future to abstain from the use of them, as pleaded in these articles.

All the charges against the respondent having been thus established, their Lordships see no reason why the usual consequence as to costs should not follow; and they will advise Her Majesty that the respondent should pay to the appellant the costs in the Court below, and of this appeal.

CONSISTORY COURT OF LONDON. July 27, Dec. 14, 1868.

LIDDELL AND OTHERS v. RAINSFORD.

38 L. J. Ecc. 15: see also, [1868] E. R. A. 2383; 37 L. J. Ecc. 83 (Cons. Court).

Proprietary Chapel—Sacramental Alms—District Chapelry—8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, ss. 6, 8, 17.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—An unconsecrated chapel was locally situated within the district of a chapel of ease with a district chapelry belonging thereto:—Held, that the incumbent and churchwardens of the chapel of ease, notwithstanding that the incumbent had sole and exclusive cure of souls within the district chapelry, were not entitled to claim the sacramental alms collected at such unconsecrated chapel.

In this case a citation issued at the instance of the Hon. and Rev. Robert Liddell, clerk, the incumbent, and George Sheward and John Osborne, the churchwardens of the district chapelry of St. Paul, Knightsbridge, in the county of Middlesex, against the Rev. Marcus Rainsford, clerk, the minister of an unconsecrated chapel, called Belgrave Chapel, situate within the district chapelry of St. Paul, Knightsbridge, calling upon him to shew cause why he should not pay over to the incumbent and churchwardens of such district chapelry the money by him, or any other minister or person on his behalf, since his appointment to the said chapel, received at the offertory in Belgrave Chapel to be disposed of according to the Rubric.

This citation issued in the form suggested by the Chanceller of the Diocese (see 37 L. J. Ecc. 83).

The libel set out several Orders in Council, dated respectively November 23, 1843, April 26, 1845, and October 30, 1846, under which the district chapelry of St. Paul, Knightsbridge, was formed. By the first a district was taken out of the parish of St. George, Hanover Square, and assigned to the church of St. Paul; and baptisms and churchings (not marriages) were permitted to be solemnized in the church of St. Paul, Knightsbridge, the fees arising therefrom to be reserved for the rector of St. George, Hanover Square, but after the next avoidance of St. George, Hanover Square, to be received by and to belong to the minister of the Church of St. Paul. By the second Order, it was recited that in consequence of the death of the rector of St. George, Hanover Square, the district of St. Peter's, Pimlico, had become a district parish, and the church of St. Paul, in Wilton Place, a chapel of ease (with a district chapelry belonging thereto to the said district parish church of St. Peter, Pimlico; and ordered that banns of marriage should be published, and that marriages should be performed in the said church of St. Paul; and that until the next avoidance of the said district parish church of St. Peter, Pimlico, the fees and emoluments to be received and taken for and in respect of the publication of banns of marriage, and the performance of marriages in the said church of St. Paul should respectively belong to and be divided in equal moieties between the incumbent of the said district parish church of St. Peter, Pimlico, and the minister of the said church of St. Paul. By the Order in Council of October 30, 1846, the boundaries of the district assigned to the church of St. Paul, Knightsbridge, were altered with the consents, in writing, of the Bishop of London, the patron in right of his see of the church of the district parish of St. Peter, Pimlico, and of the Rev. Thomas Fuller, as the incumbent of the said district parish of St. Peter, Pimlico, the consents required by the Church Building Acts, which acts (3 & 4 Vict. c. 60, s. 6. and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70. s. 16) require before boundaries can be altered the consents of the bishop of the diocese and the patron and incumbent of the parish church, signified under their respective hands and seals. The libel further stated, that Mr. Liddell had been duly licensed and admitted as perpetual curate or incumbent of the church or district chapelry of St. Paul, Wilton Place; and that George Sheward and John Osborne had been duly appointed churchwardens for the same district chapelry under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, s. 6. That Belgrave Chapel is locally situated within the district chapelry of St. Paul, Wilton Place, and that the defendant was licensed as the minister of Belgrave Chapel with the consent of Mr. Liddell in March, 1866, and still continues to officiate as such.

It further alleged that Mr. Liddell, as the perpetual curate or incumbent of the said church and district chapelry of St. Paul, Wilton Place, has within and over the whole of the said district chapelry the sole and exclusive cure of souls, and that by the ecclesiastical law the sacramental alms or money received and collected from time to time at the offertory in Belgrave Chapel aforesaid ought to be paid over to the perpetual curate or incumbent, or to the perpetual curate or incumbent and churchwardens for the time being of the said church and district chapelry of St. Paul, Wilton Place, to be disposed of according to the Rubric at the end of the Order of the Administration of the Holy Communion; but that although Mr. Rainsford had made collections in his chapel from time to time he had failed to hand the money over to the incumbent and churchwardens of St. Paul, Wilton Place, or to any or either of them. It finally set out a correspondence between the plaintiffs and the defendant, in which the plaintiffs made a formal claim to the alms received in Belgrave Chapel, and the defendant referred them to Mr. Robert Baxter, of 10, Queen Square, Westminster Abbey, and Mr. Henry Kingscote, 96, Eaton Place, as acting for the trustees of the chapel and as chapelwardens, and therefore the persons responsible in the matter.

In one letter Mr. Rainsford wrote as follows:

"Your demand on me for the sacramental offerings, and the unsettled state of the question, leaves me in considerable difficulty. I neither feel at liberty to use them for the poor I try to relieve, nor yet to inform my congregation that they must go over to the churchwardens of St. Paul's. Might I ask when the matter will be definitely settled? I need not tell you that the legal claim to the whole or any considerable part of the sacramental alms by the parish church will have the effect of diminishing our offerings to a mere nominal amount. Could the matter be compromised by my admitting the right, and handing 10*l.* per annum to the churchwardens, and, if they require it, sending in a rough account of the expenditure and receipts as disbursed by me? In referring you on former occasions to Messrs. Baxter and Kingscote I only acted by the direction of my trustees, and I trust you have so understood me."

The prayer of the libel was that the Court would order Mr. Rainsford to account for and pay over to the incumbent, or incumbent and churchwardens of St. Paul, Wilton Place, all the moneys received by him or other minister or person or persons on his behalf, since he became the minister of Belgrave Chapel, from the collections made at the offertory in the said chapel, to be disposed of according to the Rubric, and would condemn him in the costs of these proceedings.

An answer was filed, on behalf of the defendant, by which the claim of the incumbent and churchwardens of St. Paul, Wilton Place, to receive the moneys collected at the offertory in Belgrave Chapel was contested, and which alleged that the churchwardens of St. Paul, Wilton Place, had no duties except in relation to their own church; that they had no legal right to enter Belgrave Chapel in order to collect the alms of the congregation therein assembled, nor could they claim to receive such alms when collected by any other person. It further alleged that the alms in Belgrave Chapel were collected by Messrs. Baxter and Kingscote, or by some persons on their behalf, and after the service, and since the appointment of Mr. Rainsford as minister, on every occasion they have been paid into the bank of Messrs. Ransom & Co. to the credit of Messrs. Baxter and Kingscote, and still continue there.

Dr. Spinks and Dr. Tristram, for the plaintiffs, contended that as Mr. Liddell had the exclusive cure of souls over, and Messrs. Sheward and Osborne are the churchwardens of the district in which Belgrave Chapel is situated, they are entitled to the alms received in that chapel, and that, as far as regards such alms, Mr. Rainsford is a trustee for them. In the words of the Rubric, at the end of the Communion Service, they are "the minister and churchwardens of the parish." By the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70. s. 6 the minister and churchwardens of St. Paul's are authorized to dispose of the money given at the offertory at such church, and for this purpose Belgrave Chapel must be taken to be identical with St. Paul's Church. They referred to Ayliffe's Parergon, 394, Moysey v. Hillcoat (2 Hag. Ecc. 56).

A. J. Stephens and Dr. Middleton, for Mr. Rainsford.—The plaintiffs are bound to shew a joint interest in these alms before they can enforce their claim against the defendant. Under the Order in Council, April 26, 1845, St. Paul's, Wilton Place, is described as a chapel of ease, with a district chapelry belonging thereto, to the district parish church of St. Peter, Pimlico. It can, therefore, have no independent rights but such as are given to the minister and churchwardens expressly by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70. ss. 6, 8, 17. By that statute they have only authority to distribute the moneys collected at the offertory in their own church, and cannot enter Belgrave Chapel without the leave of the minister. They cited Magee v. the Bishop of Cashel (9 Ir. Eq. Rep. 319), Dowdall v. the Rev. J. Hewett (10 L. T. 823), and Heath v. Bosanquet (3 L. T. 290).

Cur. adv. vult.

The following judgment was given on December 14:

Sir T. Twiss.—This is a proceeding upon the part of the Hon. and Rev. Robert Liddell, clerk, the incumbent, and George Sheward and John Osborne, Esqs., the churchwardens of the church of the district chapelry of St. Paul, Wilton Place, in the diocese of London, against the Rev. Marcus Rainsford, clerk, the licensed minister of an unconsecrated chapel, commonly known and designated as Belgrave Chapel, situate on the north side of Halkin Street, and within the district chapelry of St. Paul aforesaid; and they pray the Court to order Mr. Rainsford to pay over to them, as the incumbent and churchwardens of the said church and district chapelry, all the moneys received by him, or any other person on his behalf, since he became minister of Belgrave Chapel, from the collections made at the offertory in the said chapel, to be disposed of according to the Rubric; and to condemn Mr. Rainsford in the costs of these proceedings. For the purpose of deciding this claim, it will be necessary to trace with some care the history of the church of which Mr. Liddell is incumbent, in order to ascertain the precise ecclesiastical status of the plaintiffs in relation to the minister of Belgrave Chapel.

It appears from the libel given in on behalf of the plaintiffs, and the various Orders of Her Majesty in Council exhibited in support of it, that a church or chapel, called St. Paul's Church, Wilton Place, had, some time prior to the year 1843, been erected and consecrated within that part of the parish of St. George, Hanover Square, which had been, by an Order in Council of June 28, 1830, assigned as an ecclesiastical district to St. Peter's Church, Pimlico; and that, by an Order in Council of October 2, 1843, a particular district was assigned to St. Paul's Church, to be called the chapelry district of St. Paul, Wilton Place, within which district Belgrave Chapel is situated. By the same Order in Council it was provided that baptisms and churchings might be solemnized and performed within St. Paul's Church, the fees being reserved to the rector of the parish of St. George, Hanover Square, during his incumbency; and after the next avoidance of the said parish, the said fees were to be received for and belong to the minister of St. Paul's Church. The rectory of St. George, Hanover Square, was avoided in the following year, when the minister of St. Paul's became entitled to all the fees for baptisms and churchings solemnized and performed in his church; and the district assigned to St. Peter's, Pimlico, having, at the same time, become a district parish, divided off, under the provisions of the Church Building Acts, from the parish of St. George, Hanover Square, the district chapelry of St. Paul ceased to be, for ecclesiastical purposes, dependent upon the parish church of St. George, Hanover Square, and the church or chapel itself became a chapel of ease to the district parish church of St. Peter, Pimlico. The church of St. Paul is accordingly described in an Order in Council of April 26, 1845, as a chapel of ease, with a district chapelry belonging thereto, to the said district parish church of St. Peter, Pimlico. Under this Order in Council banns were authorized to be published and marriages solemnized in St. Paul's Church, but a moiety of the fees resulting therefrom was reserved to the incumbent of St. Peter's, Pimlico, until the next avoidance of that church, after which they are to be received for and belong to the minister of St. Paul's. Meanwhile, the minister of St. Paul's, who had originally cure of souls within the chapelry district, subject to the superintendence and control of the incumbent of the parish church, had acquired, under the provisions of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, s. 17, the status of a perpetual curate, with sole and exclusive cure of souls within his chapelry district, whilst the district parish of St. Peter, Pimlico, had also become, under the provisions of Lord Blandford's Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 104), a separate and distinct parish from St. George, Hanover Square; and the inhabitants of the parish of St. Peter thereupon became, for all ecclesiastical purposes, parishioners of that parish, and of no other parish. Such being the various ecclesiastical phases through which the church of St. Paul has passed, it results that it is, at the present time, a chapel of ease to the parish church of St. Peter, Pimlico, with a chapelry district annexed to it, within which the incumbent of St. Paul's has exclusive cure of souls, and within which district Belgrave Chapel is locally situated. Under these circumstances, it remains to be considered whether the claim of the plaintiffs to have paid over to them the moneys collected at the offertory in Belgrave Chapel, to be disposed of according to the Rubric, can be sustained in law.

The Rubric which governs this case is amongst the Rubrics which are appended to the Order of the Administration of the Lord's Supper, and it is in the following words: "After the divine service ended, the money given at the offertory shall be disposed of to such pious and charitable uses as the minister and churchwardens shall think fit: wherein, if they disagree, it shall be disposed of as the Ordinary shall appoint." The counsel for the plaintiffs have contended that the incumbent of St. Paul's, having exclusive cure of souls throughout the chapelry district within which Belgrave Chapel is situated, and the churchwardens of St. Paul's being churchwardens of the said church and chapelry district, are entitled under this Rubric to the distribution of the moneys received at the offertory in Belgrave Chapel. The counsel for the defendant, on the other hand, maintain that the incumbent of St. Paul's is still subject to the control and interference of the incumbent of the parish of St. Peter, Pimlico, under section 17 of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, so far as regards all fees, offerings and oblations as have not been granted to him by any Order in Council, and that the churchwardens appointed from time to time for the church of the district chapelry of St. Paul have no authority, nor can they perform any duties except in relation to their own church, and within the limitations contained in section 6 of the same statute. Both parties agree that the churchwardens of St. Paul's are appointed under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70. s. 6, which provides that two churchwardens shall be annually appointed for the church of every district chapelry at a meeting of the minister of such church and the householders of the district. one of whom shall be chosen by the incumbent or minister serving such church, and the other by the majority of such householders. The statute then goes on to define the duties of the churchwardens in the following words: "And the two persons, when so appointed and elected churchwardens, shall appear and be admitted according to law, and shall collect and receive the rents of the pews and seats in every such church, and pay the stipend or salary assigned by Her Majesty's said Commissioners to the minister and clerk of such church, if the said Commissioners have fixed the rents for the same or assigned such stipend or salary, and shall also do, perform and execute all lawful acts, matters and things necessary for and concerning the management, good order and decency of behaviour to be kept and observed in such church by the congregation thereof, and for the recovery of the pew-rents if in arrear; and the money given at the offertory at such church shall be disposed of by the minister and churchwardens of such church in the same manner as the money given at the offertory of any parish church is by law directed to be disposed of by the minister and churchwardens of such parish; and the persons so to be appointed and chosen churchwardens shall continue in their said office until others shall be appointed and chosen in like manner in their stead." Now there are two classes of churchwardens called into existence by the Church Building Acts,—churchwardens whose functions are confined to the particular church or chapel of which they are wardens, and churchwardens whose ecclesiastical duties extend over the district which has been assigned to the particular church or chapel of which they are wardens. To the former class belong churchwardens appointed under the 58 Geo. 3. c. 45. s. 73, for churches or chapels built or appropriated under that act, who are to be chosen at a meeting of the householders of the district to which the church or chapel belongs, and who are to sue and be sued under the name of "the churchwardens of the church or chapel." To the latter class belong churchwardens to be appointed under the provisions of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37. s. 17, for a Peel district, which after a church has been consecrated as the church or chapel of such district has become a new parish, and the wardens in such case are expressly authorized to do all things pertaining to the office of "churchwardens as to ecclesiastical matters in the new parish." The provisions of the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 38 afford an example of either class. With regard to churches or chapels built under that statute, it provides that churchwardens of such churches or chapels shall be appointed, whose duties are described in nearly the same language as in the case of churchwardens appointed under the 58 Geo. 3. c. 45. s. 73. But it also contains a power to separate from a parish an existing chapel of ease with a district attached to it, and to constitute the district a separate parish, and the statute in such a case authorizes the appointment of churchwardens, who are "to do all things pertaining to the office of churchwardens as to ecclesiastical matters in like manner as though the same had been of old time a separate and distinct parish." The statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, which applies to the present case, enacts that two fit persons shall be appointed churchwardens for the church of every district chapelry, and it goes on to describe their duties in nearly the same words as the 58 Geo. 3. c. 45. s. 73, namely, after authorizing them to collect the pew-rents and pay the stipend or salary, if any has been assigned by Her Majesty's Commissioners, to the minister and clerk of such church, it enacts that "they shall also do, perform and execute all lawful acts, matters and things necessary for and concerning the management, good order and decency of behaviour to be kept and observed in such church by the congregation thereof, and for the recovery of such pew-rents if in arrear." It would so far appear from the description of the duties assigned to such churchwardens that they are confined to ecclesiastical matters pertaining to the church of the district chapelry as regards either the minister, clerk, or the congregation thereof, but there is an additional provision which must not be overlooked as regards the churchwardens of the church of a district chapelry, whereby powers in excess of the powers conferred upon the churchwardens of a church which has an ecclesiastical district annexed to it under the 58 Geo. 3. c. 45. s. 73, are conferred upon them, namely, the provision that the money given at the offertory at such church "shall be disposed of by the minister and churchwardens of such church in the same manner as the money given at the offertory in any parish church is by law directed to be disposed of by the minister and churchwardens of such parish."

Now this provision clearly withdraws the disposal of the money received at the offertory in St. Paul's Church from the control of the minister and churchwardens of St. Peter's parish, but in my judgment it does not place at the disposal of the minister and churchwardens of St. Paul's the offertory money received in any other chapel, either consecrated or unconsecrated, which may be locally situate within the chapelry district of St. Paul. For there is a further and most important provision in section 8 of the statute, which enacts, that "No churchwardens appointed under the provisions of this act shall be churchwardens for any other duties than those hereinbefore mentioned, but all other legal duties appertaining to the office of churchwardens shall be discharged within such district chapelry or consolidated chapelry, and in respect of the church thereof, and also in respect of such new church as aforesaid without a district, by the churchwardens who would have discharged the same if this act had not passed." The claim of the plaintiffs would therefore seem to derive no support from the statute under which the churchwardens of St. Paul's are appointed; on the contrary, that statute expressly reserves to the churchwardens of the parish all the duties which the general law imposes upon them, and of which they have not been relieved by the express provisions of the statute. The question, then, which remains to be considered is, whether the distribution of the money received at the offertory in an unconsecrated chapel is a duty which devolves upon the minister and churchwardens of the parish under the general law, and which will in the case of Belgrave Chapel have been reserved by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70. s. 8. to the minister and churchwardens of St. Peter's, Pimlico. The decision of Sir John Nicholl, in the case of Moysey v. Hillcoat (2 Hag. Ecc. 56) may be said to have settled the general law on the subject of the distribution of money received at the offertory in an unconsecrated chapel, which is private property. "The alms received during the reading of the offertory before the Communion are specially directed by the Rubric to be collected 'in a decent basin to be provided by the parish,' which shews that the collection, wherever made, is a parochial matter, with which persons connected with a private chapel have no concern. Again, 'after the divine service is ended, the money given at the offertory shall be disposed of to such pious and charitable uses as the minister and churchwardens shall think fit; wherein, if they disagree, it shall be disposed of as the Ordinary shall appoint.' These directions as to the 'parish' and the 'churchwardens,' who are officers of the parish and not of the chapel, lead me also to construe the 'minister' to mean 'the minister of the parish'; and they shew that the Rubric intended that all alms received at the Communion, as well at private chapels as in the parish church, should be at the disposal of the minister of the parish and of the churchwardens, and should not belong to the officiating minister, nor to the proprietors of such chapel." It may be said, however, that this judgment does not dispose directly of Mr. Liddell's claim, as the question in Moysey v. Hillcoat (2 Hag. Ecc. 56) was between the incumbent of a parish and the proprietors of an unconsecrated chapel, whereas the incumbent of St. Paul's as regards his relation to the minister of Belgrave Chapel is quasi-parochus, having by statute the exclusive cure of souls within the chapelry district. But the claim in this case is made not merely on behalf of the incumbent of St. Paul's, but on behalf of the churchwardens, whose duties, as already observed, are strictly limited by statute to matters which concern that church. When, therefore, I consider the language of the Rubric, which says, "Whilst these sentences are reading, the deacons, churchwardens or other fit persons appointed for that purpose shall receive the alms for the poor and other donations of the people in a decent basin to be provided by the parish for that purpose, and reverently bring it to the priest, who shall humbly present and place it upon the holy table," and bear in mind that the churchwardens upon whom those duties are by law imposed are the churchwardens of the parish; and that the incumbent of St. Paul's has no title of right to perform any ministerial function whatever in Belgrave Chapel, I arrive without hesitation at the conclusion that the circumstance of the incumbent of St. Paul's having the cure of souls throughout his chapelry district, however anomalous that fact may be, does not in any way affect the general law applicable to this case; and I may observe, further, that, if the contention of the plaintiffs were correct in point of law, the provision would have been unnecessary which has been introduced into the statute, whereby the disposal of the money received at the offertory at St. Paul's Church has been expressly withdrawn from the control of the minister and churchwardens of the parish church, and has been assigned to the minister and churchwardens of St. Paul's Church. It is my duty, therefore, to decide that the plaintiffs have failed to establish their claim.

Upon the question of costs I feel some difficulty. The plaintiffs have advanced a claim which they have failed to establish, and they have put the defendant to the expense of disproving their claim. At the same time the suit has been conducted in a fair spirit, and the object in view may be said to have been one of public interest. In strictness of proceeding, if I am pressed to give the defendant his costs, I am bound to allow them; but it would be more satisfactory to the Court if the defendant's counsel would consent to waive them.

IN THE COURT OF ARCHES. Feb. 3, 1869.

RIPPIN AND WILSON v. BASTIN, DALTON AND GOOSE.

Church-Rates—31 & 32 Vict. c. 109.—Letters of Request—Acceptance—Practice.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—The Dean of the Arches will not accept letters of request in a suit for subtraction of church-rates, unless it appears on the letters of request, or by affidavit accompanying the letters of request, that the rate can be enforced notwithstanding the provisions of the statute 31 & 32 Vict. c. 109.

In all future cases the Court must be moved by counsel to accept letters of request.

The plaintiffs, John Rippin and Benjamin John Wilson, the churchwardens of the parish of Harmston, in the county and diocese of Lincoln, desired to institute suits against the defendants, Messrs. Bastin, Dalton and Goose, inhabitants of the parish, for subtraction of church-rate under the following circumstances:—

In 1867, the inhabitants of the parish of Harmston, in vestry assembled, and after a poll had been duly taken, determined to borrow from the Public Works Commissioners, on the security of the rates, and under the provisions of the statute 5 Geo. 4. c. 36, a sum of 775*l.*, to be repaid by annual instalments within twenty years, and to be expended in the repair and alteration of the parish church. The churchwardens and overseers received the money, and gave the usual security for it, and it was expended in carrying out the repairs authorized by a faculty granted for that purpose. In May, 1868, an application was made to the churchwardens and overseers for the repayment of 38*l.* 15*s.* principal, and 30*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.* interest, making together 68*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.* On July 10, 1868, the churchwardens and overseers made a rate upon the parishioners and inhabitants to enable them to meet the demand. The above defendants, having refused to pay the rate, were summoned before Messrs. Jarvis and Ellison, Justices of the Peace, on November 6, 1868; and upon the defendants handing in a written notice that they intended to dispute the validity of the rate, the magistrates declined to proceed further. The plaintiffs then applied to and obtained from Sir Travers Twiss, the Vicar General and official principal of the Consistorial and Episcopal Court of Lincoln, letters of request directed to the Dean of Arches, requesting him to cite the defendants before him and to hear the cause. The letters of request were in the usual form, and commenced, "Whereas John Rippin and Benjamin John Wilson, the churchwardens, of the parish of Harmston, &c., intend to commence and prosecute a certain cause or business of subtraction of church-rates against, &c.; and for that purpose have requested us to grant these letters of request that they may commence and prosecute the said cause or business in the Arches Court of Canterbury. . . . Therefore we request you to issue a decree or citation, under the seal of the said Arches Court, against the said John Bastin, &c., in the aforesaid cause or business of subtraction of church-rate or church-rates, and to hear and finally determine the said cause according to law."

The Dean of the Arches having required that his acceptance should be moved for in open Court,

Dr. Middleton moved accordingly.—He submitted that the Court has no option, if the letters of request are granted by a proper Judge—Butler v. Dolben (2 Lee, 312).

Sir R. J. Phillimore.—I am entitled to know the nature of the suit. I have nothing before me to shew that I have jurisdiction over the subject-matter.

Dr. Middleton.—The letters of request state that the parties are desirous to institute a suit for subtraction of church-rate, which is clearly a subject over which the Ecclesiastical Courts have jurisdiction.

Sir R. J. Phillimore.—But the letters of request do not state the date on which the rate was made, or the circumstances which take the rate out of the operation of the Compulsory Church-Rate Abolition Act. I shall require you either to bring in fresh letters of request, or to file an affidavit as to those particulars. If the affidavit is satisfactory, I will then sign the letters of request without further motion.

For the future, I shall require that in every case my acceptance of letters of request shall be moved for by counsel.

Act of Uniformity, 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4.—One Benefice—Two Churches—Incumbent—Liability to perform Service in each Church—Church Discipline Act.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—The 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4, by section 2, provides that the Morning and Evening Prayer contained in the Prayer Book shall, upon every Lord's Day be openly read by every minister or curate, in every church, chapel or other place of public worship:—Held, that the words "every church, chapel or other place of public worship," must be read "in every church, &c. in or for which there is a distinct minister."

The appellant became the incumbent of a benefice created under an Order in Council, in which there were two ancient churches or chapels. The appellant discontinued to perform divine service on the Lord's Day in one of such churches, and shut up the church although required by the bishop of the diocese to perform divine service in such church:—Held, that although the 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4. s. 2. did not impose a duty upon the appellant to perform divine service in every church or chapel in his parish, yet that the appellant by shutting up the church and refusing to perform divine service therein, notwithstanding the mandate of the bishop, was guilty of an ecclesiastical offence, and was liable to be proceeded against under the Church Discipline Act.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Right Hon. Sir R. J. Phillimore, the official principal of the Arches Court of Canterbury, pronounced on May 2, 1868.

The appellant, the Rev. Lewis Rugg, a clerk in holy orders of the United Church of England and Ireland, the incumbent of the benefice of Ecchinswell-with-Sydmonton, in the county of Southampton and diocese of Winchester, was charged with having, within two years then last past, offended against the laws ecclesiastical, "by having omitted to perform, or to provide for the performance of, public divine service as prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies, according to the use of the Church of England, in the church or chapel of St. Mary, Sydmonton, on Sunday, May 12, on Sunday, May 19, on Sunday, May 26, and on Sunday, June 2, all in the year of our Lord, 1867."

The cause came before the Arches Court of Canterbury, by virtue of letters of request from the Bishop of Winchester, in accordance with the provisions of the Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86).

On July 2, 1867, a citation was served on the appellant.

The appellant appeared to the decree under protest, and prayed to be heard on his act on petition.

In his act on petition the appellant protested against the jurisdiction of the Court on the grounds,—that by reason of the provisions contained in the act of parliament, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, and more especially in sections 77 and 109 of that act, proceedings could not be taken against him, under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, for the offence set forth in the decree; that the church of St. Mary, Sydmonton, was an unconsecrated building; and that on the Sundays on which he was charged with having omitted to perform divine service in the church of St. Mary, Sydmonton, he had performed two full services in the church of St. Lawrence, Ecchinswell.

On August 7 an answer to the act on petition was brought in on behalf of the respondent.

On February 5, 1868, the Judge of the Arches Court, having heard the appellant on his own behalf, overruled the protest and assigned him to appear absolutely. On February 6 articles were brought in and admitted on behalf of the respondent.

The articles pleaded,—that by the common ecclesiastical law of the realm, and by the statute 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4. s. 2, every clerk in holy orders of the United Church of England and Ireland, is bound on every Sunday to perform, or to provide for the performance of, public divine service in every consecrated church or chapel of the ecclesiastical parish or benefice of which he is the incumbent.

That the Rev. Lewis Rugg was a clerk in holy orders of the United Church of England and Ireland, and the perpetual curate and incumbent of the perpetual curacy and benefice of Ecchinswell-with-Sydmonton.

That such perpetual curacy and benefice consisted of two ancient parochial chapelries, now and for many years past known by the respective names of Ecchinswell and Sydmonton, in each of which has been from time out of mind a consecrated church or chapel, to wit, the church or chapel of St. Lawrence, Ecchinswell, and the church or chapel of St. Mary, Sydmonton. That such ancient parochial chapelries, up to August 18, 1852, belonged for all ecclesiastical purposes to the vicarage and parish church of Kingsclere, but were separated therefrom by an Order in Council bearing date August 18, 1852, and since that date have been and are a separate parish for ecclesiastical purposes, and a perpetual curacy and benefice by the name or style of the perpetual curacy of Ecchinswell-with-Sydmonton.

The omission on the part of the Rev. Lewis Rugg to perform divine service in the church of St. Mary, Sydmonton, on the days hereinbefore set forth.

To these articles a responsive plea was brought in on behalf of the appellant, by which the fact of the omission on the part of the appellant to perform, or to provide for the performance of, public divine service in the church of St. Mary, Sydmonton, on the days specified, was admitted; but a justification of such omission was alleged.

On May 2, 1868, the Judges of the Arches Court, having heard advocates on behalf of the respondent, and the appellant on his own behalf, pronounced, decreed and declared that the respondent had sufficiently proved the contents of the articles, and that the appellant had offended against the laws ecclesiastical, by not having regularly performed divine service in the church or chapel of St. Mary, Sydmonton, as required by the bishop of the diocese; and monished the appellant to resume and continue to perform or provide for the performance of public divine service, as prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, in the said church or chapel of St. Mary, Sydmonton; and further condemned him in the costs (see 37 L. J. Ecc. 85).

This sentence was the subject of the present appeal.

The appellant appeared in person, and contended that the omission of duty alleged did not constitute an offence against the laws ecclesiastical, within the meaning of 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4; and that he (the appellant) having performed morning and evening services in the church of Ecchinswell on the days specified in the articles, had complied with the requisitions of the 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4. That assuming the non-performance on the Lord's Day of divine service in one of two churches or chapels, both being locally situate within one separate parish and benefice for ecclesiastical purposes, two full services had in fact been performed for the whole benefice. That the church of St. Mary, Sydmonton, was pulled down and rebuilt, and after such rebuilding the said church was not legally consecrated; and that it was not competent for the Ordinary to consecrate the new building as or for a parish church, because neither the patron nor the minister consented, and because no endowment was granted.—He referred to Stillingfleet, Eccl. Cas. 326; Hooker's Eccl. Pol., Battiscombe v. Eve (7 L. T. 697), 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106. s. 77.

Dr. Swabey (Dr. Deane with him), for the respondent.—The appellant is the incumbent of a benefice consisting of two distinct districts or chapelries, in each of which there is a consecrated church or chapel. The appellant is therefore bound by law to perform or provide for the performance of divine service in each of such churches or chapels. The appellant has no right to choose in which of the churches or chapels he will perform divine service, and to neglect to perform or provide for the performance of any divine service in the other of such churches or chapels. The reasons alleged by the appellant for not performing or providing for the performance of divine service in both of the said churches or chapels are insufficient. This duty is imposed upon the incumbent of every parish or benefice by section 2. of the Act of Uniformity (13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4); but it is also the duty of any incumbent of a parish to provide for divine service in any church or chapel by the Common Ecclesiastical Law. By the Common Ecclesiastical Law the church service is to be regularly performed on every Sunday in the morning and evening—Bennett v. Bennett (2 Hag. Ecc. 27).

Lord Chelmsford delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—The appellant in this case is the incumbent of the benefice of Ecchinswell-with-Sydmonton, in the county of Southampton, and he appeals from a sentence of the Arches Court, pronounced in a cause instituted under the Clergy Discipline Act, by which sentence the Judge declared that the appellant had offended against the laws ecclesiastical by not having regularly performed divine service in the church or chapel of St. Mary, Sydmonton, as required by the lord bishop of the diocese, and monished him to resume and continue to perform, or to provide for the performance of, public divine service, as prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, in the said church or chapel of St. Mary, Sydmonton, and further condemned him in costs.

It appears that Ecchinswell and Sydmonton were two ancient chapelries belonging to the vicarage of Kingsclere, with a church or chapel in each of the chapelries, each chapelry being also a separate parish for all civil purposes; and in the year 1852 a proposal or scheme for the union of the two chapelries into a separate parish and benefice, and for their separation from the vicarage of Kingsclere, was set on foot by the Bishop of Winchester, under the provisions of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106. and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 43. This scheme was certified by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Queen in Council, and all necessary consents having been given, it was ultimately approved of by Her Majesty in Council, and became binding under the acts referred to. By this scheme it was provided that the two chapelries of Ecchinswell and Sydmonton should be separated from the vicarage of Kingsclere, and be united so as to form together a separate parish for ecclesiastical purposes, and a perpetual curacy and benefice, by the name or style of the perpetual curacy of Ecchinswell-with-Sydmonton. That the proposed separate parish and benefice should be subject to the same ecclesiastical jurisdiction as the said vicarage of Kingsclere, and the incumbent of such separate parish and benefice should have exclusive cure of souls within the limits of the same. That two churchwardens should be annually chosen in the customary manner, and at the time when churchwardens are usually appointed, in and for each of the said chapelries; and every person so chosen should be duly admitted, and should do all things pertaining to the office of churchwarden as to ecclesiastical matters within the said chapelries. That the freehold of the churches and churchyards of Ecchinswell and Sydmonton, so far as the same might be vested in or belong to the incumbent for the time being of the said vicarage, and also all the glebe lands of and belonging to the said vicarage situate in the said chapelries of Ecchinswell and Sydmonton, with the appurtenances; and also (except as thereinafter mentioned) all, so much and such part of the tithe-rentcharges or other payments or compositions for or in lieu of tithes belonging to the said vicarage as arose and accrued or were payable within or in respect of the said chapelries of Ecchinswell and Sydmonton, should belong and be attached to the said proposed separate benefice of Ecchinswell-with-Sydmonton for ever, and be held, received and enjoyed by the incumbent thereof for the time being accordingly. That the parishioners of Ecchinswell and Sydmonton should be liable as theretofore to the expenses of repairing and maintaining their respective churches, and the other expenses incidental to the due performance of divine service therein respectively, and should be exempt from all rates, charges and assessments to be made for or in respect of the parish church of Kingsclere aforesaid, or for or in respect of any other church or chapel situate elsewhere than within the limits of the said proposed separate parish. That the patronage or right of nomination of or to the said proposed separate benefice of Ecchinswell-with-Sydmonton should be and remain in the vicar of the said vicarage and parish church of Kingsclere for the time being and his successors for ever. That the parishioners of Ecchinswell and Sydmonton should be entitled, as theretofore, to accommodation in their said respective churches, but should not henceforth be entitled to any accommodation in the parish church of Kingsclere. It is enacted by the statutes already mentioned, that a scheme thus approved of, and made an Order in Council, shall come into operation forthwith, and be binding on all persons whatsoever, whether the benefice or benefices thereby affected be or be not vacant. Shortly after the date of the Order in Council, the appellant became the incumbent of the parish or benefice thus created. The church at Sydmonton was at this time pulled down for the purpose of being rebuilt, and it was rebuilt on the lines of the ancient structure in 1853. It appears that from the year in which the new church at Sydmonton was opened for divine worship, until 1863, service was performed in the church by the appellant. Some doubt then arose whether the new building required re-consecration; and the appellant, taking advantage of this doubt, closed the church, and refused his consent to its being re-consecrated. To such an extent was his perverse conduct carried, that on the day appointed for the consecration, August 17, 1865, he caused the door of the church to be locked, carried away the key, and refused to be present at the ceremony. There can be no justification or excuse for such conduct. If the new church required re-consecration (which, as it was built on the site of the old church, may well be doubted), it was the duty of the appellant to have promoted and assisted such re-consecration. The appellant has since contended that the consecration is invalid, as it took place without his consent, and even against his protest. But their Lordships entertain no doubt that even assuming re-consecration to have been necessary, the appellant having regard to the site of the building, the purpose for which it was erected, and the provisions of the Order in Council, was not in a position to have refused his assent to the consecration. In the consideration of this case, therefore, the church at Sydmonton must be taken to be a lawfully consecrated church.

On May 5, 1867, the appellant gave public notice in the church at Sydmonton that there would be no more service in that church; and for the two following Sundays divine service was not performed in it. Complaint having been made to the Bishop of Winchester, he, on May 23, 1867, by a letter from his secretary to the appellant, desired to know whether the information he had received was correct, and if so, on what ground he had suspended the service. To this letter the appellant, on May 27, 1867, replied in these terms: "In answer to your letter addressed to me at the request of the Bishop of Winchester, I have to inform you that I have discontinued the service at Sydmonton, and have returned to the two full services in the church at Ecchinswell as performed by me during the first four years of my charge of this parish. I think I shall best discharge my duty to my parishioners generally by the return to the two full services (morning and evening) here, and that this will be more strictly in accordance with the requirements of both the common and ecclesiastical law, than having only one service here in order that there may be one in a building which I cannot recognize as ever having been lawfully consecrated, and for the sake merely of one family (not much resident) and their immediate dependants, when the great bulk (more than nine-tenths) of my parishioners live nearer to Ecchinswell church, where they can better and more conveniently attend than by having to go out of their way a mile or two more distant to Sydmonton House." The following letter, dated May 30, 1867, was then written by the bishop's secretaries to the appellant: "We have laid your letter of the 27th before the Bishop of Winchester. We are desired to state that the bishop requires you to resume the service at Sydmonton church on Sunday next, and to continue the performance of such service in future; and we beg to add that we have forwarded a copy of this letter to the churchwarden, and requested him to inform the bishop whether his order is complied with."

The following is the reply of the appellant to the order of the bishop: "Ecchinswell, May 31, 1867. In reply to your communication of yesterday from the Bishop of Winchester, I beg you to inform his Lordship that, with all due deference to his authority, I see neither the necessity nor the obligation, under existing circumstances, of performing divine service at Sydmonton, and it is not my intention to resume the service there until every impediment be removed and the church (so called) has been judicially decided to be lawfully consecrated. I have, moreover, to inform you that there is no churchwarden at Sydmonton, and therefore no need to wait for a reply to any copy of a letter or request to such to know whether his Lordship's order has been complied with or not."

The bishop, finding that the appellant had determined to continue to keep the church at Sydmonton closed, and to disregard his order that the service in it should be resumed, instituted a suit against the appellant in the Arches Court of Canterbury, under the provisions of the Clergy Discipline Act, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86. The letters of request stated that the appellant was charged with having offended against the laws ecclesiastical by having omitted to perform or to provide for the performance of public divine service, as prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies, in the church of St. Mary, Sydmonton, on four successive Sundays in the months of May and June, 1867, and therefore prayed that a citation might be issued to him to appear to answer to certain articles, &c. to be administered. The appellant appeared under protest, and by an act or petition objected that by virtue of divers provisions contained in the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, and more particularly in sections 77. and 109, the Court had no jurisdiction to administer articles to him for the alleged offence of omitting to perform or provide for the performance of public divine service in the alleged church of St. Mary, Sydmonton; that the building called the Church of St. Mary, Sydmonton, is not a church, as falsely suggested; that an illegal ceremony of consecration had been performed within the building; that the appellant performed two full services in the parish church of Ecchinswell-with-Sydmonton on the Sundays mentioned in the letters of request, and that by reason of the premises the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain a suit to compel him to answer articles for not performing divine service in the building.

The Dean of the Arches overruled the protest, deciding that the offence charged was an ecclesiastical offence cognizable under the provisions of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, and assigned the appellant to appear absolutely.

Articles were accordingly brought in, which charged the appellant with having offended against the Common Ecclesiastical Law of the realm, and the statute 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4. s. 2, by omitting to perform divine service in the church of St. Mary, Sydmonton, at the times mentioned, and copies of the before-mentioned letters between the bishop's secretaries and the appellant were annexed to and made part of the articles.

The answer to the articles principally consisted of a denial of any liability on the appellant to perform any divine service in St. Mary's, Sydmonton, on the ground of its being an unconsecrated building, and a justification for the omission charged, by reason of his having performed two full services in the church of Ecchinswell. The Dean of the Arches held that the bishop had rightly exercised his discretion in commanding the appellant to perform divine service in the church at Sydmonton, and admonished him to obey the directions of his ordinary.

Upon the hearing of the appeal from this judgment, the appellant in person urged various objections, some of which were of an extremely frivolous character. He insisted upon the illegality of the consecration of the church at Sydmonton, for which objection, as already shewn, there is no foundation. He also objected that an ancient footway or entrance to the church had been stopped up by the patron and a more circuitous road provided, and that it is by sufferance of the patron only that the former approach can be used. It is clear that no defence against the present charge can be rested upon this circumstance. If there has been any improper obstruction of a right of way to the church, the appellant has his appropriate remedy. But the appellant principally rested his defence to the proceedings against him upon the ground that there being two churches or places of public worship in the parish of Ecchinswell-with-Sydmonton, he had a right to shut the church against the parishioners of Sydmonton if, in his discretion, he considered it more expedient to confine the public worship in the parish to the church at Ecchinswell.

The question is, whether by so acting and persevering in keeping the church at Sydmonton closed in disobedience to the order of the bishop he has committed an ecclesiastical offence. The duty of the appellant is thus stated in the first article: That by the Common Ecclesiastical Law of the realm, and by the statute 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4. s. 2, every clerk in holy orders of the United Church of England and Ireland is bound on every Sunday (otherwise called Lord's day) in the year to perform or to provide for the performance of public divine service, as prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies, according to the use in the Church of England, in every consecrated church or chapel of the ecclesiastical parish or benefice of which he is the incumbent. It appears to their Lordships that the Act of Uniformity, 13 & 14 Car. 2, does not apply to this case, and that it is not a duty imposed by that act upon an incumbent who has two churches or places of public worship within his parish to perform divine service in both of them. The words of the act, "Every church, chapel or other place of public worship within the realm of England," must be read in each church, &c. in and for which there is a distinct minister. The appellant cannot therefore be said to have offended against the Act of Uniformity by confining the performance of morning and evening service to one of the churches in his parish, and not providing for the same services in the other church, there being nothing in the act requiring him to employ a curate in order that the services may be duly performed in both churches.

But the question is, whether the appellant was not bound by the Common Ecclesiastical Law (to use the language of the articles) "to perform or to provide for the performance of public divine service in every consecrated church or chapel of the parish or benefice of which he is the incumbent." If so, the article which charges an offence against the Common Ecclesiastical Law, and also against the statute 13 & 14 Car. 2, will be good, although the offence is only against the common law, and not against the statute, as the latter allegation may be regarded as mere surplusage. There can be no doubt that the Order in Council which united the chapelries of Ecchinswell and Sydmonton into a separate parish or benefice, intended that there should be two churches (as they are called in the Order) within the parish in both of which public worship should be performed. This appears plainly from the provisions contained in the Order, "that the parishioners of Ecchinswell and Sydmonton should be liable, as theretofore, to the expenses of repairing and maintaining their respective churches and the other expenses incidental to the due performance of divine service therein respectively," and "that the parishioners of Ecchinswell and Sydmonton shall be entitled as heretofore to accommodation in their respective churches."

The appellant accepted the benefice with a full knowledge that there were two churches or chapels within the parish in which, by the instrument creating the benefice, the duty of using each as a place of religious worship, and performing some service therein, is laid upon him. If the question with the bishop had been as to the nature and extent of the services which the appellant was bound to perform in these churches respectively, the case might have been attended with more difficulty. But the appellant takes upon himself to shut up the church at Sydmonton, and positively to refuse to perform any divine service in it, assigning reasons for this wilful neglect of the duty which he has undertaken, every one of which is insufficient, and claiming the liberty of choosing which of the two churches in his parish he will keep open for divine worship, which, if it were conceded to him, would, of course, equally enable him to close the church at Ecchinswell, and perform the whole of the divine services in the parish in the church at Sydmonton. If, then, the appellant has neglected or refused to perform a spiritual duty which was imposed upon him by his induction into the benefice, has he not committed an offence against the Ecclesiastical Law? This in itself might render him liable to be proceeded against under the Church Discipline Act. But, beyond his neglect of duty, he has exposed himself to such a proceeding by his contumacious refusal to obey the lawful order of his bishop. The duty of performing some divine service in the church at Sydmonton having been imposed upon the appellant, and he having shewn his intention of violating it by shutting up the church and giving public notice that there would be no more service there, the bishop, in the exercise of the authority vested in him, made an order upon him to resume the services in that church. If the appellant had entertained a sincere wish to do his duty to the parishioners, he would have consulted the bishop as to the best mode of meeting their requirements and his own obligation; but instead of adopting this course he defied the bishop's authority under the semblance of deference to it, and, denying the necessity and the obligation of performing any divine service at Sydmonton, expressed his intention not to resume the service there "until the church (so called) had been judicially decided to be lawfully consecrated." The appellant, therefore, has committed an offence against the Common Ecclesiastical Law, by wilful neglect of duty, and by wilful disobedience to the order of the bishop directing him to perform that duty.

In his act or protest, the appellant objected to the jurisdiction of the Court, upon the ground that the proceedings should have been taken (if at all) under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, referring to sections 77 and 109 of that act. It may be doubted whether the act referred to is applicable to this case. By the 77th section it is provided, that whenever the bishop shall see reason to believe that the ecclesiastical duties of any benefice are inadequately performed, it shall be lawful for him to issue a commission, to be constituted in the manner prescribed; and if the commissioners report to the bishop that in their opinion the duties of such benefice are inadequately performed, he may require the spiritual person holding the benefice to appoint a curate. And the 109th section enacts, that in every case in which jurisdiction is given to the bishop of the diocese, or to any archbishop, under the provisions of this act, and for the purposes thereof, and the enforcing the due execution of the provisions thereof, all other and concurrent jurisdictions in respect thereof shall wholly cease; and no other jurisdiction in relation to the provisions of this act shall be used, exercised or enforced, save and except such jurisdiction of the bishop and archbishop under this act.

It may be open to doubt whether the shutting up one of two churches in a parish where divine worship is required to be performed in both, comes within the meaning of the words "inadequate performance of ecclesiastical duties," and can be dealt with as falling under the 77th section. But assuming that it might, if the act done involves an ecclesiastical offence, does the 109th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106 compel the bishop to adopt the course pointed out by the statute, not for visiting the offence, but for enforcing the proper performance of the duties which, by reason of the offence, have been inadequately performed? The words of the 109th section are, that no other jurisdiction in relation to the provisions of the act shall be used. Therefore, if the bishop were proceeding to compel the appellant to appoint a curate, he must have pursued the course prescribed by the act, and have issued a preliminary commission of inquiry. But his proceeding being for an offence committed by the appellant against the Common Ecclesiastical Law, the jurisdiction of the Court is not taken away by the 109th section, and the suit is properly instituted under the Church Discipline Act.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the appellant by shutting up the church at Sydmonton, and refusing to perform divine service there, notwithstanding the mandate of the bishop, has committed an ecclesiastical offence, and they will, therefore, humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the judgment of the Arches Court should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

IN THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK'S COURT. March 3, 6, 1869.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK, assisted by the RIGHT HON. LORD CHELMSFORD.

SEDGWICK v. THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER.

38 L. J. Ecc. 30.

*Unconsecrated Chapel—Curate without Nomination or Stipend—Revocation of Licence by Bishop—Appeal—*36 Geo. 3. c. 83. s. 6—1 & 2 Vict. c. 106. s. 98.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—The Rev. J. E. Sedgwick, a duly ordained clergyman of the Church of England, was licensed by the Bishop of Manchester to perform divine service within an unconsecrated church, which was built by subscription, in the city and diocese of Manchester. Mr. Sedgwick had no nomination or stipend, and no district was assigned to the church. His licence having been revoked by the bishop, Mr. Sedgwick appealed to the archbishop of the province:—Held, by Lord Chelmsford (acting as assessor with the Archbishop of York), that the appellant was not a licensed curate within the meaning of the 36 Geo. 3. c. 83. s. 6, or 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106. s. 98, and that no appeal lay from the decision of the bishop.

This was an appeal by the Rev. John Edmund Sedgwick, clerk, against the revocation of his licence to perform divine service in a certain unconsecrated church, by the Bishop of Manchester, under these circumstances:

In 1857 the appellant was authorized by licence, under the hand of the Lord Bishop of Manchester, to perform divine service in a certain school-room in Moulton Street, Manchester, according to the Rubric of the Church of England; and in 1864 the licence was transferred to a new building, which was built by subscription and intended for a church. The licence ran as follows:—"We, James Prince, by divine permission Lord Bishop of Manchester, in accordance with the prayer of two certain petitions this day presented to us, hereby give and grant our full leave, licence and authority unto the Rev. John Edmund Sedgwick, M.A., to perform divine service in the new church situate in the Waterloo Road, in the city of Manchester, in our diocese of Manchester, called or known by the name of 'St. Albans,' according to the Rubric of the Church of England, and not otherwise or in any other manner, and we being certified as to the consent of the dean and canons of the cathedral church of Manchester having been obtained hereto. And we hereby revoke and make void the licence heretofore granted by us for performance of divine service in a certain school-room or building in Moulton Street, Strangeways, in the city of Manchester. Given under our hand this 20th day of December, 1864."

The church was unconsecrated, and the cathedral was the parish church of the parish in which it was situate. The appellant had no nomination or stipend; no district was assigned to the church, and the disposition of the offertory was to be in accordance with the directions of the bishop as ordinary. Complaints having been made as to the manner in which the services were conducted at St. Albans, a long correspondence took place between the appellant and the bishop, who ultimately, on November 2, 1868, revoked his licence and prohibited him from officiating or performing any ecclesiastical duties within the church of St. Albans, or elsewhere within the diocese. From this decision Mr. Sedgwick appealed; and the appeal came on for hearing on March 3, before the Lord Archbishop of York, assisted by the Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford, at Westminster.

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge) (with him Charles), for the appellant.

Dr. Deane (with him Bayford), for the Bishop of Manchester, took a preliminary objection to the jurisdiction of the archbishop to entertain the appeal, Mr. Sedgwick not being a licensed curate within the meaning of the 36 Geo. 3. c. 83. s. 6, or the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106. s. 98. He was simply the minister of an unconsecrated chapel—Hodgson v. Dillon (2 Curt. 393).

The Solicitor-General, contra, maintained that the appellant was a licensed curate within the meaning of the acts in question, and that the appeal lay to the archbishop of the province. He referred to Poole v. the Bishop of London (5 Jurist, N.S. 522).

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord Chelmsford (March 6) delivered the following judgment on behalf of the archbishop:

In this case the counsel for the Bishop of Manchester has taken a preliminary objection to my jurisdiction to entertain Mr. Sedgwick's appeal, and after hearing arguments on both sides, and carefully considering the question (with the assistance of Lord Chelmsford), I feel compelled to yield to the objection.

The following are shortly the facts connected with the grant of the licence from the revocation of which the appeal is made:

Mr. Sedgwick, on July 14, 1857, was licensed by the Bishop of Manchester to perform divine service in a room or building in Moulton Street, Manchester, according to the Rubric of the Church of England. Divine service was performed in this room or building under the licence until the month of December, 1864, when a building intended for a church to be called St. Albans Church, having been erected by subscription, upon a petition presented to the bishop by the subscribers, praying that this new building might be licensed for the performance of divine service therein, in the place and stead of the room in Moulton Street, the bishop, on December 20, 1864, granted his licence to Mr. Sedgwick, "to perform divine service in the new church situate in Waterloo Road, called or known by the name of St. Albans, according to the Rubric of the Church of England, and not otherwise or in any other manner." And the bishop thereby revoked and made void the licence theretofore granted for performance of divine service in the room or building in Moulton Street. This new church has never been consecrated, but Mr. Sedgwick commenced the performance of divine service therein at the date of the licence, and continued it down to November 2, 1868, when the bishop revoked the licence.

In support of the right to appeal from this revocation of the licence, the Solicitor-General, on behalf of Mr. Sedgwick, founded himself upon the statutes 36 Geo. 3. c. 83. s. 6, and the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106. s. 98.

To consider these in their order. The title of the statute 36 Geo. 3. is "An act for the further support and maintenance of curates within the Church of England, and for making certain regulations respecting such curates." The 6th section begins with a recital that it is expedient that the authority of ordinaries to license curates and to remove licensed curates should be further explained, enlarged and confirmed, and then enacts, "That it shall be lawful for the ordinary to license any curate who is or shall be actually employed by the rector, vicar or other incumbent of any parish church or chapel although no express nomination of such curate shall have been made either in words or in writing to the ordinary by the said rector, vicar or other incumbent." No doubt can be entertained upon this part of the section that the authority conferred upon the bishop extends only to a particular description of curates, viz., those "employed by the rector, vicar or other incumbent of any parish church or chapel." Therefore, when the section goes on to empower the ordinary to revoke licences it might naturally be expected that this power would be confined to the revocation of licences of the kind previously mentioned. But the learned counsel for Mr. Sedgwick argued from the general expressions afterwards used that the legislature meant to confer upon the ordinary by this section a larger authority to revoke than to license. The words following those already mentioned are, "and that" (apparently continuing to deal with the same subject) "the ordinary shall have power to revoke summarily and without process any licence granted to any curate employed within his jurisdiction, and to remove such curate for such good and reasonable cause as he shall prove." Although the language of the section is here more general than in the preceding part of it, yet, having regard to the scope and object of its provisions, to the connexion of the latter part with that which precedes it, and to the word "employed," which can hardly have been intended to bear a different meaning in different parts of the same section, the only reasonable construction of the words "any curate employed within the ordinary's jurisdiction," appears to be not employed by any person and in any place, but employed by the incumbent of any parish church or chapel to assist him in performing divine service in such church or chapel.

The 36 Geo. 3, therefore, does not apply to Mr. Sedgwick's case, and there can be no appeal to me under that statute.

Turning to the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, it appears to have been passed, as the title expresses it, "to abridge the holding of benefices in plurality, and to make better provision for the residence of the clergy," and all its enactments with respect to curates must be considered with reference to this primary object of the statute. The 98th section relates to the licensing curates employed by non-resident incumbents. It enacts, "That it shall be lawful for the bishop to license any curate who is or shall be actually employed by any non-resident incumbent of any benefice within his diocese, although no express nomination of such curate shall have been made to such bishop by the incumbent." This part of the section clearly applies to one description of curates only, namely, a curate employed by a non-resident incumbent. The section then proceeds to give the bishop power to revoke licences in these words: "And that" (the same observation applying as to the connexion of the different parts of the section by these words as was made when considering the 36 Geo. 3.) "the bishop shall have power, after having given to the curate sufficient opportunity of shewing reason to the contrary, to revoke," &c. What is meant here by the words "the curate"? What can it mean but a curate of the only description previously mentioned? If, then, the introduction of the power to revoke licences necessarily applies to those licences only which there is a previous authority given to the bishop to grant, no words subsequently used, however large, can extend the limits of this power. The Solicitor-General contended, however, that the legislature by the words following the word "revoke" meant to extend the power of revocation to all licensed curates of whatever description. The words relied upon by him are, "to revoke summarily and without further process any licence granted to any curate, and to remove such curate for any cause which shall appear to such bishop to be good and reasonable." It is to be observed that the words are not any curate within the diocese, but merely "any curate," words which may fairly be construed to mean a curate of the particular description previously mentioned. This reference of the general words to the previous specific description renders the section consistent throughout, while, on the other hand, it is difficult, upon the construction contended for, to understand why the legislature, having proposed to deal with licences to be granted to a particular description of curates only, should have departed from that intention in the course of the same section, and have extended not the grant of licences, but the power of revoking them, to licensed curates of every description.

It appears to me that an appeal from the Bishop of Manchester is not open to Mr. Sedgwick under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106. any more than under the 36 Geo. 3. c. 83.

But assuming for the moment that the sections of the two statutes are not limited to curates employed by resident or non-resident incumbents, but that they are extended to every description of licensed curates within a diocese, it was necessary for Mr. Sedgwick to satisfy me that the licence granted to him by the bishop had the effect of constituting him a curate within the meaning of the acts by which the right of appeal is given.

The Solicitor-General insisted that the licence to Mr. Sedgwick to perform divine service in the unconsecrated church called St. Albans virtually gave him the cure of souls within a certain district in Manchester, and thereby made him a curate in the proper sense of the word.

It is to be observed, however, that no district has ever been assigned to the church of St. Albans, and that the supposed cure of souls merely amounts to this, that by the licensing of the building an opportunity is afforded to persons in the neighbourhood to resort to it for the purpose of divine worship.

The Solicitor General further argued that Mr. Sedgwick was, in fact, curate to the Dean of Manchester, within whose parish the new church is situate, but this argument overlooks the fact that the church is an unconsecrated building. If it had been consecrated there might have been some ground for contending, that it would have been the duty of the dean, as rector, to have provided for the performance of divine service in the church, as it would then have been a consecrated church or chapel within the parish. But there was no obligation on the rector to provide for divine service being performed in an unconsecrated, though licensed, building, and Mr. Sedgwick doing duty in the church solely under the authority of the licence can in no sense be considered as having acted as a curate to the Dean of Manchester.

The licence granted to Mr. Sedgwick is of an entirely different character from that which is ordinarily given to a licensed curate. By the ordinary form of licence to a curate the bishop gives and grants to him " licence and authority to perform the office of stipendiary curate in a certain parish or place within the diocese, in preaching the word of God and in reading the common prayers, and performing all other ecclesiastical duties belonging to the said office according to the form prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer and the Canons and Constitutions in that behalf lawfully established and promulgated." The licence to Mr. Sedgwick (as already stated) is merely to perform divine service in the new church of St. Albans according to the Rubric of the Church of England, and not otherwise or in any other manner. In the words of Dr. Lushington, in Hodgson v. Dillon (2 Curt. 393), slightly varied, " this is not an ordinary licence to a stipendiary curate, but it confers the nondescript title of minister of an unconsecrated church."

It was said that the Bishop of Manchester shewed by the terms in which he revoked the licence that he did not consider Mr. Sedgwick's duties to be confined to the church of St. Albans, because in revoking the licence he not only prohibited Mr. Sedgwick " from officiating or performing any ecclesiastical duties within the new church, but also elsewhere within his diocese."

These latter words, however, do not necessarily import that Mr. Sedgwick was at the time of the revocation of his licence performing any ecclesiastical duties elsewhere than in the church of St. Albans, but merely prohibit him for the future from performing any such duties within the diocese.

It is only necessary to add, that Mr. Sedgwick's position was different in one important respect from that of an ordinary licensed curate. Under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, a curate is liable to a penalty if he quits the curacy to which he has been licensed without giving three months' notice to the incumbent and to the bishop of the diocese; but Mr. Sedgwick was under no obligation to act upon the licence granted to him, but he might at any time have discontinued the performance of divine service in the church of St. Albans without any previous notice, and without incurring any penal consequences.

For the above reasons, I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Sedgwick's appeal is incompetent, and I must decline to entertain it.

Church-Rate—Money advanced by Commissioners for Public Works for repairing and altering Parish Church—Money expended on Chancel—5 Geo. 4. c. 36. s. 1.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—In a suit for subtraction of church-rate made to repay a sum of money advanced by the Commissioners of Public Works, under the provisions of the 5 Geo. 4. c. 36, for the repair and alteration of the parish church, the defendant brought in a responsive allegation, to the effect that the burden of repairing the chancel of the parish church rested upon the impropriate rector thereof; that a considerable portion of the money advanced by the Commissioners was expended in the repair and alteration of the chancel, and that consequently the rate was null and void:—Held, 1, that the term "church" in the statute includes the chancel, and that therefore the expenditure on the chancel was a legal expenditure; 2, that, assuming the chancel not to be included in the word "church," the misappropriation of the loan in the manner alleged would not have a retroactive effect on the loan, so as to vitiate the rate. The Court accordingly declared the responsive allegation inadmissible, and ordered it to be reformed.

This was a suit for subtraction of church-rate, brought by letters of request under the hands of the Vicar General and Official Principal of the Consistorial Court of Lincoln, and promoted by John Rippin and Benjamin John Wilson, the churchwardens of the parish of Harmston, in the diocese and county of Lincoln, against John Bastin, an inhabitant and ratepayer of such parish.

The libel stated that in the year 1867, the parish church of Harmston being in a very dilapidated state, on May 2 it was determined at a meeting in vestry of the parishioners and occupiers assessed to the relief of the poor of the said parish that the sum of money requisite for the purpose of repairing, re-seating, and otherwise extending the accommodation in such church, amounted to the sum of 1,076*l.* 10*s.*, and that the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish should, with the consent of the bishop of the diocese and the incumbent of the parish, make application to the Commissioners for Public Works, under the provisions of the 5 Geo. 4. c. 36, for a loan of the sum of 775*l.*, being a part of the sum of money requisite for the purposes aforesaid. No amendment was moved to such resolution, and no poll was demanded. It further stated that the bishop of the diocese and the incumbent of the parish had, by a writing under their respective hands, consented to the application being so made for the purpose of repairing, re-seating and otherwise extending the accommodation of the parish church of Harmston. It then stated that the application was made to the Commissioners, that the money was advanced and expended for the purposes set out in the application, that the first instalment of the loan had become due and been demanded, and that a rate had been made to meet the demand, which the defendant, among others, had refused to pay.

An allegation was brought in on the part of the defendant to the following effect: 1, that by the laws now in force the duty of repairing the chancel of the parish church of Harmston lies upon the impropriate rector thereof, and that others the inhabitants and occupiers assessed to the relief of the poor of the parish of Harmston are not chargeable with or in any manner bound to contribute to the repairs of the chancel of the church of the said parish; 2, that the notice and resolution set out in the libel had reference to certain repairs and alterations intended to be done in and upon the chancel of the said church as well as to those in the said notice and resolution mentioned, and that the sum of 1,076*l.* 10*s.* in the said resolution mentioned included moneys requisite for the repairs and alterations so intended to be done in and upon the chancel; 3, that the said churchwardens and overseers did not expend the sum of 775*l.* in the manner alleged, but, on the contrary, expended some considerable portion thereof in repairs and alterations done in and upon the said chancel; 4, that the consent of the then Bishop of Lincoln and the advance made by the Commissioners were given and made respectively upon the footing and representation that the said sum of 1,076*l.* 10*s.* was required for the purposes set out in the said resolution, and did not include any moneys required for repairs and alterations in the chancel; 5, that by reason of the premises, the pretended rate was not duly made under the provisions of the act 5 Geo. 4. c. 36, but is null and void, and the respondent cannot be called upon to pay the same.

Prideaux and Dr. Middleton, opposed the admission of the allegation.—There is nothing to lead the Court to doubt that the word "church" in the statute does include the chancel, and that consequently the application of the money borrowed in part to repairs and alterations in the chancel was legal. Moreover, as the Commissioners had obtained the requisite consents before they advanced the money, they could not be deprived of their security for repayment by reason that subsequently the churchwardens misapplied a portion of the money advanced.

Dr. Deane and Bayford, for the defendant, contended that inasmuch as the parishioners are not liable for the repairs of the chancel, the statute could not have intended to charge the rates with the repayment of money to be expended on such repairs; that if the statute did not require the consent of the lay rector to an application to the Commissioners, it was by reason that the term "church" was not meant to include the chancel. If the churchwardens have misappropriated the loan, the Commissioners may have a remedy against them; they have none against the parish. They referred to White v. Steele (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 382; 31 L. J. C.P. 265).

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE (April 30).—In this case a libel has been given in for the recovery of a church-rate made under the authority of 5 Geo. 4, c. 36, which empowers the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of any parish in England or Wales, with the consent of the major part of the inhabitants and occupiers assessed to the relief of the poor in vestry assembled, and with the consent of the bishop of the diocese and the incumbent of such parish, to make application to the Commissioners of Public Works for an advance of such sum of money as may be necessary for defraying the expense of rebuilding or repairing the parish church, and to make a rate or rates for the repayment of the sum so advanced, with interest.—[Having referred to the libel as already set out, the learned Judge continued:]—Such being in substance the libel or the statement on the part of those who are suing for the rate, a responsive plea has been given in by Bastin, the effect of which I have now to consider. It states that, by the law now in force within this realm, the duty of repairing the chancel of the parish church of Harmston aforesaid lies upon the impropriate rector thereof, and that others the inhabitants and occupiers assessed to the relief of the poor of the parish of Harmston are not chargeable with the repairs of the chancel. It states, secondly, that the notice and resolution set out in the libel had reference to certain repairs and alterations intended to be made in and upon the chancel of the said church of the parish of Harmston, as well as to those in the said notice and resolution mentioned, and that the sum of 1,076*l.* 10*s.* in the same resolution mentioned included moneys requisite for the repairs and alterations so intended to be done in and upon the chancel. Thirdly, that the churchwardens and overseers did not expend the sum of 775*l.* in the manner alleged, but, on the contrary, expended some considerable portion thereof in repairs and alterations done in and upon the chancel. Fourthly, that the consent of the Bishop of Lincoln and the advance made by the Commissioners were given and made respectively upon the footing and representation that the said sum of 1,076*l.* 10*s.* was required for the purposes set out in the resolution, and did not include any moneys required for repairs and alterations of the chancel; and, fifthly, that by reason of these premises the rate was null and void.

Now, it is to be observed that the responsive plea does not set up this kind of defence, namely, that the proceedings were irregularly had, or that the requisitions of the act were not duly complied with; and these observations bring me to the consideration of the case which was cited by counsel for the respondent—White v. Steele (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 382; 31 L. J. C.P. 265). In that case it was decided that the plain words of the statute (3 Geo. 4, c. 72) empower the Commissioners to act only in cases where the parish is desirous that they should act. "The desire of the parish," the Court said, "legally expressed, appears to us a condition precedent, without which any order on the part of the Commissioners is devoid of legal force. And surely this is a reasonable construction when it is considered that to hold the order of the Commissioners binding, without the desire of the parish, would be to invest them with arbitrary power of inflicting pecuniary burdens and imposing taxes." The marginal note gives a fair statement of the case: "A meeting of vestry was held for the purpose of considering the propriety of purchasing an additional burial-ground for the parish of P. A resolution to that effect having been put and agreed to by a majority of those present, a poll was demanded and refused. The resolution of the vestry was communicated to the Church Building Commissioners, who thereupon authorized the parish to purchase the land, and to levy rates to defray the expense, under 59 Geo. 3, c. 134, s. 25, and 3 Geo. 4, c. 72, s. 26. Money was accordingly borrowed by the churchwardens and a rate made. A parishioner declining to pay the rate, on the ground of invalidity, the churchwardens instituted against him a suit in the Consistory Court, in which suit the respondent tendered a responsive allegation, stating that at the vestry a poll had been duly demanded and refused. The Judge of the Consistory Court having declined to admit this responsive allegation, the respondent appealed to the Court of Arches, by which Court the decision of the Court below was affirmed. Upon application to this Court for a writ of prohibition, on the ground that the Judge of the Consistory Court had improperly refused to receive the responsive allegation, the applicant was directed to declare in prohibition; and he having done so, it was held that there had been no legal expression of the desire of the parish, and consequently that the responsive allegation ought to have been admitted to proof in the Ecclesiastical Court."

Now that case is only distinguished by that circumstance from the case which is now before me. There was no legal resolution of the parish, which is a necessary condition precedent to enable the churchwardens to borrow the money. A poll was demanded and refused. The Court of Common Pleas held that they had a right to examine whether the condition precedent specified in the statute had been complied with or not, which the Ecclesiastical Courts thought they could not examine into; and therefore that the party who set up as a defence for nonpayment of the rate the fact that this condition had not been complied with, had advanced a fair plea which ought to be admitted; consequently, they granted the prohibition. But in this case there is no statement whatever that the proceedings of the vestry had not been perfectly regular. There is no suggestion that a poll was demanded or refused, or that the usual, ordinary and regular proceedings were not had in the case. I therefore dismiss as an authority the case of White v. Steele (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 382; 31 L. J. C.P. 265) as having, properly speaking, no bearing on the present question.

The plea set up in the second paragraph of the allegation is a very singular one, and, so far as I know, unprecedented—that there was an unexpressed intention of making alterations in the chancel as well as in the church. Now, according to the usage and practice of this Court, reformed by recent orders, it is necessary, as in Courts of equity, that the principal facts relied on should be stated, and that rule of the Court is not complied with by the bare statement that something was intended to be done which is not expressed on the face of the resolution. The overt act, from which that intention is inferred, should be stated. If there were a writing to that effect, or a declaration to that effect, it should be properly pleaded. Here it is a statement of an inference rather than a fact, and the Court is asked to infer the intention from the subsequent application of the money borrowed from the Commissioners. Another objection relied on is, that, as a matter of fact, some of the money so advanced by the Commissioners was spent upon the repairs of the chancel; and the plea states also that the bishop would not have given his consent nor the Commissioners have advanced the money if they had known the true facts. But it is not denied that the bishop did consent, and it is not denied that the money was advanced, and no ground whatever is stated in the plea from which I can infer that the bishop did not give his consent or the Commissioners advance the money upon the knowledge of the true facts.

Setting aside, however, all technical matters, in reality and substance the plea raises two questions of law: first, whether the words in the statute which relate to the "rebuilding, repairing, enlarging, or otherwise extending the accommodation in any church," include the chancel or not? and secondly, whether, assuming that the statute does not provide for the repair or alteration of the chancel, an improper expenditure of the money properly raised in compliance with the provisions of the act can have a retroactive effect, so as to invalidate the original loan?

Now, with regard to the first question, the words of the statute are these: "From and after the passing of this act, it shall and may be lawful for the churchwardens or chapelwardens and overseers of the poor of any parish in England or Wales, with the consent of the major part of the inhabitants and occupiers assessed to the relief of the poor, in vestry assembled, &c., and with the consent of the bishop of the diocese and the incumbent of such parish, to make application to the Commissioners authorized and empowered to make advances for public works for any loan or advance of such sum or sums as shall be necessary for defraying the expense, or any part of the expense, of rebuilding, repairing, enlarging, or otherwise extending the accommodation in any church or chapel of any such parish." It is quite true that the word "chancel" is not mentioned, and the proposition of law is also correct, that, by the general usage and by the common law, subject to certain exceptions, the burden of repairing the nave of the church is cast upon the parishioners, and of repairing the chancel upon the rector. From these two premises I am asked to draw the conclusion that the rebuilding, repairing, or otherwise extending the accommodation of the church, which included the chancel, would not be one of the objects contemplated by the act; and it is said also that there would be an injustice to hold otherwise, because then the rector may be compelled to discharge a portion of the debt which is thrown exclusively upon the parishioners for the repairs of the church, and, vice versa, that the parishioners, who are now exempt from repairing the chancel, may be compelled to do so. Now, I think that no injustice would result from my holding that the word "church" included the "chancel" in this case, having regard to the fact that the previous consent both of the bishop and incumbent is required, as a necessary condition precedent to the expense being incurred. I am not prepared to hold that the term "incumbent" would necessarily include a "lay rector." No authority was cited which would warrant me in arriving at that conclusion; but, as to the word "church" in the statute, I think that the legislature used it in its usual and common sense of including the whole building, and that manifest inconvenience would result from any other construction. It might be almost impossible in many cases to repair the body of the church without at the same time making some alterations in the chancel; and certainly it would be an unseemly thing that the whole of the body of the church should be repaired, enlarged or extended for the accommodation of the parishioners, and the chancel left in a condition utterly at variance with that of the rest of the building. I do not dwell so very much upon the argument in favour of this construction which was urged by counsel by reference to the 3rd section of the statute. I think that that section refers to a separate class of cases altogether, and in some cases this difficulty of the chancel would not arise.

There remains the second question, whether, supposing I am wrong in holding that the legislature intended to include the chancel, and that a portion of the money was improperly applied to the repairs of the chancel, whether such improper expenditure could have a retroactive effect on the original loan, so as to vitiate the rate? I am clearly of opinion that it could not; and I think, therefore, that upon both grounds this responsive plea is inadmissible. The order that I will make is, that the plea be sent back for the purpose of being reformed in respect of those matters which have formed the subject of my judgment; and if the parties desire permission to appeal, I shall of course give it.

CONSISTORY COURT OF LONDON. March 22, May 7, 1869.

EVANS v. SLACK AND SMITH.

38 L. J. Ecc. 38.

Faculty—Re-seating a Church—Opposition of the Parishioners—No Increased Accommodation offered.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—The rector of a parish church applied for a faculty to make certain alterations, at his own expense, in the furniture and fittings of the church, which were not in a dilapidated state. The churchwardens, acting on behalf of the parishioners, opposed the grant of the faculty. The applicant having failed to shew either that the existing arrangements in the fittings of the church were so inconvenient and uncomfortable as to deter the parishioners from attending divine service, or that the proposed alterations were so clearly for the increased comfort and advantage of the parishioners as to induce the Court to overrule their opposition, the faculty was refused.

This was an application by the Rev. Alfred Bowen Evans, clerk, D.D., rector of the parish of St. Mary-le-Strand, in the county of Middlesex, for a faculty authorizing him to remove the whole of the present sittings in the chancel and nave of the church of such parish, also a portion of the flooring in the chancel and at the west end of the church, the communion-table, communion rails and gates, and for other purposes.

The defendants, John William Slack and George Smith, were the churchwardens of the parish.

In the original petition Dr. Evans, as the ground of his application, alleged that the present pews or seats are inconveniently arranged, and that the alterations are required in the church for the comfort and convenience of the inhabitants resorting thereto for the purpose of divine worship, and that by such alterations twenty-eight additional seats would be gained.

In the statement brought in on behalf of the defendants certain proceedings on the part of Dr. Evans in the celebration of divine worship were set out at some length, and the result stated to be that great dissatisfaction had been caused in the parish, and many parishioners had ceased to attend divine service in the church in consequence thereof; that in July, 1868, Dr. Evans had proposed at a vestry then assembled that the parish should consent to an application for a faculty for the re-pewing and other alterations he now applied for, but no person was willing to second the proposition. That, on August 3, 1868, the citation or decree in this suit was served upon the defendants, and at a meeting of the vestry, held on August 14, 1868, the parishioners thereat assembled unanimously authorized the churchwardens to enter an appearance to the citation, and to set forth that the opinion of the inhabitants is adverse to the proposed alterations. The statement further alleged that the pews and seats in the church are made of oak, as good as new, conveniently arranged, handsome in appearance and suitable in character to the architecture of the church; that the thirty-nine pews would each hold seven persons, and in addition there was room for twenty benches, capable of seating three persons each.

In the subsequent pleadings it was admitted on behalf of Dr. Evans that the number of sittings provided for under the amended plan would not be greater than that afforded in the church at present, and it was alleged and proved that, except as to height, the new seats would offer no advantages over the present ones.

Affidavits were filed on both sides. Only one parishioner, Mr. C. K. Watson, secretary to the Society of Antiquaries, supported Dr. Evans's averment that it is impossible to stand, sit or kneel in the present seats with comfort.

Dr. Deane and Dr. Tristram appeared for Dr. Evans.—They contended that as it was not intended to put the parish to any expense for the re-pewing the church, the Court, in exercising its discretion, would not be influenced by the opposition of the vestry and parishioners, such opposition being induced, not by any real objection to the alterations, but by entirely extraneous circumstances. They referred to Groves v. the Rector, Parishioners and Inhabitants of Hornsey (1 Cons. Rep. 189).

A. J. Stephens and Dr. Middleton, for the churchwardens.—The Court has no right to remove the fittings of the church, which are the property of the parishioners, without their consent and against their wishes, unless indeed they are in a dilapidated state or unsuited for the purposes for which they are intended. Such is not the case in this church. Moreover, if the Court sanctions these alterations the accommodation for the parishioners will be diminished, whilst opportunity will be given for objectionable ceremonies. They referred to Jackson v. Singer (37 L. J. Ecc. 9).

Cur. adv. vult.

Sir Travers Twiss (May 7).—This is an application on behalf of the Rev. Alfred Bowen Evans, rector of the parish church of St. Mary-le-Strand, for a faculty to authorize him to remove the whole of the furniture and fittings of the interior of the said parish church, including the chancel thereof, to raise the floor of the said chancel and re-pave the same together with the floor of the nave of the church, and to refit the nave and chancel with furniture of an altered character, the whole of the expense of the same to be defrayed by the said rector. Upon the application being lodged in the registry a citation was issued in due course, calling upon all persons to shew cause against the grant, and an appearance was given on behalf of the churchwardens of the parish, who prayed to be heard upon their petition against the grant of the faculty, and who gave in their act on petition.—[After stating the character of the pleadings the learned Judge continued]—The counsel who have appeared in support of the application of the rector have contended that the question for the Court to consider and determine in this case is, whether it would be for the benefit and advantage of the parishioners that the proposed alterations should be made, and that the Court ought to grant the faculty if it be in its judgment desirable, notwithstanding the whole parish should object to it; and in support of this position the Court has been referred to the case of Groves v. the Rector, Parishioners and Inhabitants of Hornsey (1 Cons. Rep. 189) in which Lord Stowell observed, "That the Court is not bound by the mere circumstance of a majority, for it may refuse the whole parish joined together, or may grant, if it appear necessary, a prayer on the application of one against all the rest." There can be no doubt that the Court has an absolute discretion in regard to such a faculty as was applied for in the case cited, namely, a faculty to erect a gallery in a parish church upon the application of the churchwardens. But even in such a case, Lord Stowell observed, that, although the Court is not "bound by the wish of the majority, it will pay great attention to it." The Court has also been referred to the case of Butt v. Jones (2 Hag. Ecc. 424). That was a case of appeal against the grant of a faculty by the Consistory Court of Gloucester for erecting and appropriating a pew to a messuage, and the faculty was revoked by the Court of Appeal. Sir John Nicholl, in the course of his judgment, observed that "faculties are to be granted at the discretion of the Ordinary, but it must be a sound discretion, having a due regard to times and circumstances and to the rights and interests of all parties concerned; if an unsound discretion be exercised, the party may appeal to a superior tribunal."

Neither of these cases is precisely in point, inasmuch as the present application is for a faculty to remove and alter the communion-table, the communion rails, the pulpit, the font, and the whole of the sittings in the nave of the church as well as in the chancel, none of which are stated to be in a dilapidated state, and the whole of which have been provided at the expense of the parishioners, being such furniture and fittings as they are bound by law to provide. It is not an application to add anything which may be for the greater convenience of divine service, but which the parishioners are not bound to provide, such as an organ, or which may be for the additional accommodation of the parishioners, as in the case of a gallery, inasmuch as the evidence fails altogether to make out the case set up by the rector in his original application, that by the proposed alterations additional sittings will be gained. It is an application, in fact, on the part of the rector to be allowed to make these alterations at his own expense, with a view to increase the comfort and convenience of the parishioners generally, and especially of the poorer inhabitants of the parish, who are deterred, as he alleges, from attending divine service by reason of the present insufficient accommodation.

The Court has therefore to consider, in the first place, whether the rector has established his position, that the present sittings are very inconvenient and ill adapted for public worship, and that the parishioners are deterred thereby from attending divine service, and that the proposed refitting of the church, if carried out, will not merely conduce to the comfort and convenience of the parishioners generally, but will be a great inducement to the poorer inhabitants of the parish, who have hitherto absented themselves from divine service, to attend the same.

Now, it has been observed by Lord Stowell, in the Hornsey case (1 Cons. Rep. 189), that "the parishioners in the first instance are the best judges of an inconvenience, and of a remedy for that inconvenience," and the Court in this instance would reasonably expect that the rector's statements would be supported by a considerable body of parishioners, who are sensible of the great inconvenience of the present arrangements of the church. But the rector's evidence on this part of the case is confined to three affidavits, two of which are from non-parishioners, who state that they have been regular attendants at his church for many years, and that the sittings are most inconvenient and uncomfortable; but neither of these witnesses deposes that any of the inhabitants of the parish are deterred from attending divine service by reason of the uncomfortable character of the accommodation.

The third witness on behalf of the rector is a resident in the parish, and he states that he has been a regular attendant at the parish church throughout Dr. Evans's incumbency, and his affidavit is to the effect that the sittings now in use in the church are as incommodious as they are unsightly. "I do not know," he says, "of any position of the human body available during divine service, in which they are not in the highest degree irksome." He further states, that "the pulpit is so high that in many parts of the church it is difficult to hear even a preacher as distinct as Dr. Evans. The pulpit cannot be lowered without diminishing the now excessive height of the pews." This witness does not say that any of the parishioners are deterred from attending divine service by the excessive discomfort of the accommodation.

Now, it lies upon the rector to establish the affirmative of his position, that the inhabitants of the parish are deterred by the uncomfortable character of the sittings from attending divine service, and I am bound to say that the affidavits brought in by the rector give no support to this averment. On the other hand, it appears from the affidavits of the churchwardens that they took measures to bring to the attention of the parishioners generally the substance of the allegation of the rector, by directing the beadle to deliver at every house printed questions as to whether the arrangement of the present sittings deterred any of the parishioners from attending divine service in their parish church, and whether they had absented themselves from the church by reason of the insufficiency of comfort in the sittings; and the churchwardens swear that such of the papers as were returned, amounting in all to 122, were all signed in the negative. They have further brought in affidavits from fifty-five parishioners stating that "they have not been deterred from attending divine service by the arrangement of the sittings, nor have they absented themselves from the church by reason of the insufficiency of comfort in the sittings." They have also brought in two affidavits from two resident parishioners, one of whom, Mr. James Tennant, states that he has been an inhabitant ratepayer of the parish for twenty-eight years, and that until the last five years he was a regular attendant at divine service in his parish church. He swears that the pews and seats are not inconveniently arranged, and that he has ceased to attend at the said church, and has been obliged to resort elsewhere, by reason of the rector insisting on having two candles on the communion-table lighted during communion service. He also swears that several of the parishioners who had attended divine service at the parish church for many years have ceased to attend for the same reason. The second affidavit is from Mr. Matthew Percival Paris, who is also a resident parishioner, and who states that he has been a regular attendant at the church for twenty-three years, and that latterly he has abstained from attending as heretofore in the parish church for the same reasons as those alleged by Mr. Tennant, and he confirms that witness in his statement, that several of the parishioners have also discontinued attending their church on account of the practice of the rector in lighting candles on the communion-table. This witness also swears that he does not consider the pews or seats in the said church to be inconveniently arranged, and that during the whole period of the deponent's attendance at the said church the accommodation in the seats and pews as arranged was always sufficient for the average number of the parishioners who attended divine service. The result of this evidence is to satisfy the Court that the present sittings, although they may not be comfortable to all, and may be actually uncomfortable to some of the persons who are in the habit of attending divine service in the church of St. Mary-le-Strand, have not by their positive discomfort deterred any of the parishioners from attending divine service, and that the rector has failed altogether in sustaining the burden of proof which the law imposes upon him on this part of his case.

It remains for me to consider whether the proposed alterations are so clearly to the increased comfort and advantage of the parishioners that I ought to overrule the opposition to this faculty, which the vestry has instructed the churchwardens to sustain. Now, both the witnesses on the part of the rector, who are non-parishioners, affirm their belief that the proposed alterations will greatly conduce to the comfort of the congregation; and Mr. Watson, the third witness, who is an inhabitant parishioner, says that he cannot understand "on what grounds any plea can be advanced for keeping up the present sittings by parties who have not got to pay for pulling them down." On the other hand, the churchwardens have produced evidence to shew that, looking to the measurements of the old and new sittings, the new sittings will not afford more space, either as regards the distance from style to style, or the sitting room allowed for each member of the congregation, assuming the number of persons to be accommodated under the present and proposed arrangement of the sittings to be the same, than the present sittings do; and further, that the substitution of the seats as proposed by the rector in lieu of the present seats will render the occupants thereof more exposed to cold draughts, the church being very draughty by means of its isolated position, and that in fact in former years it was found necessary to erect a screen to certain pews then existing in the said church as a defence from the draught. Upon such evidence as this the Court cannot arrive at the conclusion that it is its duty to overrule the opposition of the vestry on the ground of the proposed alterations being clearly for the increased comfort and advantage of the parishioners. If, indeed, the present sittings had been in a dilapidated state, the argument addressed to the Court by the leading counsel for the rector would have been entitled to great weight, namely, that as the law would no longer enable vestries to levy compulsory church-rates for the repairs of the parish churches, the Court should listen with greater readiness than heretofore to any proposals on the part of an individual to make improvements in the architecture and fittings at his private expense, and should not require the consent of the parishioners as strictly as when the funds to make and to maintain such improvements were to be furnished by the parishioners themselves. But in the present case it is not shewn by the rector that the fittings of the church are dilapidated. On the contrary, an affidavit has been produced by the churchwardens from Mr. George Frederick Fry, an architect and surveyor, who says that the pews are in good repair, that they are conveniently arranged, handsome in appearance and suitable in character to the architecture of the church, and that the space to each of the congregation, at present, is amply sufficient for the comfort and convenience of each person in the position of standing, sitting or kneeling. I must, therefore, reject the application of the rector in this case, and decline to grant the faculty as prayed for.

IN THE COURT OF ARCHES. April 23, 30, 1869.

The Office of the Judge promoted by SHEPPARD, v. BENNETT.

Office of the Judge promoted in a Case of Heresy—Case sent in first instance by Letters of Request to Court of Arches without reason assigned—Discretion— 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86. ss. 11, 13.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—The Rev. William James Early Bennett, a clerk in holy orders, vicar of Frome Selwood, in the diocese of Bath and Wells, published, in the diocese of London, a work containing alleged heretical doctrines. The Bishop of London issued a commission to certain persons to inquire into the grounds of the charge. The Commissioners reported that there was a case for further inquiry, and the report and the evidence upon which it was founded were afterwards filed in the registry of the diocese of Bath and Wells. The Bishop of Bath and Wells thereupon sent the case by letters of request to the Court of Arches, as the Court of appeal of the province, to be there heard and determined, but assigned no reason for so doing.

The Court held that the discretion which it enjoyed previously to the passing of the Clergy Discipline Act of accepting or refusing letters of request was not affected by that act; that the case was one which the Ordinary might properly entertain; and declined to accept the letters until some reason was stated why it should do so.

This was an application to the Court of Arches to accept letters of request from the Bishop of Bath and Wells, under the provisions of the 13th section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, under these circumstances:

The Rev. William James Early Bennett, a clerk in holy orders, whose preferment was situated in the diocese of Bath and Wells, had published certain works within the diocese of London which were alleged to contain heretical doctrines. The then Bishop of London issued a commission to certain persons, to inquire into the grounds of the charge, and to report to him whether or no there was a case for further inquiry. The Commissioners reported that there was a case for further inquiry. The report and the evidence upon which it was founded were filed in the registry of the diocese of Bath and Wells, according to the requirements of the statute; but the Bishop of Bath and Wells, instead of hearing the matter himself in the first instance, now sent it by letters of request to the Court of Arches.

The letters of request were as follow: "Whereas we lately received from the Right Hon. and Right Rev. Father in God Archibald Campbell, then by divine permission Lord Bishop of London, but now by divine permission Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, &c., a copy of the report of the worshipful Sir Travers Twiss, Knight, D.C.L., the Chancellor of the diocese of London, the Ven. William Hale Hale, clerk, M.A., Archdeacon of London, the Ven. John Sinclair, clerk, M.A., Archdeacon of Middlesex, the Rev. John Edward Kemp, clerk, M.A., rural dean and rector of St. James's, Piccadilly, in the county of Middlesex and diocese of London, and the Rev. Frederick George Blomfield, clerk, M.A., rector of St. Andrew Undershaft, in the city and diocese of London, the Commissioners appointed in and by a certain commission under the hand and episcopal seal of the said then Lord Bishop of London, bearing date October 6, 1868, which said commission was issued by the said then Lord Bishop of London, by virtue of and in accordance with the provisions of an Act of Parliament made and passed in the session of Parliament holden in the third and fourth years of the reign of her present Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled, &c., and which said commission did enjoin, authorize and empower the said Commissioners, or any three of them, to make inquiry as to the grounds of a certain charge made by Thomas Byard Sheppard, of the parish of Frome Selwood, in the county of Somerset and our diocese of Bath and Wells, gentleman, a member of the United Church of England and Ireland, residing in the said parish, against the Rev. William James Early Bennett, a clerk in holy orders of the said United Church of England and Ireland, vicar of the said parish of Frome Selwood, the said charge being that he, the said William J. E. Bennett, had within the diocese of London committed an offence against the laws ecclesiastical of the realm, by having caused to be printed and published within the said diocese certain works in which he advisedly maintains or affirms doctrines directly contrary or repugnant to the articles and formularies of the United Church of England and Ireland, the said works being entitled respectively 'Some Results of the Tractarian Movement of 1835,' forming one of the essays contained in a volume entitled 'The Church and the World,' edited by the Rev. Orby Shipley, clerk, printed and published in London in 1867; 'A Plea for Toleration in the Church of England, in a letter to the Rev. E. B. Pusey, D.D., Regius Professor of Hebrew and Canon of Christ Church, Oxford,' second edition, printed and published in London in the year 1867; and the same book, third edition, printed and published in London in the year 1868, and containing the following, among other statements, in respect of which the said charge has been made, that is to say—[the extracts from the books were set out in detail.] And whereas it appears from the same report that the said Commissioners did assemble by virtue of the said commission in London House, St. James's Square, in the parish of St. James, Westminster, in the diocese of London, on Thursday, November 5, 1868, for the purpose of executing the said commission; that all the proceedings before the said Commissioners were public; that the said Commissioners did examine witnesses on oath in reference to the said charge, and did hear counsel on both sides (the said witnesses or some of them being cross-examined by counsel, alleging that he appeared on behalf of the said W. J. E. Bennett to appear at a certain time and place therein to be specified and answer to certain articles, heads, positions or interrogatories touching and concerning his soul's health, and the lawful correction and reformation of his manners and excesses, and more especially for having offended against the laws ecclesiastical by having within two years last past caused to be printed and published within the said diocese of London certain works in which he advisedly maintains or affirms doctrines directly contrary or repugnant to the Articles and formularies of the United Church of England and Ireland, the said works being entitled respectively, &c., ... the said Articles to be administered to him, the said William James Early Bennett, at the voluntary promotion of the said Thomas Byard Sheppard, and finally to hear and determine the said cause according to the law and practice of the Court. Dated April 9, 1869."

On April 23—

A. J. Stephens (with him Dr. Tristram) moved the Court to accept the letters of request, in order that the charges made against the respondent might be heard and determined.

[SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE.—No reason is set forth in the letters of request why I should accept them, or why the case has been sent to the Superior Court in the first instance.]

It is not necessary to allege any reason. The Court has no discretion in the matter, but is bound to accept the letters. He referred to section 13. of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, and Butler v. Dolben (2 Lee, 317).

Cur adv. vult

The following judgment was given on April 30:

SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE.—In this case an application has been made to the Court to accept letters of request from the Bishop of Bath and Wells, under the provisions of the 13th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, an Act for the Discipline of the Clergy.

It appears from the recital in these letters that the Rev. William James Early Bennett, a clerk in holy orders, vicar of Frome Selwood, has been charged with committing an offence against the laws ecclesiastical by the publication of a work containing heretical doctrines in the diocese of London. The preferment of the accused clerk was situated in the diocese of Bath and Wells; the alleged offence was committed in the diocese of London: therefore, if the accused clerk was to be criminally proceeded against in the Ecclesiastical Court the provisions of the statute to which I have referred rendered it necessary that these proceedings should be taken, in the first instance, under the authority of the bishop in whose diocese the alleged offence had been committed. The late Bishop of London issued a commission to certain persons to inquire into the grounds of the charge, and to report to him whether or no there was a case for further inquiry. They reported that there was a case for further inquiry. That report, and the evidence upon which it was founded, were afterwards filed in the registry of the diocese of Bath and Wells, according to the requirements of the statute; and it became necessary that any further proceedings in the matter should be carried on under the authority of that ordinary. The statute provides (section 11) that, after the report of the Commissioners, "The bishop shall proceed to hear the cause, with the assistance of three assessors. . . . And upon the hearing of such cause the bishop shall determine the same, and pronounce sentence thereupon according to the ecclesiastical law." The statute further provides (section 13) "That it shall be lawful for the bishop, ... if he shall think fit, either in the first instance or after the Commissioners shall have reported that there is sufficient primâ facie ground for instituting proceedings, and before the filing of the articles, but not afterwards, to send the case by letters of request to the Court of appeal of the province to be there heard and determined according to the law and practice of such Court." The Bishop of Bath and Wells has availed himself of this latter alternative, and has sent this case, by letters of request, to the Court of Arches.

It is to be here observed that the statute does not empower the bishop to send the case simpliciter to the Court of appeal, but to send it by letters of request to that Court. If these letters are accepted by me, and the request of the inferior Court complied with, a decree, which is equivalent to a citation, will issue from this Court, the accused clerk will be cited, and the trial will take place, in the first instance, before this Court. It has been argued that these letters of request are, in truth, letters of command, and that I have no option but to accept them. This argument is maintained both by reference to the express words of the statute of the Queen, and to the law and practice with respect to letters of request previously to the passing of that statute.

I am about to pronounce my opinion upon the soundness of this argument, and in order to make the conclusion at which I have arrived fully intelligible it will be necessary to state at some length the premises upon which it is founded. First of all, however, it may be well to consider the necessary consequences which flow from the position of law. It is the plain duty of every bishop, having regard both to the nature of his office and the obligations which at the time of his consecration he takes upon himself, to maintain, within his diocese, ecclesiastical discipline, and especially as to matters of heresy, such as are the subject of the present charge. But if the argument which has been addressed to me be sound, every bishop in the province of Canterbury may devolve at his own will and pleasure upon the Court of the archbishop the execution of the most arduous part of his duty as diocesan. It is not necessary that he should state any reason for so doing. The natural order of things is reversed, and the inferior sends a mandate to the superior Judge, which, without inquiry, he must obey. It is not too much to say that such an exposition of the law requires to be very clearly demonstrated before it can be accepted. Inasmuch as letters of request are the technical description of a proceeding appertaining to ecclesiastical law—words of art, so to speak, derived from that system of jurisprudence—the examination of the question naturally falls under the two following divisions: 1, the law which prevailed before the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86; 2, the law introduced by that statute. Upon the first division of the subject the following observations have occurred to me. It is hardly necessary to state that the proposition that a bishop can order his metropolitan or archbishop to do a particular act—such as to entertain a suit—is not to be found in the general ecclesiastical law. That law, as well as the common law of England, has indeed been careful to protect the bishop from any undue assumption of jurisdiction by the archbishop over him; but I am not aware of any instance in which the law has thought it necessary to protect the archbishop from the usurpation of his suffragan.

"Letters of request"—"literæ requisitoriales," as they are called in Oughton—are a form of procedure peculiar to the canon law, and certainly do not, in their natural construction, imply a command. A very learned Judge, however—Sir George Lee, in the case of Butler v. Dolben (2 Lee, 317)—is reported to have said, "As to the discretion of this Court, whether it shall accept or refuse letters of request when granted by a proper Judge, the delegates held in the case of Pelling v. Whiston (1 Comyns, 190), that the Dean of the Arches was bound to receive them ex debito justitiæ, but it was not in the discretion of the inferior Judge whether he would grant them." As this is, I believe, the only authority which can be cited in support of the position that the acceptance of letters of request is obligatory on the superior Court, I have thought it right to examine very carefully the circumstances of this case: they are very remarkable. The case of Pelling v. Whiston (1 Comyns, 190), which was argued in the year 1712-1713, happened at a time of great political excitement, in which the Church was largely concerned, and which was not without its influence on the proceedings in that case. I remember that Lord Stowell said, as to a case decided in 1719, in which religious and political feelings were much mixed up, "I shall pass over a case which has been cited from the State Trials, as it was one of party heat that took place in times of party ferment, and is of smaller authority on that account"—Hutchins v. Denziloe (Cons. Rep. 174). The history of the proceedings of this extraordinary case is to be found partly in Burnet's History of his own Times, vol. 6, partly in an account Whiston published of his own case in 1715, and partly in the note of Chief Baron Comyns (who was one of the counsel in the cause) of the proceedings before the delegates —Comyns's Rep. p. 199. As the delegates never gave reasons for their judgment, but little information is to be extracted from the record of their proceedings Towards the close of the year 1710, Convocation had been summoned by the Queen for the transaction of business, mainly, if not exclusively, that it might pass a synodical judgment upon the writings of Whiston. Great doubt arose as to whether it was competent to that body to censure heretical doctrines and their maintainers. The opinion of the twelve Judges and of the law officers of the Crown was, in compliance with an address of Convocation, taken by the Crown in 1711. Convocation was authorized to pass a sentence upon his works, which they condemned, but from various reasons the condemnation seems to have had no practical result; and in 1712 a Dr. Pelling, as a voluntary promoter of the office of the Judge, filed articles of heresy against Whiston, who dwelt within the exempt and peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's. The Commissary of that Court, Dr. Harwood, sent the case by letters of request to the Court of Arches: the Judge of the Court of Arches, Dr. Bettesworth, alleging that there was "No suggestion of any reason why the cause should not be brought before the proper Ordinary," in February, 1712, Dr. Harwood sent new letters of request, alleging as grounds that, as Commissary, he had not authority to inflict a proper punishment for heresy, as he had no commission from a bishop; or, according to the minutes of the Delegates' Process Book, "On account of gravity of matter and doubt whether Commissary could inflict proper punishment, he humbly repeats his request." While the Court of Arches was considering the application of Dr. Harwood, it seems that Dr. Pelling prayed an original citation, not by letters of request, but under the statute of 23 Hen. 8, c. 9, to which I shall presently advert.

On Febuary 16, Dr. Pelling renewed his application; on February 25, the Judge of the Court of Arches, according to the report in Comyns, p. 200, decreed "that letters of request from Dr. Harwood lie not before him, because in a case of heresy the bishop of the diocese hath jurisdiction in places otherwise exempt within his diocese, and notwithstanding the Statute of Citation an heretick may be cited to appear before him upon letters of request from the Judge of the Peculiar, or by process sub mutuo, &c., and therefore he cannot decree a citation," &c. On March 2, Pelling appealed to the delegates, to which appeal Whiston was no party; but the Judge of the Arches seems to have been heard by counsel, who argued, according to the report, as follows: "That a superior Judge is not obliged to accept letters of request, for no law saith that he is so obliged, and it would be inconvenient, since the fees would all belong to the inferior Judge, and unreasonable, since the superior Judge cannot oblige the inferior Judge to grant such letters of request, and therefore ought not to be obliged to accept them; secondly, the inferior Judge in this case had no jurisdiction, for he cannot excommunicate, degrade or deprive. Statute 2 Hen. 4, c. 15, speaks of the bishop of the diocese, and so does 10 Hen. 7, c. 17; thirdly, the bishop of the diocese hath jurisdiction in cases of heresy in places exempt: fourthly, there was no cause depending before Dr. Harwood, and the Arches have jurisdiction only in case of appeals by patent." To this argument it was replied that the bishop was by express words of the 23 Hen. 8, c. 9 (the Bill of Citations) restrained from citing any person dwelling in a Peculiar before him, and that this case was not within the exceptions mentioned in the statute; that there was no appeal from the Commissary of St. Paul's to the Bishop, and, on the other hand, it was provided, by section 4 of the statute, "that it shall be lawful to every archbishop of this realm to cite any person inhabiting in any bishop's diocese within his province for causes of heresy, if the bishop or other ordinary immediate thereunto consent, or do not his duty in punishment of the same," and that, on the whole, the Judge of the Arches by refusing a citation, not letters of request, denied justice.

The delegates reversed the sentence of the Arches, but upon what grounds does not appear: whether because he ought to have issued an original citation under the 4th section of the Act, or because sufficient grounds were laid by the second letters of request for his acceptance of them (in the present case before me it will be remembered that no grounds are laid), and he had exercised his discretion improperly in not accepting them, or whether he was bound, without any grounds assigned, to have accepted them, though the latter suggestion, for a reason which I will presently state, seems to have been very improbable. Whiston always protested against the jurisdiction of the delegates, upon the ground that he was no party to the appeal, and that they were acting as a Court of original jurisdiction, which they had no power to do; and certainly they were acting in a most unusual manner in this respect. It appears that the delegates did not agree amongst themselves; there was a commission of adjuncts; they arrived at no conclusion; and it is believed that the whole affair was put an end to on the accession of George the First by a general act of amnesty, which included heresy. I have considered this case at so much length because it is the only one upon which Sir G. Lee founds his dictum in Butler v. Dolben (2 Lee, 317). Whiston's case (1 Comyns, 190) was in 1712 and Butler v. Dolben (2 Lee, 317) in 1756. Dr. Hay, the most eminent civilian of his day, argued in the latter case that the statute 23 Hen. 8, " authorizes the Court to judge of the reasons on which letters of request are granted. This is a new case, arising upon the late Statute of Marriage; the doubtfulness of the jurisdiction is good ground for receiving letters of request." And what is more remarkable, Dr. Bettesworth the younger, the son, I believe, of the Judge of the Arches, before whom Whiston's case (1 Comyns, 190), came, must have been familiar with it, but he argued that " the granting and receiving letters of request are discretionary." The reference of Sir George Lee to the supposed dictum of the delagates in Whiston's case (1 Comyns, 190) could not have been founded, as the dates shew, on personal knowledge. No note or report of any such dictum is to be found. The dictum, moreover, was unnecessary for the decision in Whiston's case (1 Comyns, 190), and was not necessary for the decision in Butler v. Dolben (2 Lee, 317) at which Sir G. Lee arrived, which was that the Arches Court had power of accepting letters of request in a matrimonial suit, and that where it was doubtful in which of two jurisdictions the party had his domicil, the Arches Court might accept joint letters of request. And this seems to have been considered by Sir Herbert Jenner, in the case of Stewart v. Bateman (3 Curt. 205), decided in 1842, as the only point which was decided by Sir George Lee. The statute of 23 Hen. 8, c. 9, s. 3, enacts that " the bishop may make request or instance to the archbishop, bishop or other superior ordinary or Judge, to take, treat, examine or determine the matter before him or his substitutes, and that to be done in cases only where the law civil or canon doth affirm execution of such request or instance of jurisdiction to be lawful or tolerable."

This very enactment surely implies a power in the Court of Arches to examine whether the law, civil or canon, does affirm the execution of such request to be lawful. Such, moreover, has been the invariable practice up to the time of passing the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, to assign grounds why the letters of request should be accepted. This practice was deemed proper and reasonable by the Courts in Westminster Hall; for in the case of Jones v. Jones (Hob. 185; 2 Brown. 27), it having been maintained by the civilians that it was absolutely in the power of the Ordinary to send any cause to the archbishop at his will without assigning any special reason, for which they cited the authority of divers canonists, Hobart (and as it seems the Court) said, " That to expound the statute thus, viz., that the Ordinary may at his will and pleasure send the subject from one end of the kingdom to another without cause, was both against the letter of the statute and did utterly elude it; that the purpose of the law was to provide for the ease of the subject more than for the jurisdiction of the Ordinary, which appears in that there is action given to the subject and penalty to the king for the vexation, but none to the Ordinary; and that this very clause says it is to be done in cases only, &c., which would be a vain restriction, if it left it as general as before, i.e., if it were lawful or tolerable in all cases without cause."

My predecessor in this chair, Sir H. J. Fust, in 1842 decided, in a very elaborate judgment—Stewart v. Bateman (3 Curt. 205)—to refuse letters of request presented to him jointly by the Archdeacon and the Chancellor of Norwich, observing, indeed, "My object is not to withhold the jurisdiction of this Court, but to guard against any question arising in respect to the proper form of exercising it." The decision of Sir George Lee was much referred to by the counsel and by the Judge, but I do not find it to have been suggested by either that the acceptance of letters of request was compulsory on the Court of Arches. I do not mean to assert that the Court of Arches exercises a discretion from which there is no appeal as to accepting or refusing letters of request. There are various instances, such as that of granting or refusing a faculty, in which the Court exercises its discretion, but the exercise of such discretion may be controlled and modified on an appeal to the superior Court. So far, therefore, as the law and practice previously to the passing of the present Clergy Discipline Act are concerned, I think the Court of Arches had a right to refuse letters of request until proper grounds were assigned why they should be accepted. Secondly, I have to consider whether the enactments in 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, have taken away such a discretion as previously existed. Now it is, in the first place, remarkable that this statute has given the bishop greater personal power than he ever previously possessed, and greater assistance in the exercise of that power. He may hear a cause of this kind, sitting in person with the aid of assessors, which he could not do previously to the passing of this statute; he may also send the case by letters of request to the Court of the province; but the statute does not enact that the Court of the province must accept them when sent, or that it may not require reasons why it should accept them.

Moreover, it has been ruled, in the case of Regina v. the Bishop of Chichester (2 El. & El. 209; 29 L. J. Q.B. 23), by the authority of Mr. Justice Wightman, Lord Campbell and Lord Chief Justice Erle,—for Mr. Justice Wightman expressly stated, in his judgment, that the two latter Judges concurred with him in opinion—that the bishop had such a discretion, while the remaining Judge (Mr. Justice Hill) agreed that the bishop had such a discretion in the particular case which was before the Court. And, in the case of Sherwood v. Ray (1 Moore, 397), the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council,—a member of which was Sir John Nicholl, the most experienced of all ecclesiastical Judges,—laid down the law as follows: "And it is to be recollected that this may be the only form in which any individual can question the marriage as a matter of right; for to promote the office of the Judge in a criminal suit requires the authority and consent of the Court, and, though this is obtained without difficulty in ordinary practice, it cannot be demanded ex debito justitiæ."

I have referred to the clause in the statute enabling the bishop to send the case without inquiry in the first instance by letters of request to the Court of appeal; surely, it would be a strange thing if a discretion as to allowing a suit to be instituted were vested in the bishop and denied to the archbishop represented by this Court. If any good grounds were stated, or if it appeared from the nature of the case that the interests of justice would be promoted by my acceptance of these letters of request, I should certainly exercise my discretion in favour of accepting them. I have done so in cases where clerks have been charged with immorality, because there was a manifest advantage both to the parties and the Church that a Court of law, accustomed to the oral examination of witnesses and to the investigation of evidence, and aided by the assistance of able counsel, should deal in the first instance with such cases.

But the present letters of request are tendered to me in a matter of alleged heresy connected with some of the most awful mysteries of our religion. Surely such is a case, on which, above all others, the bishop ought to exercise his jurisdiction. No reason whatever is stated to me why he should not do so. Courts of appeal are in the habit of saying that they will not entertain grave questions in the first instance, because they have a right to the advantage of the judgment of the inferior Court. This doctrine has been frequently maintained by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, when attempts have been made to induce them to retain causes appealed to them upon some incidental point. Why should the Court of appeal of the province be deprived of this advantage in a matter which, I must repeat, is of all others fittest for the cognizance and decision of the bishop of the diocese?

I must decline to accept these letters of request until some reason, at least, is stated why I should do so.

IN THE PRIVY COUNCIL. June 19, 30, 1869.

LORD HATHERLEY, L.C., DR. THOMSON (ARCHBISHOP OF YORK), DR. JACKSON (BISHOP OF LONDON), SIR WILLIAM ERLE and SIR JOSEPH NAPIER.

Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86. s. 13.)—Official Principal of the Arches Court; Power and Duty of—Letters of Request.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—The Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86. s. 13.) enacts, "that it shall be lawful for the bishop of any diocese within which such clerk in orders shall hold any preferment," &c., in any case, "if he shall think fit," either in the first instance or after the Commissioners shall have reported that there was sufficient primâ facie ground for instituting proceedings, and before the filing of the articles, but not afterwards, to send the case by letters of request to the Court of appeal of the province, "to be there heard and determined according to the law and practice of such Court."

In a proceeding against a clerk in orders for publishing certain heretical doctrine, a Commission issued and reported that there was sufficient primâ facie ground for instituting proceedings; the case was then sent by letters of request under the above section to the Official Principal of the Arches Court, who refused to hear the case on the ground that no reason was assigned for proceeding in the superior Court in the first instance:—Held, that the Official Principal cannot refuse to deal with a case which has been sent to him by letters of request under the 13th section. That the words of the enactment, "to be there heard and determined according to the law and practice of such Court," are to be construed to secure the duty as well as the power of so hearing and determining the cases sent, and render it imperative upon the Arches Court "to hear and determine" the matter.

Letters of request are no more than the process by which the cause is to be placed in a condition to be heard and determined by the superior Court.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Official Principal of the Arches Court of Canterbury.

By this decree the Official Principal declined to accept letters of request under the hand and seal of the Right Reverend Robert John, Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells, by which letters of request the Bishop did, by virtue of "An Act for better enforcing Church Discipline," request the Official Principal to issue a citation under the seal of the Arches Court, citing the respondent the Rev. William James Early Bennett, a clerk in holy orders of the United Church of England and Ireland, vicar of the parish of Frome Selwood, in the county of Somerset, diocese of Bath and Wells, and province of Canterbury, to appear at a certain time and place to be in the said citation specified, and answer certain articles for having offended against the laws ecclesiastical of the realm, by having caused to be printed and published within the diocese of London certain works, in which he advisedly maintained or affirmed doctrine directly contrary to the Articles and formularies of the United Church of England and Ireland. The said articles to be administered to the said William James Early Bennett, at the voluntary promotion of the appellant, Thomas Byard Sheppard, a parishioner and inhabitant of the parish of Frome Selwood; and finally, to hear and determine the cause according to the law and practice of the said Arches Court.

On April 30, 1869, the learned Judge, having heard counsel, and deliberated thereon, declined to accept the letters of request, on the ground that no reason was alleged by the bishop, in the letters of request, why the case had been sent to the superior Court in the first instance.

The letters of request will be found set out, and the case in the Court below reported in 38 L. J. Ecc. 42.

Their LORDSHIPS intimated that they desired to hear counsel first upon the question as to how the law stood since the passing of the Church Discipline Act.

Mr. A. J. Stephens, Dr. Tristram, Mr. Archibald, and Mr. B. Shaw, for the appellant.—The Judge of the Arches Court of Canterbury has refused to accept the letters of request in this case, on the ground that the letters of request do not assign any reason for proceeding in the superior Court of the province in the first instance. The letters of request were under the 13th section of the Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86). The Judge of the Arches Court contends that the law is not altered in this respect by the Church Discipline Act, and that by the law as is stood before the passing of that Act the Judge of the Arches Court was entitled to exercise a discretion as to admitting letters of request; and that the very term " letters of request " implies a discretion on the part of the Judge to whom the letters are addressed. The question, however, turns on the construction to be put on section 13. of the Church Discipline Act. The words are, that it shall be lawful for the bishop of any diocese, " if he shall think fit," to send the case by letters of request to the Court of appeal of the province, to be there heard and determined according to the law and practice of such Court. These words not only authorize a bishop to send the case by letters of request, but enable him to do so " if he shall think fit." The statute makes it imperative on the Judge of the superior Court to hear and determine the case according to the law and practice of the said Court. It imposes the duty as well as the power of hearing and determining all cases sent. The fallacy of the judgment of the learned Judge consists in treating the letters of request as implying a command rather than creating a jurisdiction. Nothing turns upon the letters of request or upon their form. The letters of request are only the process by which the case is taken in the first instance to the superior Court. The learned Judge has drawn a distinction between cases of heresy and cases of immorality. Doctrinal questions are, however, the very cases which ought to be settled by an authoritative Court. It has been the uniform practice since the passing of the Act to receive letters of request. This practice has prevailed without interruption from the time of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust to the resignation of Dr. Lushington. They referred to The Bishop of Hereford v. T. (2 Robert Ecc. Ca. 595); The Queen v. the Justices of Kent (14 East, 395); Dwarris's Statutes, p. 574; Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, vol. 3, p. 224; Sanders v. Head (3 Curt. 44); Hawes v. Pellatt (2 Curt. 472); Butler v. Dolben (2 Lee, 319); Head v. Sanders (4 Moo. P.C.C. 186); Brookes v. Cresswell (4 Notes of Cases, 429); Golightly v. the Bishop of Chichester (2 El. & El. 209); Sherwood v. Ray (1 Moore, 397); and Steward v. Bateman (3 Curt. 201).

Mr. W. Phillimore, for the Judge of the Arches Court.—The Judge of the Arches Court contends that he has a discretionary power in the matter of admitting letters of request. The very terms of the instrument by which the case is taken in the first instance to the Arches Court imply a discretion in the person who may be the Judge of that Court. The Judge may hear the case in the first instance, or leave it to the Court of the diocese in which the alleged offence is committed to deal with the case in the first instance. There can be no inconvenience in this course, because it must be assumed that the Judge will properly exercise his discretion. At all events, this Committee will not assume that the Judge will exercise his discretion improperly. The Judge of the Arches Court contends that the letters of request ought to have assigned some reason for asking him to hear and determine the case in the first instance; and in this respect the Church Discipline Act cannot have created any change in the law. Before the passing of the Church Discipline Act the Judge of the Arches Court had a discretion in this matter. The statute does not impose the duty upon the Judge to hear all cases sent by letters of request. The Judge is only to exercise his jurisdiction in the first instance in such cases as he may approve the reasons assigned for taking the case. The reason should therefore be assigned in the letters of request. The Judge of the Arches Court is the officer of the archbishop, acting for him. If this Committee holds that the officer of the archbishop has, under this statute, no discretion in the matter, then the statute confers a discretion on the bishop of a diocese which it withholds from the archbishop of the province. The argument that whenever letters of request are sent, the Judge of the Arches Court acquires a jurisdiction which he must exercise, is fallacious. He referred to Rugg v. Kingsmill (38 L. J. Ecc. 23); Cross v. Cross (Notulæ Diariæ, by Dr. Audley, MSS. 1725, 1730); Heath v. Burder (15 L. J. Ecc. 1); Escott v. Mastin (4 L. J. Ecc. 130); and Hawkins v. Gathercole (6 De Gex, M. & G. 28).

The other respondent did not appear.

Cur. adv. vult.

Their Lordships, without hearing a reply, delivered judgment (on June 30).

The Lord Chancellor.—Upon this appeal the question has been, whether the Official Principal of the Arches Court was right in declining to accept letters of request from the Bishop of Bath and Wells, at least in their present shape, upon the grounds set forth in his judgment in the Court below.

The letters of request appear to their Lordships to have been in all respects valid and sufficient under the provisions of the Church Discipline Act, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, to bring the case within the cognizance of the Official Principal, if he had chosen to accept them and to act upon them; and the case depends upon the construction of that part of the 13th section of the statute therein referred to, whereby it is enacted, in respect of the offences there named, that the bishop of the diocese wherein the party accused holds any preferment may, if he shall think fit, send the case by letters of request to the Court of appeal of the province, to be there heard and determined according to the law and practice of such Court.

This 13th clause contains one of several provisions made by the legislature for the purpose of establishing a course for the trial of offences under the statute, and appears to us to comprise both an enabling and an obligatory purpose.

There is no dispute about the enabling power conferred thereby; for all parties agree that it creates a power for the bishop to send by letters of request every case within his cognizance, under this statute, to the Judge of the Court of the province, if he shall think fit so to do; and further, that it creates a power for the Judge of that Court to accept such letters of request, and to hear and determine according to the law and practice of his Court every case which shall be so sent; but the parties differ in respect of the obligatory effect of the clause upon the Judge of the provincial Court; that is to say, whether it operates to create the duty alleged by this appeal to have been imposed thereby upon him of accepting the letters of request now in question, and of hearing and determining the case sent therewith.

The respondent contends that the clause does not impose that duty upon the Judge universally, but only in the cases in which he approves of the reason which induced the bishop to send them; and that in any other case he is under no obligation and under no duty to accept and act upon them.

The respondent, in the judgment delivered by him, has considered first the law as it prevailed before the Church Discipline Act with reference to procedure in the Court of Arches upon letters of request; secondly, the law introduced by that statute.

Upon the first point, he came to the conclusion that the Court of Arches, before the passing of the Act, was entitled to refuse letters of request, unless and until proper grounds were assigned why they should be accepted. Upon the second point, he has come to the conclusion that, though the statute authorized the bishop to send the letters of request to the Court of the province, it does not enact that the Court of Arches must accept them, or that it may not require reasons to be assigned why it should accept them.

Their Lordships desired the question on the effect of the statute to be first argued; and they are satisfied, notwithstanding the very able manner in which the contrary view of the case has been put before them, that, according to the true construction of the statute, the Judge of the Court of Arches cannot refuse to deal with this case according to the 13th section of the Church Discipline Act, pursuant to the letters of request.

Assuming, as their Lordships do, for the purpose only of explaining their opinion on the effect of the statute, that any bishop on transmitting a cause by letters of request to the Court of appeal of the province is bound to state some valid reason why he does not proceed in the first instance to hear and determine the matter in his own Court, yet they conceive that the 13th section of the statute supplies in itself a reason for his so doing, and renders it imperative upon the Court to "hear and determine the matter." The sections of the statute which precede the 13th give to the bishop (as has been observed by the respondent) greater powers, and greater assistance in the exercise of his powers, to hear and determine cases falling within the provisions of the Act; but the 13th section also expressly provides that it shall be lawful for him, either in the first instance or after a report by Commissioners, that there is sufficient primâ facie ground for instituting proceedings, and before the filing of articles, to send the case, by letters of request, to the Court of appeal.

On the part of the respondent, it has been ably contended that "letters of request" is a term of art with a known meaning, having been a known instrument for transmitting matters from one jurisdiction to another in ecclesiastical procedure, and that they are in effect a request which may be refused—and not a command which ought to be obeyed—and that the direction to the Judge to hear and determine a case according to the law and practice of his Court included the practice of rejecting letters of request which appeared to be sent without sufficient reason. He further concluded, on grounds of expediency, that such a case as the present ought to be first heard and determined by the bishop before it should come to the Court of appeal of the province.

But these arguments have failed to convince their Lordships that the respondent is entitled to their judgment, and they have come to the conclusion that the words of the enactment, "to be there heard and determined according to the law and practice of such Court," are to be construed according to their ordinary acceptation, and are clear to secure the duty, as well as the power of so hearing and determining the cases sent.

It appears to their Lordships that it would be a very unreasonable construction of the Act to hold that when it is expressly enacted that the bishop may send the letters of request in order "that the cause may be heard and determined," the Judge of the Court to whom such letters are addressed should first determine, not the cause, but the question whether or not he will hear it.

It is to be observed that the words of the statute do not merely authorize the bishop to send letters of request, requesting thereby that the cause may be heard and determined, but enable him to send the case itself by letters of request to the Court of appeal to be there heard and determined.

The letters of request constitute the vehicle by which the case is to be brought before the Court, but when brought thither the case is to be proceeded with as of right.

Their Lordships are of opinion that had it been intended to give the Court of appeal an option as to whether or not it would hear the case, words to that effect ought necessarily to have been introduced.

The case of Golightly v. the Bishop of Chichester (2 El. & El. 209) and the dictum in Sherwood v. Ray (1 Moore, 397), which were cited by the respondent, do not in any way affect the question before their Lordships. They refer to the commencement of proceedings at the instance of the private promoter. But, on the other hand, it has been decided that after a commission has been issued by the bishop, and a report has been made that there is sufficient primâ facie ground for instituting proceedings, these must be proceeded with—Ex parte Denison (4 El. & B. 310). Great inconvenience would arise from a construction of the statute which would arrest the course of justice after the case had been entertained by the bishop to the extent of issuing a commission and obtaining a report. If the Judge of the Court of appeal of the province can refuse to hear it under the letters of request, the bishop, in the event of a mandamus being applied for against him, may say that he was entitled to the option of sending it to the Court of appeal of the province, and that he had done so, and the case might, therefore, remain wholly unheard.

The learned Judge has said that it would be strange if the discretion as to allowing a suit to be instituted were vested in the bishop and denied to the archbishop; but the same might be said of a case heard by the bishop and afterwards on regular appeal brought before the archbishop. The question as to the propriety of the inquiry is not before the archbishop in either case, but the only question is, whether the bishop shall first hear it or send it at once for trial to the Court of appeal. The statute intended to give an opportunity, where the bishop thought such a course desirable, of sparing the litigant one hearing.

Their Lordships are further of opinion that letters of request ought not to be regarded as a compulsory command to perform an onerous service, seeing that all exercise of authority in administering justice according to law ought to be regarded as a privilege and an honour; and the bishop, in sending the case, by letters of request, to the cognizance of the Official Principal, ought to be regarded as seeking guidance from superior knowledge and judicial powers rather than imposing on another a burden which he should have supported himself, without resorting to extraneous aid.

The letters of request are no more than the process by which the cause is to be placed in a condition to be heard and determined by the superior Court.

Sir Herbert Jenner Fust appears, in the case of Brookes v. Creswell (4 Notes of Cases, 429), to have taken this view of the statute, and we conceive it to be the correct interpretation. In Sanders v. Head (3 Curt. 44) he appears to have entertained the same opinion, and the latter case came before the Judicial Committee, which approved of the decision. Their Lordships, therefore, will advise Her Majesty to remit the cause to the Court of Arches, to be there heard and determined according to the law and practice of the Court.

There will be no costs on either side.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD CHELMSFORD, SIR J. W. COLVILE, SIR E. V. WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE PAGE WOOD, Dec. 1, 1868.

Contempt of Court—Supreme Court of British Guiana—Court of Record—Power to punish for Contempt—Appeal.

COLONY.—By an Order in Council of June 20, 1831, and by an ordinance of British Guiana of November 26, 1855, a new Supreme Court of Justice was established in British Guiana, and it was provided, that the Judges "shall have, possess, exercise and enjoy such and the same jurisdiction, powers and authority in every respect as the Judges of the said Courts have heretofore lawfully possessed, exercised or enjoyed; and that the decision of the majority of such Judges shall in all civil cases at any time depending in the said respective Courts, be taken and adjudged to be and shall be recorded as the judgment of the whole of such Court":—Held, that this ordinance, by the words "that the decision of the majority of such Judges shall be taken and adjudged to be and shall be recorded as the judgment of the whole of such Court," in terms constituted the Supreme Court a Court of record.

The Judicial Committee will not entertain an appeal from an order of a Court of record inflicting punishment by fine or imprisonment for contempt, if it appears upon the face of the order that the party has committed a contempt, that he has been duly summoned, and that the punishment awarded is an appropriate one.

This was an appeal from an order of the Supreme Court of Civil Justice of British Guiana, whereby it was adjudged that the appellant had committed a high contempt of the said Court, and it was ordered that, for such contempt, the appellant should be imprisoned for the term of six months, or until he should be sooner discharged by further order.

The contempt of Court, in respect of which the said order was made, consisted of the publication by the appellant of two articles in a newspaper called the Colonist, published at Georgetown, Demerara, on March 29 and on April 5, 1866.

On April 2, 1866, the appellant was summoned to attend the Supreme Court on April 4, to shew cause why an attachment should not issue against him for a contempt of the said Court, by the publication in a newspaper called the Colonist, published on March 29. On April 4, the appellant personally attended the said Court, when it was further ordered by the Court that he should attend the Court at its sitting on April 6, there to answer in respect of the contempt alleged against him. On April 6 the appellant again appeared, and counsel were heard, to shew cause on his behalf, when the Court, being informed that since April 4, that is to say, on April 5, the appellant had committed a further contempt of Court, by the publication of an article of that date in the said Colonist newspaper, it was ordered by the Court that the appellant should attend the Court at its sittings on April 10, and should then further answer, as well for the contempt first alleged against him as for such further contempt as was then alleged in respect of the article published on April 5.

On April 10, the appellant appeared personally in Court, in obedience to the order of the Court made on April 6, and being called on to shew cause, the appellant's counsel declined so to do, alleging that such order was irregular and ought not to be proceeded on, but that the Court ought, without reference thereto, to adjudicate on and dispose of the matters first alleged against the appellant, and as to which he was first called on to shew cause.

The Court having considered the objection, overruled it, and considered that the order of April 6 was regular, and that the appellant was bound to shew cause as thereby directed.

The appellant's counsel declined to shew cause. The informant of the Court was heard in answer to what was alleged on behalf of the appellant on April 6.

The appellant's counsel declined to reply, and the Court reserved its decision, and ordered the appellant to appear personally at the sitting of the Court on April 13, and intimated that notwithstanding the appellant's previous refusal to shew cause, the Court would allow him to do so before pronouncing their decision. On April 13, the Court having asked the appellant's counsel whether he desired to shew cause in the matter, he declined to do so, and thereupon the Court adjudged and determined that the appellant had committed a high contempt of the Court in and by having printed and published in the said Colonist newspaper of March 29, and April 5, certain articles containing matters scandalously reflecting upon one of the Judges of the Supreme Court, unjustly reflecting upon the informant of the Court, and tending to defame and obstruct the administration of justice, and ordered that for such contempts the appellant should be imprisoned for a term of six calendar months, to be completed from the date of the said order of April 13, 1866, or until he should be sooner discharged by the further order of the Court.

The appellant was thereupon delivered into the custody of the keeper of Her Majesty's gaol at Georgetown, under a warrant of commitment dated April 13, 1866.

The appellant afterwards petitioned the Court for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council from the said order, but the Court decided that it could not grant the prayer of the said petition.

The appellant, on October 21, 1866, presented a petition to Her Majesty in Council, praying leave to appeal against the said order of April 13, 1866, and from the judgment of the Court refusing leave to appeal.

The Judicial Committee granted leave to appeal, but reserved the question as to the competency of their Lordships to entertain such appeal.

J. D. Coleridge, Charles Pollock and Edmund Moore, for the appellant.—It is the undoubted prerogative of Her Majesty to admit, and it has been the practice of the Committee to advise the allowance of an appeal from Orders of Colonial Courts where the liberty of the subject is involved. The Superior Courts in this country are by the statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 20. s. 1. expressly prohibited from interfering in such cases by habeas corpus. The Supreme Court of Civil Justice of British Guiana is not a Court of record, and had no power to commit for the alleged contempt. The order of April 13, 1866, was wholly irregular and absolutely null and void. The English law does not apply. The Court is governed by the ancient Dutch law, and by such law the Court is not a Court of record. It is desirable to see what is the power to punish for contempt possessed by Courts in the Netherlands. Such Courts have no power to punish for a contempt. The Supreme Court had, therefore, no power to punish for a contempt of Court, unless such contempt was committed in facie Curiæ. There is nothing in any of the Acts or ordinances of British Guiana to constitute the Supreme Court a Court of record. They referred to Ex parte Wallace (4 Moore P.C. N.S. 140; 36 L. J. P.C. 9); In re Downie (3 Moore P.C. 414); Clarke's Colonial Law, 274, and In re Pollard (L. R. 2 P.C. 106).

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Baggallay) and Cracknall.—It is not competent for Her Majesty in Council to entertain an appeal from an order of a Court of record inflicting punishment by fine or imprisonment for a contempt of Court. The Supreme Court of Bermuda is a Court of record. The Supreme Court had therefore power to punish any contempt of Court by fine or imprisonment; and the question as to whether any contempt was, in fact, committed is entirely a question for the Court itself to determine. The order of the Supreme Court of April 13, 1866, and all the proceedings in the Supreme Court in respect of the appellant, to which the said order and judgment relate, were perfectly legal and regular. No appeal will lie, except in three cases: first, if the party is condemned without having an opportunity of being heard; secondly, if the punishment is inappropriate to the contempt committed; thirdly, if it can be shewn that no contempt could possibly have been committed.—They referred to Acts and Ordinances of British Guiana and Rainy v. the Justices of Sierra Leone (not reported).
